

HOMER

THE ILIAD

A NEW TRANSLATION BY PETER GREEN

University of California Press

THE ILIAD

The publisher gratefully acknowledges the generous support of the Joan Palevsky Literature in Translation Endowment Fund of the University of California Press Foundation.

HOMER

THE ILIAD

A NEW TRANSLATION BY PETER GREEN

University of California Press

University of California Press, one of the most distinguished university presses in the United States, enriches lives around the world by advancing scholarship in the humanities, social sciences, and natural sciences. Its activities are supported by the UC Press Foundation and by philanthropic contributions from individuals and institutions. For more information, visit www.ucpress.edu.

University of California Press
Oakland, California

© 2015 by Peter Green

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Homer, author.

[Iliad. English]

The Iliad / Homer; a new translation by Peter Green.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references.

ISBN 978-0-520-28141-7 (cloth, alk. paper) — ISBN 978-0-520-96132-6 (electronic)

1. Achilles (Greek mythology)—Poetry. 2. Trojan War—Poetry. 3. Epic poetry, Greek. I. Green, Peter, translator I. Title.
PA4025.A2G75 2015
883'.01—dc23 2014038401

Manufactured in the United States of America

24 23 22 21 20 19 18 17 16 15
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

In keeping with a commitment to support environmentally responsible and sustainable printing practices, UC Press has printed this book on Natures Natural, a fiber that contains 30% post-consumer waste and meets the minimum requirements of ANSI/NISO Z39.48-1992 (R 1997) (Permanence of Paper).

Τυφλὸς ἀνὴρ, οἰκεῖ δὲ Χίῳ ἐνὶ παιπαλοέσσει.
τοῦ πάσαι μετόπισθεν ἀριστεύουσιν ἀοιδαί.

He is a blind man, and lives on rocky Chios:
All his songs will be supreme, now and forever.

Homeric Hymn to Delian Apollo, 172–73

Contents

ix	Preface
xv	Abbreviations
i	Introduction
25	THE ILIAD
463	Synopsis
505	Glossary
557	Select Bibliography
561	Index

Preface

This book is the improbable fulfillment of a dream that has haunted me ever since the middle of the twentieth century, when I was one of the team Donald Carne-Ross assembled to produce some new versions of Homer's Iliad on the (now long defunct) BBC Third Programme. Creative outreach was our watchword; we were targeting a postwar generation, mostly ex-service, that knew no Greek but was hungry for the classics. But in my case the magic went far further back: to Andrew Lang's marvelous Tales of Troy and Greece read in childhood; to the Greek I began to learn when I was ten years old; to the well-thumbed India-paper red cloth volume of Monro and Allen's third edition of the Iliad, which I had read from cover to cover by the time I was fifteen, and which went with me through three monsoons in India and Burma during World War II (and sits by me as I write these words, its pages crinkled from oppressive humidity and still smelling of the Arakan). When I finally got to Cambridge in 1947 it was a piece of providential luck that in the year I took Part II of the Classical Tripos, the annual revolving sequence of genres had reached Epic. I still have my ancient, battered copy of Walter Leaf's commentary, annotated throughout with my (mostly embarrassing) undergraduate comments. When, a few years later, with a Ph.D. in hand, I joined Carne-Ross's team, I saw the translations I did then as preparation for a full version of my own.

Of course, it didn't happen. A mass of other work got in the way. I married, had children, was caught up in endless responsibilities. The best part of a decade in Greece saw me productive in many ways, but not regarding Homer. Even when, at long last, I gravitated back by a somewhat circuitous route to teaching at university level, and became a professor of classics, other passions, mostly historical, monopolized what little spare time I had. From time to time—not least when I saw yet another version of the Iliad or the Odyssey collecting tribute in the headlines—a sad twinge of regret, a sense of opportunity lost, would nag at me, to be dismissed as self-indulgent romantic nostalgia. Even when I retired, the old dream still seemed a classic case of the If only syndrome.

I suspect, though, that my subconscious may have been quietly at work: I was aware, for example, when in 1996 I translated Apollonius Rhodius's Argonautika, that in tackling the myth of Jason and the Golden Fleece I was responding to a passion first ignited, like that for the Trojan War and the subsequent adventures of Odysseus, by Andrew Lang's retelling of both: his words had fired my imagination, as a child, in an unforgettable way. What that experience also gave me was a fresh lesson, and an extremely useful one, in how to deal, as a translator, with the unrelentingly tricky problem of the epic hexameter. But it was only a year ago, when I realized that on my next birthday I was going to be ninety, that I asked myself what I had to lose, even now, by tackling the Iliad; and in a curiously relaxed mood sat down and tried my hand at book 1. What, of course, I eventually discovered was the reason I had waited so long. In one way and another, my whole career had been a preparation for this moment. What would work for Homer in translation? Of all that I had done over half a century earlier for the Third Programme, I kept a grand total of three lines. When it came to presenting the Iliad to a modern, Greekless audience confronting ancient epic for the first time, Homer proved a more challenging taskmaster than I could ever have imagined: and yet to meet that challenge was something I found continually enjoyable and exciting. Preserving the strangeness, yet in an acceptable way; finding the mot juste for difficult and often alien concepts; matching the wonderful linear rhetoric, both in speeches and descriptive passages; keeping the simplicity while always acknowledging the emotional subtleties; writing rhythms that could, like the original, be declaimed aloud, and hold the attention of a listening audience; perhaps, above all, resisting the temptation to make nonexistent equations with easily recognizable English patterns—all this tested my skills to the utmost, and too often defeated my best efforts, forced me to settle for a compromise. Perhaps that is the best any translator can hope for.

To one nagging minor problem, the spelling of Greek proper names, I have found no altogether satisfactory solution, and probably none exists. The problem itself is one legacy of Rome's complete cultural domination of the European classical tradition from the Renaissance until well into the nineteenth century, which dictated (among much else), not only that Greek names be Latinized, but that the gods of the Greek pantheon should be replaced in translation by their nearest Roman equivalents. The second practice was reluctantly abandoned only after about 1880; the first is still very much with us. It is not just a matter of replacing -os and -on terminations with -us and -um; k with c; short u with y; and the diphthongs -oi with -oe, -ei with ī, and -ou with ū. The Latin -er termination is also imposed, so that “Aléxandros” becomes “Alexander”, and “Teukros” “Teucer”. For the most part (but not invariably: for example, I use “Achilles” rather than “Akhilleus”), I have gone back to the Greek spelling. In a majority of cases this does not make for a wrenching unfamiliarity. But the shift from Roman “Hecuba” to Greek “Hekabē” or from Roman “Ajax” to Greek “Aias” can be disconcerting, and there are some Hellenisms—for example, “Oidipous” for “Oedipus”, “Mykēnai” for “Mycenae”, “Krētē” for “Crete—that take some getting used to. But one has to start getting rid of this wretched Latin legacy somewhere.

Now the work is done, and out of my hands, I suppose I should be relaxing; but the truth is, I find myself getting more and more involved in the not quite identical problems confronting a translator of the Odyssey: I suspect my tussle with doing Homer justice is not over yet. Meanwhile I would like to take this opportunity of thanking my publishers at the University of California Press for their confidence in supporting yet another versio of the Iliad; the students who, over long years, most often without realizing it, sharpened my sense of how to look at Homer; my copy editor and old friend Peter Dreyer for, once again, his lynx-eyed common sense; and another good friend, Barbara Hird, for not only so generously agreeing at very short notice to execute a most complex index for me but also for spotting a number of errors that had got past all the rest of us. I am likewise extremely grateful to my in-house editors, Eric Schmidt and Cindy Fulton, whose professional aplomb when dealing with a challenging manuscript has been beyond all praise. Finally and above all, I thank my wife Carin, who put up so patiently with being a sounding board for my ideas as the translation progressed, and invariably came up with perceptive comments and shrewd professional ideas of her own. My translation is dedicated to her, and never was a dedication more richly deserved. μάλιστα δέ τ' ἐκλυον αὐτοί.

Abbreviations

Ael.	Claudius Aelianus (c. 170–c. 230 C.E.), a Roman freedman from Praeneste, writer (in Greek) of miscellanies.
NA	Ael., On the Nature of Animals .
Apollod.	Apollodorus of Athens, grammarian (c. 180–c. 120 C.E.). Certainly not the author of the Bibliothēkē (library), a manual of mythology attributed to him by a (probably) near-contemporary forger.
Epit.	Epitome to Apollod., Bibliothēkē .
arg.	argumentum , i.e., argument (in the sense of précis or synopsis).
Athen.	Athenaeus of Naukratis in Egypt (fl. c. 200 C.E.), author of the Deipnosophistae , or Learned Banqueters , his sole surviving work, a fifteen-book account of a symposium, mostly notable for its excerpts from classical works now otherwise lost.
BA	Barrington Atlas of the Greek and Roman World . Edited by R. J. A. Talbot. Princeton, NJ, 2000.
Diod. Sic.	Diodorus Siculus, of Agyrium in Sicily (c. 100–c. 30 B.C.E.), universal historian, author of a Bibliothēkē (library).
fr.	fragment.
Hdt.	Herodotus, of Halicarnassus and Thurii (c. 485–c. 420), historian of the Persian Wars
Hes.	Hesiod, epic/didactic poet (fl. c. 700 B.C.E.).
Cat.	Hes., Catalogue of Women .
Th.	Hes., Theogony .
WD	Hes., Works and Days .
HHAphr.	Homeric Hymn to Aphrodite .
HE	The Homer Encyclopedia . Edited by M. Finkelberg. 3 vols. Oxford (Wiley-Blackwell), 2011.
Il.	Homer, Iliad .
JHS	Journal of Hellenic Studies .

OCD ³	The Oxford Classical Dictionary . 3rd ed. rev. Edited by S. Hornblower and A. Spawforth. Oxford, 2003.
OCD ⁴	The Oxford Classical Dictionary . 4th ed. Edited by S. Hornblower, A. Spawforth, and E. Eidinow. Oxford, 2012.
Od.	Homer, Odyssey
Pliny	Pliny the Elder, Gaius Plinius Secundus (23/4–79 C.E.), equestrian procurator and literary scholar.
HN	Pliny, Historia Naturalis , a thirty-seven-book encyclopedic Natural History .
Thuc.	Thucydides of Athens (c. 460–c. 395 B.C.E.), author of an (unfinished) history of the Peloponnesian War.

Introduction

APPROACHING THE PROBLEM

From both the literary and the sociohistorical viewpoints, the situation of anyone embarking on Homer for the first time—and in many ways this applies as much to the classical student as to anyone else—is a unique one. To begin with, in the sense that we normally consider a written work, there is no anterior background: we are at the beginning. To make matters worse, our ignorance concerning both work and author is abysmal.

We do not know for certain who Homer was, or where he lived, or when he wrote. We cannot be absolutely confident that the same man (if it was a man) wrote both the Iliad and the Odyssey, or even that “wrote” is a correct description of the method of composition involved. Indeed, there is much doubt still as to whether we can talk in terms of a single poet at all, rather than of a traditional sequence of bards fashioning an oral poème vivant, a living poem subject to constant modification; though (to complicate matters still further) there is the likelihood (West 2011) of a master poet having used a mass of centuries-old oral lays as material from which to create the masterpieces we possess today. Even the time at which the texts we know were actually written down, and what stage of composition they represent, are equally uncertain. This uncertainty extends to the subject matter. We can no more state for a fact whether a Trojan War actually ever took place, let alone whether it bore any relation to the conflict described in the Iliad, than we can form a confident picture of “Homer”. All we have, as T. S. Eliot said in a different poetic context, are “hints and guesses, hints followed by guesses.”

The plot of the Iliad is a good place to begin, since at least we know a reasonable amount about the early myth (itself an ambiguous term) concerning the origin and events of the Trojan War. The first striking fact for any newcomer to the scene is how little of the myth actually takes place within the Iliad itself, which covers less than two months—fifty-one days, to be precise—of a war that lasted ten long years, and of which the antecedents looked back almost as far, just as the consequences stretched out a good decade into the future. All that the narrative of the Iliad covers are the events precipitated, in the ninth year of the war, by a quarrel between Agamemnōn, commander in chief of the invading Achaian forces, and Achilles, his most brilliant warrior. A Trojan priest of Apollo, Chrysēs, comes to their camp offering ransom for his daughter Chryseïs, currently a prisoner allotted as booty to Agamemnōn. At first Agamemnōn brusquely—and against general feeling—rejects his offer. Chrysēs prays to Apollo, who visits the Achaian camp with a devastating plague. The Achaian priest Kalchas explains the plague, correctly, as a direct result of Agamemnōn’s rejection of Chrysēs’ offer. Faced with this, Agamemnōn agrees to return Chryseïs, but insists on being given a replacement by the Achaians: honor and status are involved. A contemptuous speech by Achilles sharpens Agamemnōn’s resolve: he threatens to take Achilles’ own captive woman, Briseïs, in lieu of the one he is giving up, and in due course does so.

This provokes the almost superhuman wrath (mēnis) in Achilles that leads him to withdraw himself and his troops from the war effort, with alarming results for the Achaians. His rage persists, defying all efforts to change his mind (including an offer by Agamemnōn to return Briseïs with additional placatory gifts) until the death in battle, at the hands of the Trojan Hektōr, of Achilles’ dear comrade Patroklos, who has borrowed Achilles’ own armor for the purpose. This finally brings Achilles back into action, with the sole aim of killing Hektōr—which he duly does, and then savagely maltreats his victim’s corpse. Outraged, the gods on Olympos, led by Zeus, compel Achilles to accept ransom from Hektōr’s father, the aged king Priam, and to return his body for burial. The sight of Priam stirs unexpected feelings of compassion in Achilles; the Iliad ends with Hektōr’s funeral rites.

This epic tragedy forms a small part only of a general narrative that was, clearly, familiar in detail to all who heard or, later, read it: casual, and unexplained, references to what follows occur at intervals throughout the text of the Iliad that we have today, showing that knowledge of the basic plot line was taken as a given from a very early period during the oral transmission of lays concerning the Trojan War. That plot line, in brief, is as follows.

It begins with the Judgment of Paris, an ahistorical legendary scenario if ever there was one. At the marriage of the Thessalian warrior Pēleus to the sea-nymph Thetis, attended by gods as well as mortals, Eris (Strife personified) mischievously makes trouble between three powerful goddesses, Hērē, Athēnē, and Aphroditē, by provoking them¹ to quarrel over which of the three has the best claim to beauty. Zeus (who has long coveted Thetis, but is marrying her off to a mortal because of a prophecy that she’ll give birth to a man greater than his father) has Hermēs send the contentious trio to Mt.

1. By throwing down before them the famous golden Apple of Discord, inscribed “To the Fairest”.

Ida, where Paris Aléxandros—son of King Priam of Troy, but exposed at birth because of a prophecy that he would bring disaster on his city, and brought up by a shepherd family—is tending his flocks. He is to settle their quarrel, and duly does so. Hērē promises him kingship, Athēnē will ensure that he becomes a great warrior, Aphroditē guarantees his conquest of the world’s most beautiful woman. (Why, apart from pure egotism, goddesses should not only accept the verdict of an admittedly good-looking shepherd boy, but offer him bribes for it, is never made entirely clear.) Inevitably, his vote goes to Aphroditē. By so doing, he makes enemies of two great goddesses. He also, in the long run, provides a casus belli for the Trojan War (as Zeus has planned all along, with a view to shrinking the world’s excessively large population through slaughter), since when he meets, and falls for, the world’s most beautiful woman, Helen, she is already married to King Menelaös of Sparta.

Years pass. Paris Aléxandros is recognized and restored as a prince of Troy. As such, he makes a state visit to the Spartan ménage of Helen and Menelaös, and, aided by Aphroditē (who has not forgotten her promise), not only bedazzles and sails off with an all-too-willing Helen while Menelaös’s guest, but also compounds his alienation of marital affection by removing a sizable haul of family property in addition to the lady, though her nine-year-old daughter Hermionē, a potential embarrassment on the honeymoon, is left behind. They have a following wind, a calm sea, and reach Troy in three days: clearly Aphroditē, like Artemis, can control the weather for the benefit of her favorites. (An alternative version has a spiteful Hērē, who clearly hasn’t forgotten or forgiven the Judgment, hit them with a storm that takes them to Sidon, which Paris Aléxandros duly captures en route to Troy.)

When embassies fail to have Menelaös’s wife, and her property, returned, his brother Agamemnōn, “lord of men” (anax andrōn), assembles a huge expeditionary force from the various Mycenaean kingdoms of Hellas—Argos, Pylos, Tiryns, Orchomenos, and Ithákē among them, in addition to Menelaös’s Sparta and Agamemnōn’s own stronghold of Mykēnai (Mycenae)—to recover Helen by force, and sack and destroy Troy into the bargain. (These warriors are known in the Iliad not as Hellenes, but, more locally, as Achaians, or Danaäns, or Argives.) An omen is interpreted to mean that the war will last ten years. As though to hint that the length of this campaign will be in large part caused by inefficiency, a first expedition fizzles out embarrassingly after the Achaians make landfall at Teuthrania, mistake it for Troy, sack it, and, on discovering their error, sail back home. When assembled a second time, at the port of Aulis, the fleet is initially held up by contrary winds due (as Kalchas the seer declares) to irritation by the divine huntress Artemis at Agamemnōn, who after shooting a stag boasts that he's an even better hunter than Artemis herself. For expiation of this lèse-majesté, says Kalchas, and to get a favorable wind, Agamemnōn must sacrifice his daughter Iphigeneia. Agamemnōn duly sends for her, under the attractive pretense that she is to marry the Thessalian warlord Achilles—none other than the son of Pēleus and Thetis, who has indeed grown up to be greater than his father: Zeus was well out of that one—and duly sacrifices her, thus making a deadly enemy of Klytaimnēstra his wife. But Artemis's amour propre is placated, and the fleet gets its fair wind for the voyage to Troy.

Since Troy defies all efforts to take it by siege, the Achaians spend literally years raiding the surrounding countryside and reducing lesser cities—what Barry Strauss well describes as “a counterstrategy of slow strangulation” (87). This kind of warfare yields both subsistence to the besiegers and booty for the leading warriors. It is in the ninth year, after the sack of (Cilician) Thēbē (Thebes), that Chryseïs is awarded, in the share-out of the spoils, to Agamemnōn, and the narrative of the Iliad begins. It closes with Hektōr's bones collected in a golden box and buried; a great mound is raised, and a funeral feast held. Then the truce expires, and the war goes on.

The Trojans now gain a valuable new ally in the person of the Amazon warrior Penthesilea, a Thracian and daughter of Arēs, who inflicts great slaughter until slain by Achilles. The malcontent Achaian Thersitēs (earlier whipped by Odysseus for an insulting harangue against Agamemnōn [2.211–77]) now jeers at Achilles for supposedly having fallen in love with her, and Achilles, enraged, kills him. This homicide makes it necessary for Achilles to remove himself temporarily to Lesbos, where he sacrifices to Artemis, Apollo, and Lētō, and is purified of blood-guilt by Odysseus. A second new ally then appears to help the Trojans: Memnōn, son of Eōs, the Dawn, leading a force of Aithiōpians from the East, and wearing armor made for him, like that of Achilles, by the smith-god Hēphaistos (who clearly has no hesitation about arming both sides if the client is distinguished enough). Thetis reports on Memnōn to Achilles: in the ensuing battle Memnōn kills Antilochos, but is himself killed by Achilles. His mother Eōs, however, obtains the gift of resurrection and immortality for him from Zeus. Achilles leads a successful charge against the Trojans that would have taken the Achaians into the city and captured it had not Paris Aléxandros, with Apollo's aid, shot him dead at the Skaian Gates, thus fulfilling Hektōr's dying prophecy.

There follows a huge struggle for Achilles' body: finally Aias (better known in his Latinized form as Ajax) manages to heft it up and carry it back to the ships, while Odysseus covers his back and fights off the Trojans. Anti-lochos is buried; Thetis, her sea nymphs, and the Muses all come to mourn publicly for Achilles. Thetis indeed snatches her son from the pyre and transports him magically to Leukē (“White Island”) on the Black Sea. Nevertheless the Achaians build him a great burial mound and hold funeral games in his honor, at which Achilles’ arms, the prize for the greatest hero, are competed for by Aias and Odysseus, and awarded (through the intervention of Athēnē on behalf of her favorite) to the latter, thus causing a bitter quarrel that finally leads to Aias’s suicide. The Trojan Helenos, captured by Odysseus, prophesies that the taking of Troy will depend on the bringing from Lēmnos of Philoktētēs, an Achaian left there with a malodorous suppurating snakebite years before. Diomēdēs fetches him, and he is healed by the physician Machaōn, after which he fights Paris Aléxandros in single combat and kills him. Menelaōs, the cuckolded husband, outrages the corpse, but the Trojans carry it off and give it burial. Helen, in Trojan eyes now a widow, marries Hektōr’s brother Deīphobos.² Achilles’ son Neoptolemos is fetched from Skyros by Odysseus, who presents him with his father’s famous arms and armor. The boy is also visited by Achilles’ ghost: if to encourage his youthful martial ardor, with remarkable success.

Like father, like son: Neoptolemos goes on a killing spree, his victims including Agēnōr and the newly arrived Eurypylos, son of Tēlephos (who first himself slays Machaōn). But the Trojans, though now closely besieged, are stubbornly holding out. An impatient Athēnē has the idea of introducing an attack force into Troy hidden in the famous Wooden Horse (which the Trojans themselves will be tempted to bring into the city) and instructs Epeios (previously only known as a hulking brawny boxer at Patroklos’s funeral games [23.665–99]) in the making of it. Meanwhile a second item in Helenos’s prophecy is that Troy cannot be taken until the Palladion, a special sacred image of Athēnē kept in the city, is found and removed. Odysseus and Diomēdēs, disguised as beggars, make their way in via a handy sewer, find the image, and duly carry it off—perhaps, as one source suggests, with the connivance of Helen. Newly remarried she may be, but she’s a professional survivor: this is not the only instance of her last-minute dithering between Trojans and Achaians. A commando force is concealed in the Horse; the main body of the Achaians, after burning their huts and encampment, sail away (but only as far as the nearby island of Tenedos). The Trojans, with stunning credulity, not only think that, after ten long years, their attackers have given up, and that they themselves have won the war, but also—as the result of discussion: at least some of them are suspicious—vote to bring the Horse into the city as a thank-offering to the gods, and even demolish part of their city wall in order to do so. Then they hold a great feast and retire for the night.

2. Strauss (167) points out that this may well have been a “levirate marriage”: that is, one in which, in order to maintain a family alliance and guarantee the widow a male protector, “a brother is required to marry the widow of his deceased brother”. Although unknown in Iron Age Greece, the practice was common in the Near East: we have Hebrew, Hittite, and Ugarit evidence for it. By suggesting that the poet is familiar with such alien mores, introducing this foreign custom would also increase the likelihood that the narrative has a historical core.

The occupants of the Horse emerge, and send a fire signal to Tenedos: the fleet returns, the Achaians pour into Troy, and the slaughter and rapine begin. Neoptolemos kills Priam at the altar of Zeus, hurls Hektōr's baby son Astyanax down from the battlements (another prophecy fulfilled), and claims the Trojan hero's wife Andromachē as his prize. Menelaös finds Helen with Deïphobos, whom he kills, but decides to save Helen when she hopefully bares her breasts to him. Aias son of Oileus tears Kassandrē from the protection of Athēnē's altar still clutching the goddess's image, and rapes her (this blasphemous act, at least, provokes hostility in his fellow Achaians, who threaten to stone him). The Achaians, after sacking the city, burn it. Neoptolemos cuts the throat of Polyxeinē, another of Priam's daughters, over the tomb of Achilles at the request of his ghost. The spoils are divided, the Achaians sail for home, and Athēnē, still outraged by the desecration of her altar, is left planning to destroy them on the high seas. The scene is set for the various Returns (Nostoi) of the Achaian heroes, of which by far the most famous is that of Odysseus, recounted at length in the Odyssey: it takes him a good ten years—as long as the war he has just fought—to get back to Ithákē.

THE MYTH EXAMINED

The genesis and narrative of the Trojan War as a whole are contained in the so-called Epic Cycle, a group of slightly later (seventh–sixth centuries B.C.E.) poems, surviving only in short fragments and late (fifth century C.E.) plot outlines.³ The Cypria (in eleven books, variously attributed to Stasinus of Cyprus or Hegesias of Salamis) covers the origins of the war (including the Judgment of Paris), the setting up of the Achaian expedition (including the sacrifice of Iphigeneia at Aulis), and the campaign itself up to the beginning of the Iliad. In direct continuation after the Iliad comes the Aithiopis, in five books, attributed to Arktīnos of Milētos, which ends with the death and funeral games of Achilles. This is followed by the Little Iliad, in four books, attributed to Leschēs of Mytilēnē, during which Philoktētēs arrives from Lēmnos and Achilles' son Neoptolemos from Skyros, and the Trojans fatally haul the Wooden Horse (100 × 50 ft., with moving tail, knees, and eyes!) inside their walls. Finally (for our purposes) comes the Sack of Ilion, in two books, also by Arkṭinos, which describes the deaths of Priam and Astyanax, the burning of Troy, and the departure for home of the Achaians, with Athēnē planning revenge upon them.

3. These fragments are now easily accessible in a well-edited new Loeb volume, (Biblio. s.v. West 2003 [A]), from the consultation of which, together with West 2011 and 2013, anyone interested in the genesis of Greek epic poetry will derive considerable benefit.

There are several points of great interest apparent here. It seems clear that the poems of the Epic Cycle were specifically designed to complete the Trojan War sequence both before and after the Iliad, which would presuppose a body of myth that preceded not only the Cycle but also the Iliad itself. That assumption is confirmed both by widespread iconographic evidence, mostly on early illustrated vases, and by various brief allusive references in the texts of the Iliad and the Odyssey, for example, to the Judgment of Paris, the Wooden Horse, and (almost certainly) the sacrifice of Iphigeneia. Further, the comparative length in books of the works that compose the Epic Cycle, and the periods in years covered by each, when set against the Iliad—an average of much less than half the number of books, dealing with an enormously greater total time-span—make it very clear that, in striking contrast to Homer, their authors were exclusively occupied with filling in the gaps in a traditional narrative. This is confirmed by Aristotle, who emphasizes in his Poetics (1459ab) that a true epic poem should embody, as does the Iliad, a unified action, with a beginning, a middle, and an end, and not, like a work of history, simply cover an extended period of time, which is clearly what the poems of the Epic Cycle do (Aristotle points out, in furtherance of his argument, how many more plots for tragedies poems such as the Cypria or the Little Iliad yield than do the Iliad or the Odyssey). Lastly, the respective value placed by the ancient world on the poems of Homer and those of the Epic Cycle is made clear by their relevant degree of survival. The Epic Cycle, except for summaries and a few short quotations, is lost. The Iliad and the Odyssey, despite their uncertain genesis, have reached us by way of about the best Greek manuscript tradition in existence.

Thus what we have to deal with is, on the face of it, a unique phenomenon. There is no mention, anywhere, of any other poem from this early period in Archaic Greece, lost or surviving, on the vast scale of the two Homeric epics,⁴

4. Creative size seems characteristic of the post-Mycenaean centuries, as though artists of every sort felt somehow emboldened by new horizons, and had fresh confidence in their technical ability to design on an unprecedentedly large scale. The great Geometric Dipylon vases began the trend (cf. Whitman chs. 5 and 11); then came Homeric epic; last of all, in the fifth century, it was the turn of prose, with the structured Histories of Herodotos, roughly as long as Iliad and Odyssey combined.

the Iliad in particular, much less one that at the time enjoyed their equally huge cachet. Modern critics join those of antiquity in praising the Iliad's unparalleled subtlety, depth, overall structure, emotional force, and universal appeal. Two and a half millennia later that appeal has lost none of its pristine force—something we need constantly to bear in mind when probing the poem's genesis. Since it is generally agreed that, in order to produce a poem of the Iliad's unparalleled length (twenty-four books, a total of 15,692 lines) that is also, as critics from Aristotle on have shown, beautifully and subtly constructed,⁵ the availability of writing is an absolute necessity, it seems safe enough to date the composition of the poem as we know it to a period after the introduction of an adapted Phoenician/Semitic alphabet to Greece in the late ninth or early eighth century B.C.E. Just how long after remains uncertain and much debated. However, we need to balance this conclusion against the equally certain fact that the main body of the Trojan War myth clearly long preceded the composition of the Iliad in its present form, and that the casual references the Iliad contains to various key events (e.g., the Judgment of Paris) thus presuppose audiences, then and still earlier, that were comfortably familiar with the myth in its entirety.

But this, of course, takes us back beyond the watershed of the written word, into the final years of a centuries-old tradition of oral poetry, with its bardic singers of tales, its improvised variatio of narrative, its formulaic phrases and mnemonics, its emphasis, not only on gods and monsters, but on the great deeds of warriors long dead, its enskyment of heroic fame, kléos in Greek—the only claim that evanescent individuals could make to any kind of immortality. How far the tradition went back we can glimpse from the inscribed clay tablets that gave us the Assyrian/Sumerian epic of Gilgamesh, prince of Uruk (modern Iraq) in the mid-third millennium (ca. 2600 B.C.E.).⁶ As is well known, the Iliad, too, contains ample evidence of this long-standing oral tradition. Formulaic titles, epithets, and repetitive phrases abound. Dawn is always rosy-fingered, and Achilles swift-footed. Before a feast the heroes regularly stretch out their hands to the good things set before them, and only move on to other activities when they have satisfied their desire for food and drink. This formulaic phraseology is not as all-pervasive as has sometimes been alleged, but it is very much there, and sometimes can hint at even earlier phenomena that have been lost, but leave a ghost-like presence behind. For instance, the metre of Greek poetry depends on fixed vowel quantities, long or short, with a short vowel immediately preceding two consonants being scanned long (on all this see the section below on Translation and the Homeric Hexameter). For long it was a puzzle why certain passages in the Homeric epics seemingly didn't scan right, until the great eighteenth-century scholar Richard Bentley pointed out that in each case a word was involved, such as Agamemnōn's title of anax, that had, long before Homer's day, started with a subsequently lost consonant, the digamma, roughly equivalent to initial w-, so that anax had originally been the metrically acceptable wanax, a point triumphantly confirmed by the decipherment of the Mycenaean Linear B tablets as early Greek.

5. One nice example of this: in book 1, an old father comes seeking the return of his (living, female) child, and is rebuffed; in book 24, likewise, an old father comes seeking the return of his (male, dead) child, and his request is honored. Such balance is not uncommon and suggests a brilliant creative mind at work on the oral material, rather than a many-handed collective bardic evolution.

6. Some peoples (e.g., the Assyrians and Egyptians) had sophisticated writing long before the Greeks did. That Gilgamesh was the actual, documented, fifth king of Uruk in his dynasty is worth recalling when we are considering the historicity of the Trojan War and its characters: like Achilles, he was said to be the son of a goddess and a mortal father; he fought Humbaba, a Grendel-like monster, and made a magical journey to seek immortality and eternal youth at the world's end.

Thus in one sense the Iliad does not stand, unprecedented, at the beginning of European literature as we know it, but comes at the very end (with the appearance in Greece of alphabetic writing) of an age-old oral tradition, of which it displays the unmistakable influence throughout. But this, of course, raises further problems, none of which have as yet been definitively settled, and perhaps never can be. In particular, does the text as we have it today represent the collective effort, over the long haul, of innumerable anonymous professional bards (known in antiquity as rhapsodes), progressively shaping and refining the myth of the Trojan War; or do we have here the work of a brilliant master poet, cashing in on the huge advantage of the recent advent of alphabetical writing in the Greek world, to correlate traditional lays on a scale never before attempted? And in either case, how far, in the age of writing, may that written text, as first conceived, have been edited, modified, or interpolated before reaching its final form? Certainty, I repeat, is impossible. All I or anyone else can do is to lay out what seems the likeliest case on the evidence available, and what follows represents my own considered view of the case (I find the notion of a master poet highly persuasive). This is not the place for scholarly argument: for those who wish to pursue the enigma further the titles listed in my bibliography offer a useful starting-point.

It is worth noting, to begin with, that no commentator on Homer in antiquity, from Herodotus to Aristotle and beyond, has the slightest doubt that an individual called Homer existed, yet at the same time they make it abundantly clear that they know little or nothing about him. When all allowances have been made for the Greek literary convention that posited one early originator for practically every creation or custom, it still seems to me extremely probable that the basic reason for this certainty had everything to do then, as it still does today, with the unique quality of the two great epics themselves. To create such works, it was very reasonably assumed, required a genius quite out of the ordinary, and that meant one supremely creative individual (a few critics, in antiquity as later, the so-called chōrizontes, lengthened the odds on genius by arguing that the Iliad and Odyssey had different authors: some scholars, most notably West, still do).

In any case, for scale, dramatic intensity, and sheer overall brilliance, from the very beginning the Iliad and the Odyssey stood alone and unrivalled. Had they, as is sometimes argued, reached that point by a kind of oral evolution and crystallization (an argument, it's worth noting, advanced more often by analytical scholars than by creative artists),⁷ it is curious that not one other epic in the Cycle—not the Titanomachy, not the Cypria, not, perhaps most strikingly, the Thebaid—was ever mentioned in the same breath as Homer's two epics, or sufficiently highly prized even to survive as they have done. Nor indeed, as Aristotle noted (see above), did the epics of the Cycle have an overriding dramatic theme; rather, they were spread-out historical narratives that recorded a sequence of events, often over many years, instead of focusing on one theme in depth. While both Homer and the Cycle clearly drew on the oral tradition throughout—to what extent we shall see in the next section—the end product, in Homer's case, was something that had never been attempted before, and, it could be argued, was never to be equaled again. The reason for this, it is often (and I think correctly) alleged, is the unique opportunity presented by the second half of the eighth century B.C.E., those transitional years that witnessed the rapid spread of the new Greek alphabet, at a time when the age-old oral tradition of poetry, to which the text of the Iliad as we have it bears eloquent witness, had not yet lost its peculiar force.

Herodotus perhaps overestimated (though not by all that much) when he claimed (2.53) that Homer lived some four hundred years before his own

7. Most notably by the eighteenth-century savant Friedrich Augustus Wolf (see Biblio. s.v.), who claimed that the Homeric epics were not the work of one man but a congeries of folk ballads and folk literature, a patchwork of rhapsodes' lays (eighteen of them in the Iliad, according to Karl Lachmann in the Abhandlungen of the Berlin Academy, 1837 and 1841). Wolf argued that discrepancies of fact precluded single authorship (had he ever looked at Don Quixote?); he believed that alphabetic writing did not exist at the time of the Iliad's composition, and that oral composition on so large a scale was impossible. Time has refuted his beliefs, but his influence on Homeric studies was enormous and long-lasting.

time: the same distance, that is, as between Shakespeare's age and today. Such a date would place him ca. 840 B.C.E. What we know of the diffusion of alphabetic writing in Greece suggests that this is at least half a century too early. But I envisage this mysterious individual at some time after 800—perhaps single-handed, perhaps in collaboration with one of the new scribes—applying himself to the vast and variegated body of traditional oral narrative myth concerning the Trojan War, and seeing its untapped potential for an examination, in depth and at length, of the whole human condition: not only its tragic aspects—Aeschylus the tragedian knew what he was talking about when he claimed (Athen. 8.347e) that his plays were merely “slices from the great banquet of Homer”—but its comic or domestic moments, its political and religious contrariness, its passions, hopes, fears, and fleeting pleasures, all it meant to be mortal. I like to think that Homer may have been at some point a hostage (the meaning of homēros), and that the author of the Homeric Hymn to Pythian Apollo (169–73) may have had good reason to identify “the sweetest of singers” as “a blind man who lives on rocky Chios”; but these are personal fancies and I wouldn't go to the barricades for them.

PRESERVING THE PAST: HISTORY AND THE EPIC TRADITION

In ways the world presented by the Iliad and the Epic Cycle is one that we know today. We can visit the sites of Mykēnai (Mycenae), Pylos, and other Bronze Age kingdoms mentioned by Homer. There have been recent queries concerning the whereabouts of Odysseus's Ithákē, but we take it for granted by now that Turkish Hisarlik is almost certainly Homeric Ilion/Troy. The events of the Iliad are thus played out on a stage that still exists. This in itself must, perhaps unconsciously, predispose us to accept a tradition that has, especially over the past two centuries, occasioned as much argumentative dissension as is associated with any other work of literature known to me. Though the idea of the Trojan War as entirely a work of inventive imagination is far less widespread than it once was, the degree, and nature, of its historicity remains a highly divisive question. As before, all I can do here is to set out the evidence and present my own opinion. The scholarship is seemingly endless, with no firm and irrefutable conclusions yet discernible.

One clear fact does stand out: to the early critics of antiquity, from Herodotus through Thucydides to Aristotle, the Trojan War, however much Homer might have dramatized his version of it, was an unquestionable historical actuality. So were its participants. When Alexander the Great, at the start of his invasion of Asia, visited, and laid wreaths on, the tombs of Achilles, Aias, and Protesilaös (the first Greek ashore in the Trojan campaign, and the first casualty), he was not simply cashing in on dubious tourist attractions: he saw no reason not to accept what he was shown as the real thing. As late as the mid-third century B.C.E. we even find a chronological list, the Marmor Parium, which notes events from 1581/0 to 355/4, moving seamlessly and without distinction from “a dispute at Athens between Arēs and Poseidōn”, dated 1532/1, to Marathon, Sokratēs, and Sparta’s defeat by Thēbē (Thebes) at Leuktra in 371/0. There has been a modern tendency, especially in the late nineteenth century, to attribute a talent for inventive fantasy to Homer (and ancient authors). This is not only anachronistic but badly misunderstands the Homeric zeitgeist, which deemed memorializing the famous deeds of great men (klea andrōn) to be an essential (if almost insurmountably difficult) task, whether accomplished by family tradition, genealogies, annalistic memory, or bardic poems. This ineradicable yearning for kléos aphthiton, undying fame, not only for oneself but also for others, is, indeed, one of the most fundamental, and persistent, characteristics peculiar to humankind. Yet satisfying it had always been a risky and inefficient business. Until the arrival of alphabetic writing in Greece, oral memory had been the sole guarantee that the past would not be lost; it was only with writing that Herodotus (for example) could take the next step and not only preserve great deeds from oblivion but ask the question that Homer, too, had faced: Why did they fight each other? There was little room in this world, or indeed for long after, for creative minds inventing their own facts: the real ones were all too hard to obtain, let alone keep. It is no accident that we know only of one dramatist in Greece, Agathōn, in a single play, the Anthos, who created his own plot and characters ex nihilo; or that the novel was by a long way the latest literary form to appear in Greece, where it never got far beyond the fairy-tale romance.

What are envisaged here—and what a gifted poet, with access to the new alphabetic writing, would, at some point after 800 B.C.E., have heard, memorized, and probably have had transcribed—are a number of traditional oral lays dating back to various indeterminate points, some far back in the Bronze Age, some later, that had gone through at least five centuries of oral transmission, including an illiterate dark age for several hundred years following on the destruction of Mycenaean culture. This is exactly the scenario for which the text of the Iliad as we have it offers ample evidence throughout. In looking at this evidence, we need to remember—as Carol Thomas and Craig Conant usefully remind us—that “with the drastic lowering of material culture following the Mycenaean collapse, many of the old references would have become at first irrelevant, then anachronistic, and finally incomprehensible” (59). Fluid oral editing would in the course of time replace many key

Bronze Age allusions in all areas with those familiar to Dark Age and, later, early Archaic Age audiences. What survived, as modern scholars have come to recognize, is a confusing and seemingly random amalgam of the cultures of successive ages, including a fair sampling of those crudely persistent archaic beliefs and practices (especially in the area of religion, where they tend to be preserved as sacrosanct eternal truths) that so embarrass a society in the process of acquiring middle-class gentility, and elicit a mixture of silent suppression, euphemism, allegory, and direct censorship. The Iliad offers quite a few of these, and very interesting they are. Luckily for us, the process of moral repudiation was only just beginning when the poem took its final form, and Homer proved so popular at all levels that direct opposition was replaced by a flourishing industry in ever more fantastic allegorization.

Unlike the self-confident rationalists of the nineteenth century, we at least know today, thanks chiefly to archaeology and linguistics, that Homer's world of Achaeans and Trojans was not a mere literary fantasy, but a real Bronze Age historical actuality. From the Linear B records at Pylos, Mykēnai, Knossos and elsewhere we catch a glimpse of a palace bureaucracy at work: professional scribes dealing with the nuts and bolts of a profitable mercantile economy while peasants worked for starvation wages and the unlettered aristocracy pursued military glory on the excuse of defending the civilian population.⁸ The actual collapse of the Mycenaean kingdoms ca. 1200 B.C.E. would gain an additional explanation were it true that their warlords were all absent fighting a war against Wilusa (the Hittite name for the place the Greeks called Ilion, or Troy). We can see the flow of anachronistic elements in Homer—spears that are the wrong length and shields of the wrong type for the period to which they are assigned; the lump of pig iron given as a prize at Patroklos's funeral games (Il. 23.826–35), which, it's said, will last five years for plowshares—which might have been awarded in Homer's own day, but not centuries earlier—as the natural additions made by rhapsodes to bring their tales into line with what a changing audience knew or expected. This kind of thing, worrying perhaps for those seeking Bronze Age authenticity throughout, is exactly what we should expect centuries of oral tradition to accumulate, and no more bothersome than Shakespeare's attribution of clocks to ancient Romans, or the way Quattrocento painters (and others) costume all their ancient figures in contemporary dress.

8. Surprisingly, some scholars have taken the administrative system revealed by the Linear B tablets as being socially incompatible with the Homeric world of stronghold-based military fiefdoms, and therefore a proof of the latter's unreality. In fact, of course, the world they reveal is exactly parallel to that of mediaeval feudalism, where, similarly, unlettered knights ruled, serfs toiled, and a clerical bureaucracy took care of business. These social distinctions survived: for a well-born warmonger to dirty his hands with trade long remained a class-based taboo in classical Greece.

Thus though modern research has confirmed the existence in the Bronze Age of a world in which Homeric society might have existed, and of long-forgotten warfare around the area of Troy—even of a historical figure, Alaksandu of Wilusa, who may well be identifiable with [Paris] Aléxandros of (W)Ilion⁹—we, not surprisingly considering its genesis, have no more reason than did those nineteenth-century rationalists for connecting the specific conflict described in the Iliad with any war or battle revealed in, say, the Hittite royal correspondence with the rulers of Ahhiya or Ahhiyawa, a major power now identified, again with a fair degree of certainty, as Achaia, and located in mainland Greece. As we might expect, the rhapsodes looked back to a real world, an actual society, and sought to preserve the kléos, the fame and glory, of these Achaian (or Argive, or Danaän) dynastic warlords who led it. But unless by rare accident, we are no more likely today than those nineteenth-century rationalists were to glean historical facts from what emerged from some five centuries of oral transmission and was then used by Homer and committed to writing.¹⁰

Nevertheless, the text of the Iliad that has come down to us is a wonderful compendium of cultural evidence from all periods of its evolution. Like flies embalmed in amber, details illustrative of past beliefs and practices abound: the transitional period between the collapse of the Bronze Age kingdoms around 1200 and the emergence of early city-state (polis) society after the appearance of the new Greek alphabet is especially rewarding. The evidence goes back long before the putative date of the Trojan War: things like Odysseus's boar-tusk helmet and the great, tower-like shield of Aias were obsolete by the fifteenth century B.C.E. Moreover, frescoes datable to ca. 1700 B.C.E. that have been excavated on Thera (Santorini), and were preserved, like Pompeii, by a gigantic volcanic eruption that buried them, could, eerily, be illustrations for the two cities in the Iliad, one at war, the other peaceful (18.490–540), depicted on the shield made by Hēphaistos for Achilles. Conversely, a good deal of the military equipment and fighting technique in the Iliad

9. The first Trojan victim, killed by Achilles, is Kyknos (listed in the Cypria: for his supposed prior invulnerability; see Gantz 594). As Strauss (65) points out, his name bears an interesting resemblance to that of a king of Wilusa before Alaksandu, Kukkunni.

10. At Il. 16.702–3, for instance, Patroklos is able to scale the angle of Troy's battlements, and excavation has revealed at least one point at which the tilt of the batter wall and the space between the stones would have made this feasible.

belongs to Homer's own day rather than to the Bronze Age, and the use of chariots in battle has largely been forgotten (in Homer they are mostly used to transport their owners to and from the battlefield). But one aspect of Homeric usage is notably accurate: emphatically throughout, weapons are not iron but bronze, and most often simply named by the noun (e.g., 3.292, "the pitiless bronze"), without any cutting or stabbing referent (e.g., knife, spearhead).

More interesting still are the social implications detectable in the text. There are a number of words and phrases indicative of a period before physical actuality was extrapolated into generalized abstractions: thymos, psyche and kêr notable amongst them. Normally the equivalent, respectively, of "spirit", "soul", and "fate", these terms still carry for Homer the physical connotations of "vapor", "breath", and "death-agent".¹¹ The regular phrase "winged words", which has occasioned much literary debate about its metaphorical significance, is in fact simply another instance of this prehistoric habit of mind: speech was thought of as physical matter, projected through the mouth.¹² Another formulaic phrase, "what's this talk that's escaped the barrier of your teeth" (e.g., at 4.350), makes this very clear.

At the other end of the scale, the social upheavals engendered during the poverty-stricken centuries immediately after the general collapse of the aristocratic Mycenaean dynasties similarly left their unmistakable transitional imprint on the oral epic handed down to Homer. The rabble-rouser Thersites (2.211–77) is the most obvious example of radical hostility to what survives of the ancien régime and its status-based leadership; but he is far from an isolated phenomenon. At the conclusion of Book 9 both Odysseus and Diomedês express angry irritation at Achilles' obstinate pursuit of his personal code of honor to the immediate detriment of a war which, fought the old-fashioned way, has already dragged on for over nine years. Book 10 (whether a late insertion or not) shows the two of them giving a nocturnal demonstration of how to win that war, by ruthlessly abandoning not only the traditional formalities of military engagement, but also any scruples about honor.¹³ During their night raid they capture a Trojan spy, scare him

11. The locus classicus for discussion of this phenomenon is Onians.

12. In his famous travel book Mani Patrick Leigh Fermor demonstrates a remarkable affinity for this kind of sensory impression: "I often have the impression, listening to a Greek argument, that I can actually see the words spin from their mouths . . . the perverse triple loop of Xi, the twin concavity of Omega, the bisected almond of Theta, Phi like a circle transfixed by a spear, Psi's curly trident and Gamma's two-pronged fork . . ." (Leigh Fermor 336).

13. Strauss (139–40) similarly points out how the Trojans, too, could have improved their chances by taking to guerilla warfare, and how such a move was hampered by Hektôr likewise being "addicted to a heroic illusion of a decisive victory."

into telling all he knows, and then kill him, despite his offer of ransom. They then, acting on his information, descend on the newly arrived Thracians, murder their king Rhēsos and his chief officers in their sleep, and return to camp with Rhēsos's famous white horses. Ironically, it has been during Achilles' speech finally rejecting the appeal for his return to the fighting that he admits (9.312–45) that he, too, is beginning to have doubts about the efficacy of the whole code of military honor on which he was brought up. Yet in many ways that code survives, most notably as outlined by Sarpēdōn and Glaukos (12.310–28). On the battlefield (6.215–36), Glaukos and Diomēdēs find they are bound by ties of guest-friendship, and they not only renounce fighting each other, but exchange armor; Hektōr and Aias, after a formal dual, similarly exchange gifts (7.287–314).

Breeding and ancestry still count for a very great deal, and the archer is still despised in comparison to the hand-to-hand warrior. But the most remarkable testimony—and undoubtedly the most disconcerting for anyone coming to Homer for the first time—has to be that concerning religious life and the gods.¹⁴ The deities in the Iliad have nothing moral about them (as later Greek critics from Xenophanes through Plato to Longinus were the first to complain). They behave, in fact, like members of a large, unruly, and privileged patriarchal family, distinguished from their mortal opposite numbers only in the special powers given them by their immortality. They quarrel, intrigue, are spiteful, bear grudges against one another, and are deeply involved, for the lowest of motives, and seldom on the same side, with the human participants in the Trojan War, even going so far, on occasion, as to participate in the fighting. Since they can ignore, and at times contravene, the forces of nature, their wounds are instantly healable, while their influence on the outcome of the conflict can be huge. Patroklos (16.786–806) and Hektōr (22.273–305) are both fatally weakened, in the first instance, by the malign attentions of a god, which make them easy prey to an attacker. The to-and-fro ebb and surge of battle is regularly determined by Zeus, who can be, and is, influenced one way or the other by both sides' divine backers, but in the last resort has his own plan, as we have seen, for the entire war (to reduce excess population by encouraging general slaughter). The only curb on all this, itself uncertain, is the fixed pattern of an individual's fate, and even here Zeus several times at least claims to consider overriding what's fated, omnipotence and predestination in uneasy conflict.

14. At the most basic level, in the Iliad Trojans and Achaians apparently not only speak the same language (in fact, Trojans probably spoke Luwian), but share the same pantheon of divinities: students I taught sometimes looked at the war in the Iliad as a conflict akin to the American Civil War of 1860–65.

Nothing more clearly reveals the survival through oral tradition, into Homer's own day and beyond, of an age-old, bleakly realistic concept of divinity. While highly anthropomorphized—the world of the Olympians comes across in the Iliad as a kind of unpredictable, and thus terrifying, parallel universe—these gods are dangerous powers, unknowable, not to be crossed, and amoral in their attitudes. By the sixth century B.C.E., precisely because of Homer's huge popularity and influence, they already aroused strong social objections, as we have seen. The gods' traditional mean pettiness of motive, so integral to the original tale of Troy, clearly bothered Homer himself. There is something splendid about the idea of a war to recover an adulterous queen; but behind this lurk Zeus's plan to start such a war in order to reduce population, and the cases of spiteful divine resentment induced, variously, in Hērē and Athēnē by the Judgment of Paris, and in Poseidōn by the cheating habits of Laomedōn,¹⁵ all of which—the Judgment in particular—are barely mentioned in the Iliad, where evolutionary censorship is already evident.¹⁶ Early Greek myth abounded in human sacrifice, but—with the notable exception of twelve Trojan youths sacrificed at Patroklos's funeral (23.175–76)—the Iliad avoids direct mention of the practice: even the ritual killing of Iphigeneia at Aulis, a crucial element in the narrative of the Trojan War, gets only one dubious hint, at 1.106–8, when Agamemnōn upbraids Kalchas the seer (who had pronounced the sacrifice necessary) for always being a prophet of doom. There is also the matter of poisoned arrows, habitually used in early myth, presumably in fact and obviously in an earlier version of 4.148–219: what else, originally, would have led Agamemnōn to fear that a mere glancing hit from Pandaros's arrow might kill his brother Menelaos? Why else should Machaon the healer have sucked blood from the scrape? As for Zeus's hesitancy about challenging fate (e.g., over the death of his mortal son Sarpēdōn, at 16.431–57), this too was in tune with the times: divine omnipotence versus predestination was yet another emergent theological problem that was to be argued for centuries.

For modern readers perhaps the most awkward thing about the Olympian pantheon in the Iliad is their uncertain transitional status—like some of the poem's archaic terminology—between the physical and the metaphorical. Olympus is both a very real Greek mountain and the celestial home of the gods, but I very much doubt whether in Homer's day anyone would have expected to find the latter at the top of the former. Similarly with encounters between gods and mortals: oral tradition reveals a past 15. Apollo throughout the Iliad is aggressively pro-Trojan, without any reason given.

16. On what follows the locus classicus is G. Murray 129–32.

when this was clearly a commonplace,¹⁷ but by Homer's day such meetings seem, at best, like externalizations of inner impulses (cf. Athēnē, invisible, curbing Achilles' urge to kill Agamemnōn, 1.188–222), and at their awkward worst, when the gods—and goddesses—join in the fighting (e.g., 21.382–518), grotesquely comic. Yet here, too, there are terrifying moments, none worse than the way that Apollo in his invincible, and invisible, power disables Patroklos, slamming him from behind with the flat of one hand, leaving him a stunned and helpless victim, to be finished off by Euphorbos and Hektōr (16.786–92). This is the world that Shakespeare's Lear knew: "As flies to wanton boys, are we to the gods; they kill us for their sport."

TRANSLATION AND THE HOMERIC HEXAMETER

It is over half a century now since Richmond Lattimore first published his deservedly famous, and ground-breaking, translation of the Iliad.¹⁸ What made his version truly different from its innumerable predecessors was his determination to get as close as possible, in every respect—metre, rhythm, formulaic phrases, style, and vocabulary, as well as the rapidity, plainness of thought, directness of expression and nobility of concept emphasized by Matthew Arnold in his lectures On Translating Homer—to the original Homeric Greek. The stimulus for such an English Iliad was, of course, the vast expansion of American university education in the humanities, largely fostered by the GI Bill in the years immediately following World War II; and what it sought to do was to give a totally Greekless readership the closest possible idea of what Homer had been about, metrically, linguistically, and in literary terms. My own version, a generation later, has the same objectives in view, with another one added: the determination, when dealing with a poem so oral in its essence, that what I have written should be naturally declaimable.

At first sight what Lattimore was attempting did not seem innovative: ever since the Renaissance there had been an ongoing battle between modernist and Hellenizing translators, with the modernists generally winning.

17. In his remarkable (and unprovable) exercise in speculation, The Origins of Consciousness in the Breakdown of the Bicameral Mind (Boston, 1977), Julian Jaynes pinpoints Mesopotamia in the third millennium B.C.E. as the point at which communication between gods and mortals via the right hemisphere of the brain began to break down. It was a slow process: Sappho, the seventh century lyric poet from Lesbos, for one, still seems to communicate freely and comfortably with Aphrodītē.

18. Some of what follows here has been adapted from my review-article "Homer Now", published in The New Republic 243, no. 10 (June 28, 2012): 36–41, and is used by kind permission.

The essential modernist principle was famously expressed by Dryden, who declared of his version, in relation to the original author's work, that "my own is of a piece with his, and that if he were living, and an Englishman, they are such as he would probably have written" (emphasis mine).¹⁹ This formula at once licensed any Anglicization, however inappropriate. It might have been thought that the Hellenizers, whose aim was the preservation of the original characteristics of the Greek, would suit a Greekless audience better; the trouble was that they, like the modernists, assumed, sometimes unconsciously, an audience that could still read the original Greek, and thus would be capable of making informed comparisons between text and translation. What Lattimore saw, very clearly, was that communicating the ultra-foreign essence, at every level, of Homer to minds that were virtually tabula rasa where any but English poetry was concerned called for a quite new fidelity—rhythmical and rhetorical no less than idiomatic—to the alien original, together with a comparable avoidance of all those comfortingly familiar, yet wildly misleading, fallbacks (blank verse being the most obvious, and the most misleading) that had served translators so well in the past.

Of all the essential features in this new type of translation—retention of formulaic phrases, syntactical empathy, avoidance of factitious pseudo-similarity to familiar English landmarks—the most difficult by far to achieve has always been an acceptable equivalent to Homer's metrical line, the epic hexameter. At the heart of the matter lies a fundamental difference between Greek and English poetics. In Greek (and Latin) verse, all vowels have a fixed quantity, either long or short. Short quantities can be lengthened by position, that is, by being placed before two or more consonants, which gives a poet more scope; but every metre is determined by an arrangement of vowel quantities. The power of a line is determined by the contrapuntal play of natural stress (ictus) against this rigid metrical pattern. In English, on the contrary, vowels have no fixed given length (though diphthongs and naturally long or duplicated vowels—think "chain", "groin", "fame", "teeth", "dice", "home", "dune"—to some extent can be made to follow the classical rule), and in the last resort are stressed solely by the natural syllabic emphases given to any sentence. In the strict sense, English doesn't have metres at all.

In Homer's case the situation is made still more difficult by the fact that the prevalent unit of emphasis ("foot") in the epic hexameter is the dactyl (– ∪ ∪), one long syllable followed by two shorts, dah-didi. This six-foot line can be set out as follows:— ∪ ∪ | — ∪ ∪ | — || ∪ ∪ | — || ∪ ∪ | — ∪ ∪ | — ∪. Any dactyl (i.e., any of the first five feet, though a resolved fifth foot is rare) is resolvable into one long, dah-dah, forming a spondee (—). The sixth foot is an abbreviated (catalectic) dactyl, shorn of its last syllable (— ∪). It too can be a spondee (—). The hexameter has a natural mid-break, against the metre, most commonly in the third or fourth foot, as marked (||). To illustrate this line in English, here is a Victorian rendering of Iliad 1.44, by C. S. Calverley: “Dark was the | soul of the | god || as he | moved from the | heights of O|lympos.” Calverley, a good classicist, knew very well that dactylo-spondaic rhythm runs flat contrary to natural English rhythm, which is essentially iambic (∪—) or, in lighter moods, anapestic (∪ ∪ —), and forms the building blocks of the blank verse line, employed by Milton in Paradise Lost, and by the vast majority of would-be translators of Homer, even though that about halves the speed of the hexameter, and has totally alien associations to it (translators like Pope compounded this error by choosing the tightly rhymed heroic couplet, since rhyming was unknown to Homer).

19. Preface on translation prefixed to the Second Miscellany (1685), reprinted in The Works of John Dryden, ed. G. Saintsbury (Edinburgh, 1885), 12: 281–82.

Iambs naturally climb uphill, while dactyls are on the gallop: listen to the onomatopoeia Homer works into a line (Od. 11.598) describing the rock of Sisyphos obstinately rolling and bouncing down to the plain again: Autis epeita pedonde kulindeto láas anaidēs.

The combination of alien rhythm and absence of stress/metre counterpoint has always made any sustained attempt at an English stress hexameter a lost cause, not least because the English stress pattern tends both to avoid spondaic resolved feet and to coincide exactly with the metrical schema. Calverley, who understood the problem better than most, sensibly gave up when less than halfway through Book 1 of the Iliad. Others persisted. H. B. Cotterill's Odyssey is typical, its flat dactylic rhythms boringly soporific (Od. 6.85–89):

Now when at last they arrived at the beautiful stream of the river
 Here the perennial basins they found where water abundant Welled up brightly enough for the cleansing of dirtiest raiment
 So their mules they unloosened from under the yoke of the wagon, Letting them wander at will on the bank of the eddying river.

The problem was a daunting one, and compounded by the fact that most translators, who couldn't care less about the needs of a Greekless general audience, never saw it as a problem at all.

What is still by far the best solution, though by no means a perfect one, was hit on by C. Day Lewis in 1940, when translating Vergil's Georgics, and later developed in his version of the Aeneid (1952). By a real stroke of luck, this translation was commissioned for broadcasting by the BBC, which meant that it was, precisely, aimed at a nonclassical general public that would,

in the first instance, hear rather than read it. It therefore had perforce to be, like its original, declaimable, a quality sadly to seek in most previous versions, but fundamental to all ancient epic. This meant, among other things, capturing something of Vergil's verbal structures and linear rhetoric, which, in turn, demanded a line-by-line adherence to the original text. Thus two crucial necessities were imposed on Day Lewis from the start, and they in turn made him face the dilemma of the English hexameter, one problem of which had always, allegedly, been that it was unmanageably long.²⁰ What Day Lewis evolved was a variable 6/5 stress line, ranging from 12 to 17 syllables, and (though he did not claim this) largely dactylo-spondaic in its emphases.

The result made for far less boring rhythms, and even for a certain verbal springiness. Amusingly, Day Lewis's declared intention in varying the line's length had been to remove the need, in translation, to either pad or omit, as occasion required:²¹ what he created was in fact the nearest thing to a truly contrapuntal stress hexameter we're ever likely to achieve. Lattimore, who had clearly seen the potential of such a line in Day Lewis's Georgics, used it for his Iliad (1951), and I explored its potential further in my version of Apollonius Rhodios's Argonautika (1997). While taking advantage of its variable length while translating the Iliad—as indeed of English natural rhythms, which allowed, very often, for a short syllable before an initial dactyl (which a strict hexameter wouldn't), quietly converting it to u u—that is, an anapest—I was surprised by how often, in fact, the line wrote itself either as a true hexameter or with one syllable short (catalectic) in the final foot:

The assembly then broke up. The troops now scattered, each man off to his own swift ship, their minds on the evening meal and the joy of a full night's sleep. But Achilles wept and wept, thinking of his dear comrade, so that sleep the all-subduing got no hold on him: he kept tossing this way and that,
missing Patroklos—his manhood, his splendid strength, all he'd been through with him, the hardships he'd suffered, facing men in battle and the waves of the cruel sea. (24.1–8)

Controlling the hexameter is, in fact, the key to producing a version of Homer that gives one's nonclassical audience some sense of the Iliad as a whole poem, and I'm lucky in having had a lifetime of preliminary practice before I finally tackled it.

20. In fact it was not as long as the clumsy (and rhymed) "fourteener" employed to translate the Iliad (1598–1611) by the Elizabethan scholar George Chapman, who has always had a good press from literary critics.

21. See his remarks in The Aeneid of Virgil (Garden City, NY, 1953), 8–9.

LAST THOUGHTS

This translation, then, aims to introduce Homer's Iliad, as far as possible without familiar distracting comparisons or personal additions, to an audience that in essence knows nothing about the poem, its antecedents, or the circumstances of its creation. As far as possible I have done nothing to remove those features—not so many as might be supposed—that are often alleged to militate against modern acceptance. The leading characters, and other entities, all retain their repetitive personal epithets. A reader or listener very soon acclimatizes to these, and comes to appreciate the subtly ironic way in which they are often employed. The formulaic oral phraseology governing familiar activities like eating and drinking is no odder than the da capo repetition of a dominant theme in, say, a string quartet;²² and Homer's own subtle sentence-structure and linear rhetoric are at least as effective as the way translators have chopped and changed his language to make it sound more comfortably like words written by an English poet.

It is true that sometimes—very seldom, in fact—a point can be reached where, through false associations, close adherence to an idiomatic preference risks sounding ridiculous rather than simply strange or alien,²³ and in such cases I have modified the original, generally with an explanatory note. But for the most part, these men and women created long millennia ago (not to mention their heavily anthropomorphized deities) combine a wholly alien background and ethos with all-too-familiar habits that are endearing or alarming according to circumstance: filial and marital devotion, status-conscious pride and arrogance, ancient long-windedness, the confusion of honor and narcissism, the traumatic effects of overexposure to military combat, obstinacy and recklessness, passion and despair. It is the universalism captured by this extraordinary epic poem that gives it its unparalleled staying power. If its gods offer a disconcerting parallel universe, its extraordinary range of similes continually remind us, in their emphasis on the natural world and an agricultural community about its peaceful business in that

22. Indeed, a similar argument, and comparison, could be made in justification of yet another translation of the Iliad: would anyone ever raise serious objections to one more interpretation of J. S. Bach's six unaccompanied suites for cello?

23. A nice instance is the Homeric use (paralleled in Latin) of the human head as a summation, personal no less than physical, of the individual: most famous from the Underworld in the Odyssey as the "strengthless heads of the dead" (e.g., at 10.521). At 8.281 Agamemnon greets Teukros, literally, as "Teukros, dear head": other translators have changed this to "dear heart", and, with some misgivings, so do I. On the other hand at 11.55, Zeus sends down bloody rain as "a sign of all the brave heads he'd soon dispatch to Hades", and here I've kept the original: the grey area between alien and ridiculous is exceedingly narrow.

world, of the exorbitant price that its aristocracy forces that community to pay in its pursuit of retribution and, even more insidiously because so often unprovoked, of everlasting fame.

As Richard Martin points out, in a penetrating discussion in his Introduction to Lattimore's Iliad, this is a work that, above all, provokes questions with uncertain answers:

Is the Iliad a celebration of heroism or an interrogation of its basic—potentially flawed—assumptions? Whom should we emulate, if anyone, in this somber depiction of men and women under extreme conditions? Is it an elegy for a lost golden age, when people lived more out-sized and exciting lives? Or is it a warning about the catastrophes such lives engender? Is it a poem meant to shore up the ideological underpinnings of a fading aristocracy of self-centered warlords? Or does it capture the first glimmerings of a communal consciousness of the type that emerged in increasingly democratic (or at least nonelite) institutions within the city-state?²⁴

For me, the poem's greatness is evident in the fact that it is at one and the same time all of these things, and not only because it is the product of a culture in rapid transition between the oral and the written, between historical myth and history, between the memory of the old Mycenaean aristocratic warrior-kings (whose proud and enigmatic gold funeral masks still survive) and the emerging soldier-farmers of the city-state and the hoplite phalanx. The Iliad's extraordinary humanity can contain them all, virtues and vices alike. We understand what instincts drive the heroic Achilles, but Thersites the radical demagogue gets his moment, too. That is why, as Martin reminds us, our "experience of the Iliad also becomes one of self-exploration and self-definition." In our less ambitious way we are like Aeschylus, feeding at Homer's great banquet, each generation finding what best answers to its needs.

One last word. It will be noticed that I have made virtually no attempt to dictate the literary terms in which anyone new to the Iliad should seek to appreciate it as a poem. This is partly because, just as no two historians can fully agree on the poem's genesis, so no two critics are in complete concordance when delineating its literary qualities. But first and foremost, it is because a lifetime devoted to teaching of one sort or another has shown me that initial impressions are crucial, and that if these are imposed externally, they can never be shaken off. First-time readers of the Iliad should be allowed to establish their own personal impression of it before listening to the competing chorus of professionals, who are all too ready to shape their opinions for them. My bibliography offers a way into this noisy marketplace. Take my advice and don't consult the market until you've familiarized yourself with the great poem itself, preferably on more than one reading.

24. Lattimore 52–53.

Book 1

Wrath, goddess, sing of Achilles Pēleus's son's calamitous wrath, which hit the Achaïans with countless ills—many the valiant souls it saw off down to Hādēs, souls of heroes, their selves¹ left as carrion for dogs and all birds of prey, and the plan of Zeus was fulfilled²— 5 from the first moment those two men parted in fury, Atreus's son, king of men, and the godlike Achilles.

Which of the gods was it brought them into contention?
Lētō's and Zeus's son:³ for he, enraged by the king, spread a foul plague through the army, and men were dying, 10 all because Chrysēs his priest had been dishonored by Atreus's son. Chrysēs came to the Achaïans' swift ships to win his daughter's release, bringing ransom past counting, in his hands the laurel wreaths of the deadly archer Apollo on a golden staff, and made his plea to all the Achaïans, 15 but first to the two sons of Atreus, the host's field marshals:

“Atreus's sons, and you other well-greaved Achaeans, may the gods who have their homes on Olympos grant you to sack Priam's city, and win a safe homecoming!
But release my dear daughter, accept the ransom I offer, 20 show respect for Zeus's son, Apollo, the deadly archer.”

Then all the other Achaïans spoke up in agreement—to respect the priest, to accept his splendid ransom.
Yet Atreus's son Agamemnōn's angry heart remained untouched.

-
1. The word “selves” (Greek αὐτοῦς, autous) strikingly emphasizes the epic's intense preference for this mortal physical existence over any vague insubstantial afterlife. The physical body is the real them. This is what Achilles has in mind when he famously says in Hādēs (Od. 11.88–91) that he'd rather be a hireling and alive than king of the dead.
 2. Here, probably, Zeus's agreement to the prayer of Thetis (see 1.503–30) to recompense her son Achilles for Agamemnōn's insulting treatment of him (the main subject of book 1) by giving the advantage in the war to the Trojans until such time as the Achaïans should make him adequate amends.
 3. Lētō's and Zeus's son: Apollo.

Brusquely he turned him away with words of harsh dismissal: 25 “Don’t let me find you still here, old man, by the hollow ships, either loitering now or making your way back later, lest your staff and the god’s wreath afford you no protection!
 Her I shall not release—no, sooner will old age reach her in our house, in Argos, far away from her native country, 30 working to and fro at the loom and sharing my bed. Now go—and do not provoke me, if you want to depart in safety.”

So he spoke: the old man was scared and obeyed his words.
 Silent along the shore of the thunderous sea he went;
 but once well away, long and deeply the old man prayed 35 to Apollo his lord, the child of fair-haired Lētō: “Hear me, you of the silver bow, protector of Chrysē and holy Killa, who rule with might over Tenedos—Smintheus,⁴ if ever for you I roofed a pleasing precinct, if ever I burned for you the fat-rich thighbones 40 of bulls or goats, now grant me this my desire:
 use your arrows to make the Danaäns pay for my tears.”

Thus he spoke in prayer, and Phoibos Apollo heard him.
 Down from the peaks of Olympos he hastened, enraged at heart, carrying on his shoulders his bow and lidded quiver, 45 arrows rattling loud on his shoulders as in his rage he strode on his way: he came as nightfall comes.
 Away from the ships he sat, and let fly an arrow: fearful the twang of his silver bow. To begin with it was the mules he aimed at, and the swift dogs; but later 50 he made the troops the targets of his sharp shafts and struck: day in, day out the clustering corpse fires flared.

Nine days throughout the army the god’s shafts sped: on the tenth Achilles summoned the troops to the place of assembly, for white-armed Hērē, the goddess, had put this in his mind 55 since she pitied the Danaäns as she saw them dying.
 So when they had gathered and were all assembled together, swift-footed Achilles stood up and spoke among them:
 “Son of Atreus, I think we shall now be driven into retreat

4. Smintheus: an uncertain epithet, but most probably “mouse-god”, as protector against rodents (for which there is evidence): the uncertainty is largely due to Hellenistic scholars who thought this something “inappropriate” to the dignity of epic poetry.

and forced back home, even should we escape with our lives, 60 if indeed war and plague together are to crush the Achaians!
 Come, then, let us find and question some priest or diviner, or even a reader of dreams, since a dream too is from Zeus, who might explain to us Phoibos Apollo's deep anger—
 Is it a missed vow that riles him? Were some oxen not sacrificed?— 65 Maybe, catching the savor of lambs and unblemished goats, he'll be willing to give us relief, call off this onslaught."

This said, he sat down, and there next stood up among them Kalchas, Thestōr's son, of the seers by far the finest:
 he knew events present and future as well as from the past, 70 and had brought the Achaians' fleet safe to landfall by Ilion through the diviner's art he had from Phoibos Apollo.
 He, with friendly intent, now spoke before the assembly:
 "Ah, Achilles, dear to Zeus, you bid me explain the reason for the wrath of my lord Apollo, the deadly archer. 75 Then tell you I shall. But you must agree, and swear, to be my willing protector with word and with hand, since I think I shall anger a man who holds powerful rule over the Argives, to whom the Achaians owe allegiance.
 For a king has the upper hand when enraged by a commoner, 80 since though he may swallow his wrath that day, yet he still nurses resentment thereafter, in his heart of hearts, until he fulfils it. Tell me then: will you protect me?"
 Then swift-footed Achilles spoke to him thus in answer:
 "Have no fear, reveal any oracle that you know of, 85 for—by Apollo dear to Zeus, to whom you, Kalchas, pray when you make plain his oracles to the Danaäns—no man, while I still live and have sight upon this earth, shall lay heavy hands on you beside the hollow ships, of all the Danaäns, not even if it's Agamemnōn you mean, 90 who claims to be far the noblest of all the Achaians."

At this the blameless diviner was emboldened, and spoke out:
 "It's for no missed vow or rich sacrifice that he faults us, but because of the priest whom Agamemnōn dishonored, refusing to free his daughter, to accept ransom for her: hence 95 those griefs that the deadly archer's inflicted, and will inflict:
 No way will he free the Danaäns from this loathsome havoc until we give back to her father the quick-eyed girl, unbought, unransomed, and take to Chrysē a rich holy sacrifice:

this is the only way we might appease and persuade him.” 100

This said, he sat down again, and there stood up among them Atreus’s heroic son, wide-ruling Agamemnōn, bitterly troubled, his black heart brimming over with rage, while his eyes had the semblance of blazing fire.
Kalchas he first addressed, with a look of hatred: 105 “Prophet of doom, not once have you told me anything pleasing—what’s always dear to your heart is to prophesy disaster:
nothing good have you ever foretold or brought to pass!⁵ Now here you come peddling your claims to the Danaān assembly, alleging the deadly archer has laid these griefs upon them 110 because I was unwilling to accept a bounteous ransom for this girl, Chrysēs’ daughter, since I’d rather keep her with me at home. Indeed, I prefer her to Klytaimnēstra, my wedded wife, whose equal she is in all ways, being as good-looking, as tall, as clever, as accomplished. 115
Yet even so I’ll return her, if that should be best:
I want to have my troops safe, not facing destruction!
But you must find me a prize, at once, so I’m not the only Argive left prizeless. That would not be seemly—for you see this, all of you, that my prize is going elsewhere.” 120

Then to him replied swift-footed godlike Achilles: “Most glorious son of Atreus, of all men the most covetous, how can the great-hearted Achaians produce you a prize?
We know of no common stock of goods in store—what we took when we sacked the cities has been shared out, 125 and to recall it now from the men would be most improper.
You must give up this girl to the god, and we, the Achaians, will repay you threefold and fourfold, if Zeus ever grants that we storm and sack the strong-walled citadel of Troy.”

5. Some have seen here a veiled reference to Kalchas’s announcement at Aulis that in order to procure a favorable sailing wind to Troy, the wrath of Artemis at Agamemnōn for some slight against her could only be purged by the human sacrifice of Agamemnōn’s daughter Iphigeneia—which was duly carried out. The wind then changed, and the fleet sailed. Homer makes no direct mention of the incident, and it was argued in antiquity, improbably, that he did not know the tradition. See also n. 4 to 9.287.

Answering him then lord Agamemnōn declared: 130 “Fine warrior you may be, godlike Achilles, but don’t play tricks on me: you’ll not outwit or persuade me.
 Do you plan to keep your own prize, but leave me sitting here without one, since you tell me to give the girl back again?
 Either I get a new prize from the great-hearted Achaians— 135 chosen to satisfy me, something of equal value—or, if they give me nothing, I shall come in person and take your prize, or Aias’s, or carry off that of Odysseus, and he’ll have cause for resentment, the man I come to!
 These matters, though, we can deal with at a later time. 140
 For now, let us haul down a black ship to the bright sea, and assemble a crew of oarsmen, place oxen on board for sacrifice, together with Chrysēs’ fair-cheeked daughter herself; and let one man, a counsellor, go as captain—Aias, or Idomeneus, or noble Odysseus, 145
 Or you, son of Pēleus, of all men the most fearsome, to make sacrifice for the appeasement of the deadly archer.”

Eyeing him angrily, swift-footed Achilles declared:
 “You clotheshorse for shamelessness, mind obsessed with profit, how could any Achaian be prompt to obey your orders 150 to march to war or with might face men in battle?
 I did not come here on account of Troy’s spearmen: why should I fight them? In no way have they ever wronged me.
 Never have they driven off my cattle or my horses;
 Never in rich-soiled Phthië, the nurse of heroes, did they 155 lay waste the harvest, since great distance lies between us—shadowy mountains and echoing sea. But you, you shameless hulk, we accompanied here for your pleasure, to win honor for Menelaös and for you, you dog-face, from the Trojans. But none of these things you heed or care for— 160
 and now you even threaten to rob me of the prize to get which I suffered much, and the Achaians’ sons gave it me.
 Never do I rate a prize to match yours when the Achaians lay waste some populous citadel of the Trojans, though mine are the hands that bear the brunt of furious battle; 165 and when the time comes for sharing, then your prize is by far the greater, while I, with some smaller thing for my share, trudge back to the ships, still combat-weary.

 But now I'm returning to Phthië: that's better by far, going home with my curved vessels. I'm not minded 170 to stay here without honor, amassing you wealth and plenty."

Then the lord of men, Agamemnōn, made answer to him:
 "Run away, if your heart so bids you. Far be it from me to beg you to stay here for my sake. With me are many others who will treat me with honor—Zeus the Counsellor above all. 175 Most hateful you are to me of Zeus's royal nurslings:
 quarrels are what you love most, and wars and battles.
 That great strength of yours, I'd guess, was some god's gift.
 Take off homeward now with your ships and your comrades, lord it over the Myrmidons—for you I care nothing, 180
 I take no heed of your anger. And this is my threat to you:
 Since Chryseïs is taken from me by Phoibos Apollo, her, with a ship of my own and my own companions,
 I shall send back—but the fair-cheeked Briseïs, your prize, I'll come to your hut myself, and take, that you may know well 185 how much stronger I am than you—and that others may fear to address me as an equal, to confront me face to face."

So he spoke, and pain seized Pēleus's son, the heart in his shaggy breast was divided, torn this way and that:
 should he draw the sharp sword from beside his thigh, 190 break up the crowd, and kill the son of Atreus, or swallow his bitter gall, restrain his passion?
 While he still was debating this in mind and spirit, his great sword half-drawn from its scabbard, Athēnē came down from the heavens, dispatched by the white-armed goddess Hērē, 195 who loved and cared for them both alike in her heart.

 Standing behind him, she grasped Pēleus's son's fair hair—appearing to him alone: of the others no one saw her—and Achilles turned round in amazement, instantly recognized Pallas Athēnē, the terrible radiance of her eyes, 200 and uttering winged words, he thus addressed her:
 "Why have you come this time, child of Zeus the aegis-bearer?
 To witness the arrogant gall of Atreus's son Agamemnōn?
 For this I will tell you, and I think it will come about:
 Through his insolent conduct he may well soon lose his life." 205

To him then spoke in answer the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē: “I have come here to check your rage—if you’ll listen to me—down from high heaven, sent by the goddess, white-armed Hērē, who loves and cares for you both alike in her heart.
 Come now, leave off your strife, take your hand from your sword: 210 abuse him with words alone regarding what will happen, for thus I declare, and it will certainly come about:
 one day three times as many fine gifts will be offered you on account of this insult. So restrain yourself, and obey us.”

Then in answer to her swift-footed Achilles declared: 215 “Needs must, goddess, respect the words of you both, however angry at heart one may be. It is better so—and those who comply with the gods are listened to in return.”
 With that, on the silver hilt he set his heavy hand, thrust the great sword back in its scabbard, nor disregarded 220 Athēnē’s words; but she had already left for Olympus, home of Zeus of the aegis, to rejoin the other gods.

So Pēleus’s son once again with words of strong contempt addressed the son of Atreus, his anger not yet ended: “You wine-sodden wretch, dog-faced, deer-hearted, not once 225 have you dared to arm yourself for battle with your troops, or joined in an ambush with the Achaian chieftains!
 Oh no, such things spell death to you. Better by far to range here through the broad camp of the Achaians and take back the gifts of whoever speaks out against you! 230
 A king that feeds off his commons, who rules mere nonentities!
 Otherwise, son of Atreus, this new outrage would be your last.
 This, though, I will tell you, and swear a great oath besides:
 By this staff—which never again will put out leaves or shoots since the day it first left its tree stump in the mountains, 235 nor will it flourish afresh, since the bronze has stripped it of leaves and bark, and now those sons of the Achaians who render judgments, who safeguard the ordinances of Zeus, carry it in their hands—this will be my great oath for you:
 One day the need for Achilles will hit the Achaians’ sons, 240 every man jack of them—then, for all your grief, you’ll not be able to help them, when many at the hands of Hector, killer of men, fall dying; you’ll eat out the heart within you, incensed that you failed to honor the best of the Achaians.”

So spoke the son of Pēleus, then dashed to the ground the staff 245 studded with golden nails, and himself sat down.
 Across from him Atreus's son still raged. Then Nestōr, smooth phrasemaker, arose, the Pylians' lucid spokesman, a man from whose tongue the speech flowed sweeter than honey.
 In his lifetime already two generations of mortals 250 had passed away—those raised with him—and their offspring, in sacred Pylos, and now he was king over the third.
 He, with friendly intent, now spoke before the assembly:
 "Ah me, great grief indeed now besets the land of Achaia!
 Priam would surely rejoice, and the sons of Priam, 255 and all the rest of the Trojans would be happy at heart if they learned about this quarrel between the pair of you, who in counsel surpass all the Danaāns, and in fighting.
 Now listen to me. You both are younger than I am, there was a time when I consorted with far better men 260 than you—and they never wrote me off as a lightweight!
 Such men have I not seen since, nor shall see again as Peirithoös, or Dryas, the shepherd of his people, or Kaineus or Exadios, or godlike Polyphēmos, or Thēseus, Aigeus's son, an equal of the immortals. 265 Strongest were these of all men nurtured by earth; strongest themselves, and fought against the strongest, the mountain-laired beast-men,⁶ and fearsomely they destroyed them.
 I joined these men's company when I'd come from Pylos, a long trek from a distant land; it was they who invited me. 270 Single-handed I fought, but against such men as these no mortal of those on earth today could do battle.
 They listened to my advice, were persuaded by my words.
 So do you both be persuaded: persuasion is better.
You, great man though you are, do not take away his girl, 275 but let her be, as the prize the Achaians' sons first gave him.
 And you, son of Pēleus, do not seek to challenge a king by main force, since it is no ordinary honor that's the lot of a sceptered king, to whom Zeus gives the glory.

6. The mountain-laired beast-men: the Centaurs, traditionally located on the wooded slopes of Mt. Pēlion: they were most famously in conflict with the Lapiths of Thessaly (Nestōr's father Nēleus was Thessalian by origin), who drove them out, after killing many, when they got drunk at the wedding of King Peirithoös and tried to rape his bride, Hippodameia.

Strong though you are, with a goddess for your mother, 280 yet this man is the greater, since he rules more subjects.
 Son of Atreus, control your rage. I do beseech you, check your anger against Achilles, who is a great bulwark for all the Achaians against war's disasters."

Then in answer to him spoke the lord Agamemnōn: 285
 "Yes, all that you say, old sir, is right and proper.
 But this man has it in mind to be above all others,
 He wants to dominate all, be lord over all, give orders to all—yet there's one man, I think, will not obey him.
 If the gods who live forever have made him a spearman, 290 is that now an excuse for his insults to run wild—?"

Cutting in on his words then, noble Achilles responded:
 "I'd surely be called a coward and a worthless fellow if over every matter I yield to you, do as you say!
 Tell others to act thus, but don't give me such orders, 295 for I think I'm no longer minded to obey you.
 One other thing I will tell you, and do you lay it to heart:
 I shan't fight with my hands for the girl, no, neither against you nor anyone else: you gave her, you'll take her.
 But of everything else that is mine by my swift black ship 300 not one piece shall you carry off against my pleasure!
 Go on, then, try it, so that these men here too may learn how quickly your black blood will gush out round my spear point."

So the two, after exchanging their fighting words, arose and broke up the assembly by the ships of the Achaians. 305 Pēleus's son made his way to the huts and his well-trimmed vessels with Patroklos, son of Menoitios, and his other companions; but Atreus's son now had a swift ship hauled down to the sea, chose a score of men to row it, loaded oxen for the god, brought out the fair-cheeked Chryseïs and put her aboard, 310 and as captain there went with them resourceful Odysseus.

So these embarked and sailed out over the seaways.
 But Atreus's son ordered his people to purify themselves, and they did so, cast into the sea the filth of their defilement, then offered up to Apollo their perfect sacrifices 315 of bulls and goats by the shore of the unharvested sea, and the savor went up to heaven, circling around the smoke.

Thus throughout the camp they were busy; yet Agamemnōn did not give up the strife with which he first threatened Achilles, but gave orders to Talthybios and Eurybatēs, 320 the two who were his heralds and busy henchmen:

“Both of you go to the hut of Pēleus’s son Achilles, take by the hand the fair-cheeked Briseīs, bring her back here.
 If he won’t give her up, I shall come in person to get her, with a large force: and that will be the worse for him.” 325

So saying, he sent them off, with these harsh orders: the two reluctantly went by the shore of the unharvested sea, and came to the Myrmidons’ ships and huts. They found Achilles sitting beside his hut and his black ship, and at the sight of those two he was not best pleased. 330

They, quaking with terror and in awe of the king, stood there, not questioning him, not saying a word,
 but he understood in his heart, and thus addressed them: “Greetings, you heralds, messengers of Zeus and of mankind!
 Come closer: for me it’s not you who are guilty, but Agamemnōn, 335 who’s sent you both here on account of the girl Briseīs.
 Very well, then. Patroklos, go fetch the girl out, hand her over to these two to take away. And let them be witnesses before the blessed gods and before all mortal men—yes, and before that ruthless king—if ever hereafter 340 there shall be need of me, to ward off shameful havoc from the host at large! How he seethes in his destructive mind, with no idea how to look at once both before and after,
 to ensure that the Achaians might fight safely beside their ships.”

So he spoke, and Patroklos obeyed his dear companion. 345
 From their hut he brought the fair-cheeked Briseīs, gave her to them to take. The two went back to the Achaians’ ships, and the woman went with them, unwillingly. But Achilles, weeping, moved off apart from his comrades, sat down on the shore of the grey salt sea, eyes fixed on the boundless deep, 350 and appealed to his dear mother, arms outstretched:

“Mother, since you bore me, though for a short life only, some honor, for sure, the Olympian should have guaranteed me—Zeus, who thunders on high; but now not the slightest regard has he shown me—and Atreus’s son, wide-ruling Agamemnōn, 355 has done me dishonor, himself took my prize, and keeps it.”

So he spoke, shedding tears, and the lady his mother heard him as she sat in the depths of the sea beside the Old Man, her father.
Swiftly she rose up, like a mist, through the grey sea-brine, came and sat down in front of him as he wept, 360 and stroking him with her hand, addressed him by name, and said: “Child, why are you crying? What grief has possessed your heart?
Speak out, let us both know, don’t hide it away in your mind.”

Then, with a heavy sigh, swift-footed Achilles answered:
“You know. Why must I tell you this, when you’re all-knowing? 365
We marched out to Thēbē, Eētiōn’s sacred city, sacked it, brought everything back here. The sons of the Achaians divided the spoils quite fairly among themselves, to the son of Atreus allotting Chrysēs’ fair-cheeked daughter.
But Chrysēs himself, the priest of Apollo, deadly archer, 370 came to the swift ships of the bronze-corseleted Achaians, to win his daughter’s release, bearing ransom past counting, a golden staff in his hands, wreathed with the deadly archer Apollo’s laurels, made his plea to all the Achaians, but first to the two sons of Atreus, the host’s field marshals. 375
Then all the other Achaians spoke up in agreement:
they should respect the priest, and accept the splendid ransom.
Yet Atreus’s son Agamemnōn’s angry heart remained untouched.
Brusquely he turned him away, with words of harsh dismissal.
Angered, the old man went back, but Apollo had listened 380 to the prayer he made, for his priest was most dear to him; so he let fly against the Argives his deadly shafts. Their men were now dying one after the other, as the god’s arrows ranged throughout the Achaians’ wide camp. But to us the seer, well aware of the truth, made clear the deadly archer’s message. 385
I was the first, at once, to urge the god’s appeasement, but then bitter anger flared in Atreus’s son: he stood up and quickly uttered a threat, which is now accomplished:
for the sharp-eyed Achaians are sending this girl aboard a swift ship to Chrysē, along with gifts for the lord Apollo, 390 while heralds have led away the other girl from my hut, Briseus’s daughter, my present from the Achaians’ sons.
But you, if you can, now come to the aid of your son, go on up to Olympos, petition Zeus, if ever you’ve gratified his heart by either word or deed! 395

For surely I've often heard you in the halls of my father, boasting—that Kronos's son, lord of black thunderclouds, was saved from shameful ruin, you said, by you alone among the immortals, when those other Olympians wanted to put him in fetters—Hērē, Poseidōn, and Pallas Athēnē. 400
But you came, goddess, and rescued him from his bonds, quickly calling to high Olympos the hundred-handed one, whom the gods name Briareus—but mortals of every sort Aigaiōn—for he in strength is mightier than his father.⁷
By the son of Kronos he sat down, exulting in his glory, 405 and the blessed gods, terrified, laid aside their fetters.
Remind him now of these matters, sit by him, clasp his knees, in case he may be minded to assist the Trojans, drive back the Achaians past the ships' sterns and along the seashore, with slaughter, that they may all get joy of the king they have, 410 and Atreus's son, wide-ruling Agamemnōn, may know his delusion in failing to honor the best of the Achaians."

Then Thetis answered him, shedding tears: "Ah, my child, Why, after so ill-starred a birth, did I ever rear you?
I wish it had been your lot to sit by your ships, ungrieving, 415 tearless, since your life will be brief, of no real length; but now you are both short-lived and the wretchedest mortal of all—to a cruel fate I bore you in our halls!
Still to bring this complaint of yours before Zeus, happy thunderer, I'll go myself to snowbound Olympos. He might just listen. 420 You, though, sit tight by your swift-sailing ships, rage on against the Achaians—but yourself abstain from battle.
Zeus yesterday went to Ocean, to visit the blameless⁸ Aithiōpians, for a feast: all the other gods left with him.
In twelve days he'll come back to Olympos, and then 425
I shall go to the house of Zeus, with its brazen floor, and clasp his knees; and I think I shall persuade him."

-
7. Briareus was the son of Ouranos (Heaven) and Gaia (Earth): Hes. Theog. 147–49: the bri- phoneme linguistically suggests "strength". Kirk 1: 94 reminds us that Briareus "existed before men were created, and his name was therefore assigned by primeval gods." The parenthetic punctuation is that of West. Hērē, Poseidōn, and Athēnē are the three main pro-Achaian deities in the Iliad, but this act of rebellion is otherwise unknown.
8. The Aithiōpians were thought of as a mysterious race at the known world's periphery (Homer's world was a flat disc, with Ocean its great circumambient river). As Pulleyn says, "The gods like to visit far-away places as a diversion" (228).

This said, she took herself off, and left him there, enraged at heart on account of the fine-clad woman they'd taken from him by force, against his will. Meanwhile 430 Odysseus made landfall at Chrysē, conveying the oxen for a holy sacrifice. When they entered the deep harbor they furled the sail and stowed it away in the black ship.
 The mast they let down by the forestays, lowered it into the crutch smartly, then plied their oars to the roadstead anchorage, 435 cast out the anchor stones, hitched up the stern cables, and themselves stepped out onto the seashore, disembarked the sacrificial oxen for Apollo, the deadly archer;
 and from the seagoing ship Chryseïs too stepped forth.
 Then resourceful Odysseus escorted her to the altar, put her 440 in the arms of her dear father, and thus addressed him:
 "Chrysēs, I am sent here by the lord of men, Agamemnōn, to bring you your daughter, and offer to Phoibos a holy sacrifice for the Danaäns, to placate the Lord who has lately laid on the Argives much grief and lamentation." 445

So saying, he delivered her into his arms, and Chrysēs gladly received his dear child. Now quickly and in good order they set up the god's holy sacrifice around his well-built altar, washed their hands, took up the barley groats, and before them Chrysēs now prayed aloud, with arms uplifted: 450
 "Hear me, you of the silver bow, protector of Chrysē and sacred Killa, who rule in might over Tenedos!
 There was a time when I prayed, and you duly listened, honored my prayer, and wrought havoc on the troops of the Achaians, so fulfil for me also one new wish, here and now: 455 take off, without delay, this vile plague from the Danaäns."

So he spoke in prayer, and Phoibos Apollo heard him.

When they had prayed, and scattered the barley groats, first pulling back the victims' heads, they slaughtered and flayed them, cut out the thighs, wrapped them up in a double layer 460 of fat, and placed above them cuts of raw meat. The old man burned these over split billets, with fire-bright wine drizzled them, while beside him young men held five-pronged forks.
 When the thighs were well broiled and they'd tasted the innards, next they chopped up the rest, threaded the bits on skewers, 465 grilled them with care, then drew them all off. But when they were through with their work, and the meal had been got ready, they feasted, and no one's heart lacked a fair share in the feasting.

 But when they had satisfied their desire for food and drink, the young men topped up the mixing bowls with liquor 470 and served it to all, the first drops in their cups for a libation.
 The whole day through with song these young Achaians sought to appease the god, chanting their lovely paean, that hymned the deadly archer, whose heart rejoiced as he listened.

But when the sun went down and darkness came on, 475 they settled themselves and slept by the ships' stern cables;
 and when early Dawn appeared, the rosy-fingered, they put out to sea toward the wide camp of the Achaians, and Apollo the deadly archer sent them a following wind, and they raised the mast and spread wide the white sail. 480

The sail bellied out in the wind, and a surging bow wave sang loud round the vessel's cutwater as she ran.
 On she sped, slicing herself a sea-lane through the billows;
 but when they arrived at the wide camp of the Achaians, the black ship they hauled far up the beach, set her high 485 on the sands, planted the long props against her hull,⁹ and themselves dispersed to their various huts and vessels.

So he sat on, still raging, beside his swift-moving ships, Pēleus's heaven-sprung son, swift-footed Achilles. Never did he show up now in assembly, where men attain renown, 490 never went to the fighting, but let his dear heart waste away, withdrawn there, though he longed for the war cry and for combat.

But when the twelfth dawn from that day broke, then back to Olympus the gods who are forever returned, all together, with Zeus at their head; and Thetis did not 495 forget her son's entreaties, but rose from the sea's waves in the early morning, went up through the vast sky to Olympus.
 Kronos's loud-thundering son she found apart from the rest, perched on the topmost peak of many-ridged Olympus.
 She sat down before him, with her left hand embraced his knees, 500 while with her right she touched him beneath the chin,

9. These props were posts or stakes driven into the sand and resting against the sides of the hull to hold the vessel upright.

and in supplication addressed him as Lord Zeus, Kronos's son:
 "Zeus, Father, if ever before among the immortals I helped you by word or deed, then grant me now this wish!
 Honor my son, who beyond all other men is fated 505 to a brief life; for now that lord of men, Agamemnōn, has done him dishonor, himself took his prize, and keeps it.
 Zeus,—Olympian, counselor!—you must show him honor:
 give the edge to the Trojans, at least until the Achaians acknowledge my son's rights, make him honorable amends." 510

So she spoke; but no word came from Zeus the cloud-gatherer.
 Long in silence he sat. Yet Thetis, just as she'd embraced his knees, now clung to him, asked him a second time:
 "Promise me this without fail, and nod in confirmation, or else say no—you've nothing to fear!—and show me 515 how far I'm the one least honored among all the gods."

Then, deeply troubled, cloud-gatherer Zeus addressed her:
 "This is a nasty business—you'll bring me into conflict with Hērē, make her provoke me with reproachful words.
 As it is, she constantly nags me before the immortal gods, 520 says that I give my support to the Trojans in the fighting.
 You go back home now, lest Hērē notice you; I shall figure a way to get this matter accomplished.
 See now, I'll nod my head to make you believe me, since among the immortals this from me is the strongest 525 pledge: no promise of mine can be revoked, mislead, or remain unfulfilled, once I nod in assent to it."

With that the son of Kronos nodded his dark brows, and the locks of ambrosial hair swung rippling from the Lord's immortal head: he made great Olympos tremble. 530

These two, planning done, now parted: she leapt down into the salty deep from gleaming Olympos, while Zeus went to his dwelling. All the gods rose together from their chairs in respect for the Father, not one of them dared to stay seated on his arrival: all stood up to greet him. 535 So he sat down there on his throne. But Hērē was well aware, when she saw him, that Thetis, the silver-footed, the Old Man of the Sea's daughter, had been with him, plotting mischief.
 At once with mocking words she addressed Zeus, son of Kronos:

“Which of the gods, you trickster, has been with you, plotting mischief? 540

Always it’s your pleasure to leave me out of things, make decisions you’ve worked on in secret. You’ve never really wanted to let me share what’s going on in your mind.”

Then to her the father of gods and men replied:

“Hērē, do not expect to get to know all my thoughts— 545 they’d be difficult for you, even though you are my wife.

What is fitting for you to hear there is no one, either of gods or mortals, who will learn it before you. But such plans as I aim to devise without the other gods’ knowledge are matters you never must ask me about, or query.” 550

Then to him the ox-eyed lady Hērē responded:

“Most dread son of Kronos, what’s this that you’re telling me?
In the past, to a fault, I’ve not questioned or pestered you—you work out at your ease anything that you’ve a mind to.
But now I very much fear you’ve been won over by Thetis, 555 the silver-footed, the daughter of the Old Man of the Sea, for at first light she sat down before you, and clasped your knees, and I think you nodded to her as true token that you’d honor Achilles, and kill many men by the ships of the Achaians.”

Then in answer to her Zeus the cloud-gatherer said: 560 “Madam, you’re full of fancies: I can keep nothing from you.

Yet you won’t achieve anything this way, save to find yourself further still from my heart—which will be the worse for you.
If this business is thus, then it must be to my liking.
So sit down, keep quiet, and be obedient to my orders, 565 for all the gods on Olympos will avail you nothing when I come close and lay invincible hands upon you.”

So he spoke, and fear seized the ox-eyed lady Hērē:

she sat in silence, wrestling her inner heart to submission, and throughout Zeus’s house the gods of heaven were troubled. 570

Among them Hēphaistos, famed craftsman, was first to speak, hoping to calm his dear mother, white-armed Hērē:

“A nasty business we’ll have here, something not to be borne if you two are to quarrel like this for the sake of mortals, and bring brawling among the gods—there’ll be no pleasure 575 in the splendid feast, since bad feeling’s uppermost.

And I would advise my mother (though she knows this herself) to make up to our dear father Zeus, so that our father may not fall out with her again, and thus upset our feasting.
 Suppose the Olympian, lord of the lightning, were minded 580 to toss us out of our seats? He's by far the strongest.
 So, engage him with soft, fair words; then straight away the Olympian's sure to show himself gracious to us."

So saying he sprang up, and put a two-handled goblet in his dear mother's hand, and thus addressed her: 585
 "Be patient, my mother, endure, despite your sorrow, lest, dear as you are to me, I get to see you beaten before my eyes, and then I'll be unable to help you for all my grief: the Olympian's a difficult opponent.
 Once before, that other time when I was minded to aid you, 590 he hurled me, seized by the foot, down from the gods' threshold.
 All day long I plummeted, till as the sun was setting
 I fell upon Lēmnos, and little the life left in me, but the Sintian folk cared for me directly after my fall."

So he spoke, and the goddess, white-armed Hērē, smiled, 595 and smiling received the cup in one hand from her son.
 Then, going from left to right, for all the other gods he poured out sweet nectar, drawn from the mixing bowl, and unquenchable laughter arose among the blessed gods as they watched Hēphaistos hobbling around the palace. 600

Then the whole day long until the sun went down they feasted, and no one's heart lacked a fair share of the feasting, nor of the exquisite lyre that Apollo handled, nor of the Muses who sang, sweet-voiced, responding one to another.

But when the bright light of the sun sank, then they all went 605 to lie down and sleep, every one in his own dwelling, where for each of them a house had been built, with cunning skill, by far-famed Hēphaistos, lame of both legs; and Zeus the Olympian, lord of lightning, went to his own bed, where he always had found repose when sweet sleep overtook him. 610
 There he went up and slept, with gold-throned Hērē beside him.

Book 2

All others, both gods, and mortals, chariot marshals, slept the night through, but on Zeus sweet sleep could get no hold, for in his mind he was pondering how he might do honor to Achilles, and slay many beside the Achaians' ships.
And to him, as he thought, this looked to be the best plan: 5 to send Atreus's son Agamemnōn a destructive Dream.
He spoke to the Dream, addressed it in winged words:
"Go now, destructive Dream, to the swift ships of the Achaians, and when you reach the hut of Atreus's son Agamemnōn repeat to him exactly the message that I now give you. 10 Bid him to arm the long-haired Achaians for battle as quickly as may be, for now he may take the broad-streeted city of the Trojans, since no longer are the immortals who dwell on Olympos at odds, now Hērē has forced them to agreement by her pleading, and troubles will be the Trojans' lot." 15

So he spoke: the Dream went, on hearing his charge, and quickly came to the swift ships of the Achaians.
To Atreus's son Agamemnōn it went, and came upon him asleep in his hut, and about him divine slumber was shed.
It stood there above his head in the likeness of Nēleus's son 20
Nestōr, whom Agamemnōn honored above all elders.
So in his likeness the god-sent Dream addressed him:
"You sleep, son of Atreus the warlike, breaker of horses!
Night-long sleep is not fitting for a man that's a counselor, to whom troops are entrusted, who's burdened with many cares. 25
But now listen well: I bring word to you from Zeus,
who though far distant greatly cares for and pities you.
He bids you arm the long-haired Achaians for battle with all speed, for now you may take the broad-streeted city of the Trojans, since no longer are the immortals who dwell 30 on Olympos at odds, now Hērē has forced them to agreement
by her pleading, and trouble will be the Trojans' lot at Zeus's hands. Keep this in your heart, don't permit forgetfulness to seize you when honey-sweet sleep lets you go."

Thus it spoke and departed, leaving him there 35 to reflect in his heart on things not destined to be fulfilled.
 For he thought he would take Priam's city on that very day, the fool, and did not know the deeds that Zeus was planning, that he was yet to afflict with much anguish and suffering both Trojans and Danaäns through the grind of battle. 40 He woke, the divine voice still in the air around him, sat upright, shrugged into his comfortable tunic—elegant, newly made—flung a great cloak over it, tied under his smooth-skinned feet his elegant sandals, and slung from his shoulders his silver-studded sword. 45
 Then he took his ancestral scepter, forever imperishable, and with it strode by the ships of the bronze-corseleted Achaians.

The goddess Dawn drew near to high Olympus, bringing her announcement of light to Zeus and the other immortals; and the king commanded his clear-voiced heralds to call 50 to assembly, by proclamation, the long-haired Achaians.
 They so proclaimed, and promptly the troops then gathered.

But first he held a council of the great-hearted elders by the ship of Nestōr, the king of Pylian ancestry.
 Having convened them, he outlined his crafty plan: 55
 "Listen, my friends. As I slept a heaven-sent Dream approached me through the ambrosial night; and most it resembled noble Nestōr, in shape and stature and appearance.
 It stood there above my head and spoke these words to me:
 'You sleep, son of Atreus the warlike, breaker of horses! 60
 Night-long sleep is not fitting for a man that's a counselor,
 to whom troops are entrusted, who's burdened with many cares.
 But now listen well: I bring word to you from Zeus,
 who though far distant greatly cares for and pities you.
 He bids you arm the long-haired Achaians for battle 65
 with all speed, for now you may take the broad-streeted city of the Trojans, since no longer are the immortals who dwell on Olympus at odds, now Hērē has forced them to agreement
 by her pleading, and trouble will be the Trojans' lot at Zeus's hands. Keep this in your heart.' So speaking 70 it flew away and was gone, and sweet sleep released me.
 Let's see, then, if we can arm the Achaians' sons for battle!
 But first I shall test with them words, this being the custom, even urge them to take flight in their many-benched vessels, while you, some here, some there, with words restrain them.” 75

So saying, he sat down, and there then stood up among them Nestōr, who reigned as king in sandy Pylos.

He, with friendly intent, now spoke before the assembly:

“My friends, leaders and rulers of the Argives, had it been any other Achaian who informed us of this dream 80 we’d call it a lie and have nothing to do with it—But he saw it who claims to be far the best of the Achaians!
So come, let us seek some way to arm the Achaians’ sons.”

This said, he led the way out of the council.

The other sceptered kings, obeying the people’s shepherd, 85 rose to their feet, as the people came hurrying in to assembly.

Just as close-packed swarms of bees keep on emerging from some hollow rock, one new group after another, and hover like clustering grapes above the springtime blossoms, or fly off in masses, some this way and some that, 90 so from the ships and huts in their great numbers along the wide seashore the troops from every homeland marched in throngs to the assembly. With them flared Rumor, urging them on, Zeus’s messenger. Thus they gathered.

The assembly was all confusion, the earth groaned under 95 these men as they sat, there was uproar. Nine heralds tried to restrain them with shouted orders, to make them stop their noise and attend to the princes, Zeus’s nurslings.

With great effort the people were settled, kept in place, their shouting silenced. Then the lord Agamemnōn 100 rose, holding the scepter Hēphaistos had toiled to make:

Hēphaistos gave it to Lord Zeus, the son of Kronos, from Zeus it passed to the courier slayer of Argos,¹ Lord Hermēs gave it to Pelops, driver of horses; Pelops in turn bestowed it on Atreus, shepherd of his people, 105 Atreus, dying, bequeathed it to Thyestēs, rich in flocks, and Thyestēs in turn left it to Agamemnōn to carry, as lord over many islands and the whole of Argos.

1. An ancient, and obscure, title of Hermēs. Some scholiasts believed that the reference is to a monstrous dog called Argos, full of eyes, that Hērē set to watch Io, Zeus’s latest love, after he metamorphosed her into a cow to escape Hērē’s maleficent attentions. Zeus allegedly enlisted Hermēs’ help to get rid of the dog.

Leaning on this scepter he now addressed the Argives:
 “My friends, Danaän heroes, comrades in arms of Arēs, 110 Great Zeus, Kronos’s son, has snared me in a crushing delusion, harsh god that he is. Once he promised, and bowed his head in assent, that I should sack strong-walled Ilion before returning home.
 Now he’s turned to a vile deception, orders me back in dishonor to Argos, after the loss of so many men. 115 Such things, I suppose, give pleasure to Zeus in his mightiness, who has brought down the high towers of many a city, and will bring down still more, for his power is the greatest.
 A shameful thing it is, and for future men to learn, how in vain it was that so strong, so vast an Achaian army 120 waged a war to no purpose—though they were fighting against fewer men—and still with no end in sight!
 For if we were so minded, Achaians and Trojans both, to swear a solemn truce, and to both be counted, the Trojans numbering all those with city households, 125 and we Achaians being sorted in groups of ten, with each group choosing a Trojan to pour our wine, then many a group would lack for a wine pourer.
 So far, I say, do the sons of the Achaians outnumber those Trojans who dwell in the city. But there are allies 130 from many cities, spear-wielding warriors, who thwart me, will not allow me, for all my wanting it, to take and sack Ilion’s populous city. By now nine years of great Zeus have come and gone, by now our ships’ timbers are rotted, their rigging all gone slack, 135 while at home our wives and young children may be still sitting there in our halls and awaiting us. Yet the work for which we came here remains entirely unaccomplished.
 So come, then, let us all agree to do as I say:
 pull out with our ships, return to our own native land, 140 since now we shall never capture Troy of the wide streets.”

So he spoke, and roused the spirit in the breasts of all that throng, none of whom had heard what was said in council.
 The assembly was stirred into motion like the long sea rollers of the Ikarian deep, which winds from the east or south 145 roil up, rushing on them from the clouds of Zeus, the Father.
 As when the west wind’s onset flurries the deep-standing grain with its rough blast, and all the corn-ears bend, so all the assembly was shifted, and with loud hullabaloo men raced to the ships, and from under their feet the dust 150 lifted and hung in the air. They shouted one to another to lay hold of the ships, drag them down to the bright sea, started clearing the slipways, voices soaring skyward in their longing for home, knocked props away from the hulls.

Then for the Argives a homecoming beyond their destiny 155 would have come about, had not Hērē thus addressed Athēnē: “Good heavens, unwearied daughter of Zeus of the aegis, is it thus to their native land the Argives will take flight homeward, across the broad back of the sea, leaving—a trophy for Priam and every Trojan to boast of— 160 Argive Helen, for whom so many of the Achaiaans
 perished in Troy, far distant from their own fatherland?
 Go, now, through the ranks of the bronze-corseleted Achaiaans,
 with your gentle words restrain each individual:
 don’t let them haul their trim vessels seaward!” 165

So she spoke,
 and the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē, did not demur, but went her way, swooping down from the peaks of Olympus, and speedily reached the swift ships of the Achaiaans.
 There she found Odysseus, Zeus’s equal in counsel, standing idle, not setting a hand to his black and well-benched 170 vessel, since grief had possessed his heart and spirit.
 Standing close beside him grey-eyed Athēnē said: “Zeus-sprung son of Laertēs, resourceful Odysseus, is it thus to your native land that you’ll take flight homeward, tumbling aboard your many-benched vessels? Would you 175 leave, as a trophy for Priam and every Trojan to boast of,
 Argive Helen, for whom so many of the Achaiaans
 perished in Troy, far distant from their own fatherland?
 Go, now, through the Achaiaans’ ranks, hold back no longer,
 with your gentle words restrain each individual, 180
 don’t let them haul their trim vessels seaward!”

So she spoke.

He knew from her speech that her voice was that of a goddess, and left at a run, throwing off his cloak, to be picked up by the herald Eurybatēs, from Ithákē, his attendant.

He himself went straight to Atreus's son Agamemnōn, 185 who gave him his family's scepter, forever imperishable; with this he strode by the ships of the bronze-corseleted Achaians.

Any prince or eminent man whom he encountered, he'd stand at his side, try with gentle words to restrain him:
"My good sir, it's not proper to browbeat you like a coward! 190
Just sit yourself down, get your people seated too.
As yet you've no clear knowledge of what Atreus's son intends:
Now he's just making trial, but he'll hit the Achaians' sons soon, and hard. Did we not all hear what he said in council?
May he not in his wrath do hurt to the sons of the Achaians! 195 Proud is the spirit of kings, Zeus's nurslings: their honor derives from Zeus, and Zeus the Counselor loves them."

But each commoner that he saw, and discovered shouting, him he'd thrash with his staff, and assail with words as well:
"You, fellow, sit quiet, attend to the words of others, 200 better men than yourself! Unwarlike, strengthless, you're of no account either in battle or in counsel.
No way can we all be kings here, we Achaians:
no good thing is the lordship of many; let there be one lord, one king, to whom Kronos's son, that devious schemer, 205 gives scepter and right of judgment, to deliberate for his people."

So, acting the lord, he controlled the troops. They hurried back from the ships and huts to the place of assembly, with a noise as when a wave of the loud-resounding sea thunders upon a great beach, and the deep re-echoes. 210

The rest had settled, were quiet; one man only, Thersitēs, a blabbermouth, kept scolding on: he had a great store of words in his mind, but all disordered, random, out of true sequence, to wrangle with the kings—anything that he figured might set the Argives laughing. 215 Of all who'd come under Troy's citadel, he was the ugliest—bandy-legged, lame in one foot, both shoulders hunched, drawn in over his chest; above them his head came to a peak, and sparse the hair growing on it.
Hated he was above all by Achilles and Odysseus, 220 stock targets for his haranguing; but at noble Agamemnōn he now directed his shrill abuse. With him the Achaians were fearsomely angry, indignant and resentful, yet still, at the top of his voice, he kept scolding Agamemnōn:

 “Son of Atreus, what’s your complaint now, what is it you lack? 225
 Your huts are crammed with bronze items, there are women galore in your huts, real choice ones, given you by the Achaians first off, whenever we get to capture a citadel!
 Or do you still itch for more gold, to be fetched you from Ilion by some horse-breaking Trojan as ransom for his son— 230 whom I, or another Achaian, may have captured and brought in?
 Or is it some young woman for you to lie with in love, and keep apart for yourself? It isn’t right for one who’s their leader to bring harm to the Achaians’ sons!
 Weaklings! Cowardly creatures! You women, not men, of Achaia, 235 let’s go back home in our ships, and leave this fellow here in Troy to gorge on his prizes: let him discover whether we’ll bother to help him, or not—this man who’s subjected Achilles, a far better man than he is, to dishonor, himself has taken his prize, and keeps it. 240 Yet there’s no gall in Achilles’ heart, he’s easy-going.
 Otherwise, son of Atreus, this insult would be your last.”

Thus, railing at Agamemnōn, the shepherd of the people, Thersitēs. But quickly there came up noble Odysseus, stood by him, eyed him darkly, reproved him with harsh words: 245 “Thersitēs, wild babbler, sharp stump speaker you may be, but shut up! Don’t try, on your own, to challenge princes, for I think there exists no more worthless mortal than you among all who came below Ilion with the sons of Atreus.
 Quit mouthing the names of the kings, leave off your ranting, 250 the insults you cast at them, watching your chance to pull out!
 We still don’t know for certain how these matters will be:
 shall we, the Achaians’ sons, get a good or a bad homecoming?
 Yet here you sit, reviling Agamemnōn, son of Atreus, the people’s shepherd, because so much was given to him 255
 by the Danaän heroes: your speech is all jeering mockery.
 But this I will tell you straight, and it shall come to pass:
 should I find you once more playing the fool, as you are now, then may Odysseus’s head no longer rest on his shoulders, no longer may I be called Tēlemachos's father, 260

 if I don't seize you and strip off all your clothing, your cloak and your tunic, that cover your naked shame, and send you off, howling, back to the swift ships, whipped out of the assembly with demeaning blows."
 So saying, with the scepter he struck Thersitēs' back 265 and shoulders: he doubled up, the tears gushed from him, and a bloody welt rose on his back from the golden scepter. Then down he sat, in pain and terrified, with a helpless expression, wiping away the tears.
 Sorry for him or not, the troops still found him comic, 270 and one, with a laugh, would turn to his neighbor and say:
 "I tell you, Odysseus may have done countless good things—a master of sound advice, of deployment in battle—but this is the best deed by far he's performed among the Argives, to make this slanderous word-slinger cease from his ranting! 275 Never again will Thersitēs' headstrong spirit impel him to inveigh in insulting language against the princes."

 So spoke the common folk. Then Odysseus, city-sacker, stood up holding the scepter, while beside him grey-eyed Athēnē in the form of a herald ordered the people to keep silent, 280 so that all the Achaians' sons, both front and rearmost ranks, could hear his words and take cognizance of his counsel.
 He, with friendly intent, now spoke before the assembly:
 "Son of Atreus! Indeed now, my lord, the Achaians are minded to name you the most blameworthy among all mortal men, 285 nor will they fulfil the promise they once gave you on their way here from Argos, excellent pasture for horses—that not till walled Ilion fell would you sail away; for as though they were little children or widowed women they wail loudly, one to another, about returning home. 290 It's true that it's hard, this sad longing to be gone; for anyone parted even one month from his wife with his many-benched ship feels distress, when wintry gales and tumultuous seas hold him back. But for us this is the ninth of the circling years that have seen us still 295 soldiering on here. I don't blame the Achaians for fretting beside their curved ships, but, even so, it's shameful to stay so long and go home empty-handed.

 Endure, my friends, hold firm a while longer, until we learn whether Kalchas is, or is not, a truthful prophet. 300 There's a moment we well recall, and you can, every one of you, except those caught by the death-spirits, bear witness to it, when—it seems only yesterday—at Aulis the Achaian fleet was assembling, trouble for Priam and his Trojans.
 We on the sacred altars set up around a spring 305 were offering unblemished sacrifices to the immortals under a lovely plane tree from which the bright water flowed.
 Then appeared a great sign: a serpent, backed blood-red, horrific, sent into the light by the Olympian himself, slid out from under the altar and made for the plane tree. 310
 There huddled a sparrow's fledglings, babes new-hatched, on the topmost branch, and cowering under its leaves—eight, and the mother that hatched them made the ninth.
 Then the serpent devoured them, all piteously cheeping, while the mother fluttered around, bewailing her little ones, 315 till the snake, coiling, seized her wing as she shrilled in sorrow.
 But when it had polished the lot off, mother and all, the god behind its appearance made it a clear portent:
 the son of devious Kronos turned it to stone, and we stood there, amazed at what had happened. So when 320 this dread prodigy interrupted our sacrifice to the gods Kalchas at once declared to us, in prophetic mode:
 'Why have you fallen silent, you long-haired Achaians?
 This great portent's been shown to us by Zeus in his wisdom:
 late, and late in fulfillment, but its fame will never perish!
 As this serpent devoured the sparrow's brood, and their mother 325 with them—all eight, and she that hatched them made nine—so we for that sum of years shall wage war there, but in the tenth we shall take the wide-streeted city.'
 Such were his words, and now all this is being accomplished! 330
 So come, stand firm all of you, you well-greaved Achaians, here, till the day that we capture Priam's great citadel."

So he spoke: the Argives gave a great shout, and round them the ships echoed deafeningly to the Achaians' cheering as they applauded the speech of godlike Odysseus. 335
 Then the Gerēnian horseman Nestōr spoke out among them:

“Oh really! You’re like children when you hold assembly, mere infants, unacquainted with the business of warfare!
 What’s to become of our covenants, our sworn oaths?
 Shall we toss in the fire all men’s counsels and stratagems, 340 those neat libations, those handshakes in which we placed our trust?
 We keep on wrangling with words, yet we can find no remedy, for all the lengthy time we’ve been here.
 Son of Atreus, you must, as before, maintain unshaken purpose, be the Argives’ leader throughout our fierce engagements! 345 Leave those others to perish, the one or two Achaians plotting apart from the rest—but their work will come to nothing—to make their way back to Argos, even before we know if that promise by Zeus of the aegis is a falsehood or not.
 For I tell you, he nodded approval, did Kronos’s mighty son, 350 on that day when in their swift-travelling vessels the Argives set forth, to the Trojans bearing slaughter and destruction:
 he struck lightning on our right, showed us signs of his favor.
 So let no man be over-hasty to set out homeward until he has lain with the wife of some Trojan, and got requital 355 for all our effort and misery in the matter of Helen.
 But if anyone is terribly minded to set out homeward, let him so much as touch his black well-benched vessel, and the rest will watch his encounter with his death and destiny!
 Now, my lord, plan well yourself—and obey another: 360 not to be tossed aside will be the advice I give you.
 Order your troops by their clans and by brotherhoods, Agamemnōn:
 Thus brotherhood will bring aid to brotherhood, clan to clan.
 If you act thus, and the Achaians do as you command, then you’ll know which of them, leaders and men, are cowards, 365 and which the brave, since they’ll be fighting by themselves, and whether it’s heaven’s will that you fail to reduce the city, or because of your own troops’ lack of warlike skill and valor.”

To him now spoke in answer the lord Agamemnōn: “Once more, old sir, you surpass the sons of the Achaians 370 in debate—Zeus the Father, Athēnē, Apollo! I wish I’d ten such counselors from among the Achaians! Then quickly indeed would King Priam’s city totter and fall, taken and sacked by our hands. But the son of Kronos,

Zeus who bears the aegis,² has rather brought me sorrows, 375 tossing me into insoluble quarrels and disputes.
 For I and Achilles fought each other over a girl, exchanging violent words, and my anger it was began it.
 But if ever we reach agreement, from then no longer shall the Trojans' doom be postponed, not for a moment! 380 Now off with you, get your meal, and then prepare for battle:
 let each man sharpen his spear, have his shield in good order;
 let each man provide good feed for his swift-footed horses;
 let each man look to his chariot, ready himself to fight, so that all day long we may be matched in hateful warfare. 385
 For there'll be no respite, no, not for a moment, Till night comes on and parts the warriors' mingled fury.
 Sweat-sodden about his chest will stretch the strap of each man's protective shield, the hand that grips his spear will weary; sweat-sodden the horse as it strains at his polished chariot. 390
 But any man I observe away from the fighting, who's minded to hang back by the curved ships—he'll no longer be able to rely on eluding the dogs and the birds of prey."

 So he spoke, and the Argives gave a great shout, like a wave stirred by a southern gale, crashing into some lofty headland, 395 a jutting rock face ever assailed by breakers, that come at it from all quarters, driven by every wind.
 Up they got, and scattered hurriedly to the ships, built fires by their shelters, and set about their dinner;
 and each man sacrificed to one of the immortal gods, 400 praying for escape from death and the grind of battle.
 But the lord of men, Agamemnōn now sacrificed an ox—
 a fat one, five years old—to Kronos's almighty son, and summoned the leading elders of all the Achaians: Nestōr, first of all, and noble Idomeneus, 405 then, both the Aiases and the son of Tydeus, and, sixth, Odysseus, Zeus's equal in counsel.
 Menelaös, great at the war cry, chose to come with them,

2. The aegis is a divine appurtenance variously likened to a shield, wrap, or apron. It seems to vary with the bearer, which suggests that there may have been more than one: e.g., in Zeus's hands it is a shield, made for him by Hēphaistos; but for Athēnē it is some sort of a wrap, with the Gorgon's head woven into it. In the Iliad it is variously described as fringed, tasseled, golden, gleaming, and immortal. Its function is both to protect its wearer and to cause terror in the viewer, mostly on the battlefield.

for he knew in his heart how hard-pressed his brother was.
 They stood there around the ox, and held up the barley groats, 410 and in prayer the lord Agamemnōn spoke among them: “Zeus, most glorious, greatest, lord of the storm clouds, heaven-dweller—let not the sun go down, or darkness come upon us until I have levelled Priam’s palace, left it blackened with smoke, filled its gates with devouring fire, 415 and slashed open Hektōr’s tunic about his chest, ripped up by the bronze; and may many of his companions fall prone in the dust around him, teeth grinding into earth.”

So he spoke. But not yet did Kronos’s son grant him this;
 the sacrifice he accepted, but laid yet more grim toil upon him. 420

When they had prayed, and scattered the barley groats, first pulling back the victims’ heads, they slaughtered and flayed them, cut out the thighs, wrapped them up in a double layer of fat, and placed over them cuts of raw meat. These then they burned on split billets, stripped of all their leaves, 425 while the innards they spitted and roasted in Hēphaistos’s flames.
 But when the thighs were well broiled and they’d tasted the innards, then they chopped up the rest, threaded the bits on skewers, grilled them with care, then drew them all off, and once they were through with their work, and the meal had been got ready, 430
 they feasted, and no one’s heart lacked a fair share in the feasting.
 But when they had satisfied their desire for food and drink, first to address them was the Gerēnian horseman Nestōr: “Most glorious son of Atreus, lord of men, Agamemnōn, let us waste no more time on discussion, nor any longer 435 postpone the action the god himself puts in our hands!
 Come now, let the heralds of the bronze-clad Achaians gather the troops ship by ship and make proclamation, while we all go in a body through the Achaians’ broad camp, the quicker to stir up their sharp-edged martial spirit.” 440

So he spoke. Agamemnōn, lord of men, did not ignore him:
 at once he ordered the clear-voiced heralds to summon the long-haired Achaians to battle by proclamation.
 They so proclaimed, and the men assembled quickly.
 Those around Atreus’s son, the princes, Zeus’s nurslings, 445 hastened to marshal the ranks. Grey-eyed Athēnē joined them, wearing the precious aegis, ageless, immortal, with a hundred dangling tassels, all of pure gold, and each finely woven, and worth the price of a hundred oxen.

 Thus adorned she flashed swiftly through the Achaian host, 450 urging them onward: in each man's heart she stirred strength for ceaseless warfare and fighting, so that to them war at once became sweeter than any thought of returning in their hollow ships to the dear land of their fathers.

As annihilating fire burns up a boundless forest 455 on some mountain summit, and the glare can be seen far off, so, as they marched, from their marvelous bronze gear the burnished radiance gleamed up through the air to heaven; and just as the many species of winged creatures—wild geese, or cranes, or swans with their long necks— 460 on the Asian meadowland beside Kaÿstrios's streams fly hither and thither exulting in their wings' strength, then settle clamorously, and the meadowland resounds, just so from the ships and huts their many nations poured forth to Skamandros's plain, and beneath the tread 465 of men and horses the earth re-echoed, a fearsome sound, and they halted and stood, in Skamandros's flowery meadow, thousands strong, like leaves and blossoms in their season.
 Like the multitudinous clusters of teeming flies that swarm round the shepherd's steading in the springtime 470 when milk comes flooding the buckets, in such numbers they stood on the plain, the long-haired Achaians, against the Trojans, eager, determined, bent on their destruction.
 And as goatherds easily sort out their wide-scattered herds of goats when they've mingled for pasturage, so now the Achaians 475 were positioned, some here, some there, to join in battle by their leaders, among them the lord Agamemnōn, in eyes and head like Zeus who delights in the thunderbolt, like Arēs in girth, and with the chest of Poseidōn.
 As one steer in a herd of cattle stands out, far above them all— 480 the bull, distinguished among the cows assembled round it—such a one on that day Zeus rendered Atreus's son, preeminent among many, of heroes the foremost.

Tell me now, Muses, who have your dwellings on Olympos—for you are present, and goddesses, and know all things, whereas 485 we mortals have only hearsay, know nothing for certain—who were the leaders and princes of the Danaäns?

 As for the common throng, I could not report or name them, not even were ten tongues mine, all in ten mouths, an unbreakable voice, and a brazen heart within me, 490 had I not the Olympian Muses, daughters of Zeus of the aegis, to remind me of all those who came below Ilion. Now I'll list the ships' commanders and all their squadrons.

Pēneleōs and Lēitos were leaders of the Boiōtians, with Arkesilaos and Prothoēnōr and Klonios, 495 those who dwelt in Hyria and rocky Aulis, in Schoinos and Skōlos and many-spurred Eteōnos, in Thespeia, Graia, Mykalessos with its broad dancing floor;
 those who dwelt around Harma and Eilesion and Erythrai, those who held Eleōn³ and Hylē and Peteōn, 500 Ōkalea and Medeōn, the well-wrought citadel, Kōpai, Eutrēsis, dove-haunted Thisbē; those who dwelt in Korōneia and grassy Haliartos, who held Plataia and who dwelt in Glisas; those who held lower Thēbē, the well-wrought citadel, and 505 sacred Onchēstos, the bright grove of Poseidon; those who held grape-rich Arnē, and Mideia, sacrosanct Nisa, and borderland Anthēdōn.
 Of these there came fifty ships, and aboard each one a hundred and twenty young men of the Boiōtians. 510

Those who lived in Asplēdōn and Minyan Orchomenos, them Askalaphos led and Ialmenos, sons of Arēs, whom Astyoche bore, in the house of Azeios's son Aktōr—a bashful virgin, she went up into her chamber to mighty Arēs, who lay there with her in secret. 515
 With these were mustered thirty hollow vessels.

The Phōkians were led by Schedios and Epistrophos, offspring of Iphitos, great-hearted Naubolos's son.
 These were the ones who held Kyparissos and rocky Pythō, sacrosanct Krīsa and Daulis and Panopeus, 520

3. It is interesting, and significant, that Eleōn (like some other places listed in the Catalogue) was completely unknown until the reading of the Linear B tablets, indicating that at least part of the Catalogue dated back to Mycenaean times.

who dwelt around Anemōreia and Hyampolis, who lived beside Kēphisos, that noble river,
 and held Lilaia by the springs of Kēphisos.
 Along with these there followed forty black vessels.
 Carefully they ordered the ranks of the Phōkians, set them 525 on the left wing, ready for battle, beside the Boiōtians.

Oileus's swift son was leader of the Lokrians: Aias, Aias the lesser, not huge like Aias Telamōn's son, but smaller by far. Slight of build, he wore a linen corselet, yet with the spear outclassed all Hellenes and Achaians. 530
 These men dwelt in Kynos, Opoeis, Kalliaros, Bēssa and Skarphē and beautiful Augeiai, Tarphē, and Thronion by Boagrius's streams.
 Along with Aias there followed forty black ships, belonging to the Lokrians who dwell across from sacred Euboa. 535

Next, those who held Euboa, the fierce-breathing Abantes: Chalkis and Eretria and grape-rich Histiaia, seaside Kērinthos and Dion's steep citadel, and those who held Kárystos, those who dwelt in Styra, whose leader was Elephēnōr, companion of Arēs, 540 Chalkōdōn's son, the great-hearted Abantes' commander.
 With him the Abantes came, all runners, back hair long, spearmen hot with their out-thrust ash-wood lances to rip through the corselets that covered their enemies' chests.
 Along with him there followed forty black vessels. 545

Then there were those who held Athens, the well-built citadel, land of great-hearted Erechtheus, whom once Zeus's daughter Athēnē reared—the grain-giving plough-land bore him—and established in Athens, in her own rich shrine; and there with bulls and rams Athenian young men 550 continue to seek his favor through the circling years;
 of these Menestheus was leader, the son of Peteōs.
 No other man on earth was as yet his equal at marshalling chariots and shield-bearing warriors:
 Nestōr alone could match him, for he was the elder. 555
 Along with him there followed fifty black vessels.

Aias from Salamis led twelve ships, and as leader stationed them where the ranks of the Athenians stood.

Those who held Argos and high-walled Tiryns and Hermione and Asinē, lying on the deep gulf, with 560 Troizēn and Eïonai and vine-clad Epídauros, and Aigina and Masēs, home to the young men of the Achaians:
 these Diomēdēs commanded, he of the great war cry, and Sthenelos, the dear son of wide-renowned Kapaneus, and with them as third came Euryalos, a godlike mortal, 565 of king Mēkisteus the son, and grandson of Talaös—but Diomēdēs of the great war cry was lord over them all.
 Along with them there followed eighty black vessels.

Those who held Mykēnai, that well-wrought citadel.
 and wealthy Korinthos, and well-wrought Kleōnai, 570 and dwelt in Orneai and lovely Araithyréa, and Sikyōn, over which Adrēstos first was king; those who held Hyperēsía, steep Gonoessa, and Pellēnē, who dwelt around Aígion and all the length of Aigialos, and around broad Helikē: commander 575 of their hundred vessels was lord Agamemnōn, son of Atreus, and with him came the most troops by far, and the best, and among them he himself stood, armed in his gleaming bronze, exulting, preeminent among all the heroes, since he was the greatest, and brought by far the largest force. 580

And those who held hollow ravine-scored Lakedaimōn, Pharis and Sparta and dove-haunted Messē, those who dwelt in Bryseiai and lovely Augeiai, who held Amyklai and Helos, the coastal fortress, and Laäs, and dwelt around Oitylos: they were commanded by 585 his brother, Menelaös, of the great war cry, who brought sixty vessels. These were stationed apart, and he moved among them in person, confident in his purpose, urging his men to battle, since above all his spirit longed to be revenged for the struggles and groans over Helen. 590

And those who dwelt in Pylos and lovely Arēnē, and Thryon, the ford of Alpheios, and well-built Aipy, who occupied Kyparissēis and Amphigeneia, Pteleos, Helos, and Dōrion—where the Muses encountered Thamyris the Thracian, and put an end to his singing, 595 on his way from Oichalia, from the house of Eurytos

the Oichalian, for his boast that he'd win, even if the Muses themselves were to sing against him, the daughters of Zeus of the aegis; but they in their fury maimed him, deprived him of his marvelous singing, made him forget his skill with the lyre—: 600 of these the Gerēnian horseman, Nestōr, was leader, and with him were mustered ninety hollow vessels.

Those who possessed Arkadía, below Kyllēnē's steep mountain, by the tomb of Aipytos, where combatants are close fighters;
those who dwelt in Pheneos and flock-rich Orchomenos, 605 in Rhipē and Stratiē and wind-scoured Enispē, those whose homes were Tegea and lovely Mantinea, who held Stymphalos and dwelt in Parrhasía: these were commanded by Ankaïos's son, the lord Agapēnōr, with sixty ships, and aboard each ship came many 610 Arkadian warriors, well skilled in warfare's business.
For Agamemnōn himself, son of Atreus, lord of men, had given them well-benched ships in which to traverse the wine-faced deep, seafaring being no concern of theirs.

For those who lived in Bouprasion and noble Ēlis— 615 all that Hyrminē and Myrsinos way out on the frontier and the Ōlenian rock and Alēsion enclose between them—there were four leaders, and each of these accompanied by ten swift ships, with many Epeians aboard them. Of these some were led by Amphimachos and Thalpios, sons, one of 620 Kteatos, the other of Eurytos, both blood-kin to Aktōr; others by Amarynkeus's son, the mighty Diōrēs, while the fourth group was led by godlike Polyxeinos, son of royal Agasthenēs, whose father was Augeias.

Those from Doulichion and the sacred Echinean 625 islands, who live facing Ēlis, across the salt water, were led by Megēs, a man the equal of Arēs, Phyleus's son.
His sire, Zeus's nursling, Phyleus the horseman, long ago moved away to Doulichion after quarrelling with his father.
Along with Megēs there followed forty black vessels. 630

Odysseus led the high-spirited Kephallēnians, who held Ithákē and Nēriton with its rippling leafage, and dwelt in Krokyleia and rugged Aigilips, with those who held Zákynthos, those who lived around Samē, and those who held the mainland and the facing coastline: 635 of them Odysseus was leader, Zeus's equal in counsel.

With him there followed twelve ships, vermillion-prowed.

The Aitōlians were led by Thoas, Andraimōn's son:
the inhabitants of Pleurōn, Ōlenos and Pylēnē, Chalkis by the seashore and rock-strewn Kalydōn; 640 for great-hearted Oineus's sons were no longer living, nor he himself; dead, too, was fair-haired Meleagros, so on Thoas the absolute rule of Aitōlians had devolved.
Accompanying him there followed forty black vessels.

Of the Krētans Idomeneus, famed spearman, was the leader: 645 of those who held Knossos and Gortyn with its high battlements, Lyktos, Mīlētos, and chalk-bright Lykastos, Phaistos and Rhytion, well-populated cities; and others scattered through Krētē of the hundred cities.
Of these, then, Idomeneus, famed spearman, was the leader, 650 with Mērionēs, a match for the man-slaying War God himself.
Accompanying them there followed eighty black vessels.

Tlēpolemos, son of Hēraklēs, a man both brave and tall, from Rhodos brought nine ships of the lordly Rhodians, who occupied Rhodos in three separate settlements: 655 Lindos, Ialysos, and chalk-bright Kameiros.

Of these, then, Tlēpolemos, famed spearman, was the leader, whom Astyocheia bore to that mighty force Hēraklēs. Her he brought out of Ephyrē from the Sellēis river, after sacking many a city of warriors, Zeus's nurslings. 660

But Tlēpolemos, when a grown man in their well-built home, soon afterwards killed his father's maternal uncle, already an elderly man—Likymnios, scion of Arēs.

At once he fitted out ships, raised a large body of men, and fled across the sea, since he'd already been threatened 665
by other sons and grandsons of the mighty force Hēraklēs.

He came to Rhodos, a wanderer, suffering hardship, and there his people, settled in three tribal divisions, were favored by Zeus, whose rule is over both gods and mortals;
the son of Kronos showered marvelous wealth upon them. 670

Nireus too from Symē brought three trim vessels:
Nireus, Aglaïa's son by the lord Charōpos,

Nireus, the handsomest man who came under Ilion of all other Danaäns after Pēleus's blameless son—but a weakling, and only a few troops accompanied him. 675

Those who held Nisyros, Karpathos and Kasos and Kōs, Eurypylos' city, and the Kalydnian islands, had as commanders Pheidippos and Antiphos, the two sons of king Thessalos, whose father was Hēraklēs.
Along with them there were mustered thirty hollow vessels. 680

Now, too, all those who lived in Pelasgian Argos, who were settled in Alos and Alopē, whose homes were in Trachis, who occupied Phthiē and Hellas, the land of fair women, and were known as Myrmidons, Hellēnes, and Achaians—of the fifty ships of these men Achilles was the commander. 685
But to warfare's grievous clamor they gave no thought, having no one to deploy them into the battle-line, for the swift-footed noble Achilles lay idle by the ships, enraged on account of Briseis, the girl with lovely hair, whom he'd taken from Lyrnessos after much hard work— 690 destroying Lyrnessos and the walls of Thēbē,⁴ laying low Mynēs and Epistrophos, spear-battlers both, sons of King Evēnos, Selēpos's son. And now grieving for her he lay there—but would rise up soon enough.

Those who held Phylakē and flowery Pyrasos, 695 Dēmētēr's precinct, and Itōn, mother of flocks, and seaside Antrōn and turf-bedded Pteleos: of them warlike Prōtesilāos was the commander while he still lived; but by then black earth already held him.
His wife, cheeks torn in grief, was left there in Phylakē 700 with a half-built house, for a Dardanian slew him as he leapt from his ship, the very first of the Achaians.
Yet his men did not go leaderless, though they missed their leader, being mustered by Podarkēs, offshoot of Arēs—son of Iphiklos, grandson of Phylakos rich in flocks, 705 full brother to Prōtesilāos, he of the great heart, but younger-born; the elder was the more warlike, heroic Prōtesilāos, the warrior. Still, his people

4. This is Thēbē (Thebes) in Asia Minor, to be distinguished from Boiōtian Thēbē and Thēbē in Egypt: see Glossary.

did not lack a leader, though missing their good captain.
Along with him there followed forty black vessels. 710

Those who dwelt in Pherai beside Lake Boibēis, and in Boibē and Glaphyrai and well-built Iolkos: they were led, with eleven ships, by Admētos's dear son Eumēlos, born to Admētos of that paragon among women, Alkēstis, the most beautiful of the daughters of Pelias. 715

Those who dwelt in Méthōne and Thaumakia, who held Meliboia and rugged Olizōn, were commanded by Philoktētēs, an experienced archer, with their seven ships, in each of which were embarked fifty rowers, well skilled at hard fighting with the bow. 720
But he himself lay on an island, racked by violent pains:
sacred Lēmnos, where the Achaians' sons had left him afflicted with a bad wound from a vicious water-serpent.
There he lay in his agony; but soon the Argives beside their ships would have King Philoktētēs very much in mind. 725 Yet his men did not go leaderless, though they missed their leader, being mustered by Medōn, Oileus's bastard son, whom Rhēnē bore to Oileus, sacker of cities.

Those who occupied Triikka and crag-bound Ithōmē, and Oichalia, city of Eurytos the Oichalian, 730 had as their leaders Asklēpios's two sons, skilled healers both, Podaleirios and Macháōn.
Along with them there were mustered thirty hollow vessels.

Those who held Ormenios and the spring of Hypereia, those who held Asterion and the white peaks of Titános 735 were led by Eurypylos, Euaimōn's splendid son.
Along with them there followed forty black ships.

Those who held Argissa and were domiciled in Gyrtōnē, Orthē, and Ēlōnē, and Oloössōn the white city, were led by that staunch fighter Polypoitēs, son 740 of Peirithōos—whom immortal Zeus begot—being conceived to Peirithōos by renowned Hippodameia that day he got his revenge on the shaggy Centaurs, drove them out of Pēlion, sent them packing as far as the Aithikēs—not alone: there went with him Leonteus, scion of Arēs, 745 son of bold-hearted Korōnos, Kaineus's son.

Along with them there followed forty black vessels.

Gouneus from Kyphos brought two and twenty vessels; with him there came the Eniēnes and the battle-tough Peraiboians who made their homes in the region of hard-wintered Dōdōna, 750 and worked the land around the beautiful Titaressos, whose sweet-flowing waters join those of the Pēneios, yet do not mingle with Pēneios's silvery eddies, but flow over and separate from them, as though they were olive oil, for this is a branch of Styx, the terrible oath-river. 755

The Magnēsians were led by Prothoös son of Teuthrēdōn.
Around the Pēneios and Pēlion's rippling woodlands they made their homes: swift Prothoös was their commander.
Along with them there followed forty black vessels.

These were the Danaäns' leaders and princes. But who 760 was outstanding among them? Who, now tell me, Muse, among all those men, and their horses, that served with Atreus's sons?

Of horses, the best by far were the mares of Phērēs' grandson, those that Eumēlos drove, bird-swift in their running, same coats, same age, even-backed as though ruled to a plumb-line. 765 Bred in Pēreia they were, by silver-bowed Apollo, both mares, both bearing within them the fearfulness of battle.
Of men, the best was Aias, Telamōn's son—that is, while Achilles still nursed his wrath, who was far the strongest, he, and the horses that carried Pēleus's splendid son. 770
But now by the curved seafaring ships he lay, consumed by fury against Agamemnōn, shepherd of the people, Atreus's son; while along the seashore his followers amused themselves with casting the discus and javelin, and archery, while their horses, each by his owner's chariot, 775 stood cropping marsh-parsley and clover, while the chariots themselves, well-covered, were stored away in their masters' huts, and the men, missing their warlike leader, wandered about in the camp, and did no fighting.

The army advanced as though the whole world was on fire, 780 and the earth groaned under them, as under Zeus with his angry thunderbolts, when he hammers the land around Typhoios, among the Arimoi, where men say is Typhoios's bed.

So under their marching feet the earth groaned out aloud as quickly they made their advance across the plain. 785

To the Trojans wind-footed swift Iris came as a messenger from Zeus of the aegis, bearing a grievous message.
They were met in assembly at the gates of Priam, all of them gathered together, young men and elders.
Standing close, swift-footed Iris now addressed them, 790 making her voice like that of Priam's son Polītēs, who sat as the Trojans' lookout, trusting his speed of foot, on top of the burial mound of aged Aisyētēs, watching for when the Achaians should set out from their ships.
As him, then, swift-footed Iris now addressed Priam: 795
"Old sir, as ever, unending talk is your pleasure, just as in peacetime: but now unceasing war has arisen.
Many battles of warriors have I taken part in,
But never yet have I seen so vast or strong an army—overwhelming, like leaves of the forest or grains of sand— 800 as this now crossing the plain to attack our city.
Hektōr, to you above all I give this command for action:
Numerous here are the allies spread out in Priam's great city, men from many lands, all speaking different tongues.
So let each man give the signal to those he commands, 805 marshal his own citizens, then lead them forth."

So she spoke,
and Hektōr did not mistake the goddess's voice, but at once broke up the assembly, and they rushed to arms.
All the gates were flung open, and the troops poured through them, on foot and mounted both, and a mighty hubbub arose. 810

Set in front of the city there is a steep mound, far out in the plain, with a clear space all around it.
This men know as Baticia, that is, Bramble Hill, whereas the immortals call it the grave-mound of Myrīnē the dancer.
There, now, the Trojans and their allies marshaled their forces. 815

The Trojans were led by great bright-helmeted Hektōr, Priam's son, and with him by far the most and the best troops were deployed, all eager to battle it out with the spear.

The Dardanians were led by Anchīsēs' valiant son Aineias, conceived to Anchīsēs by shining Aphroditē 820 among the spurs of Ida, a goddess lying with a mortal.
 He was not alone: with him came Antēnōr's two sons, Archelochos and Akamas, well trained in all fighting skills.

Those who dwelt in Zeleia, below the lowest spur of Ida, wealthy men, who drink the dark water of the Aisēpos, 825 Trojans, had as their leader Lykaōn's splendid son, Pandaros, gifted with bowmanship by Apollo himself.

Those who held Adrēsteia and the district of Apaisos, who held Pityeia and Tēreia's steep mountain, were led by Adrēstos and Amphios, he of the linen corselet, the sons 830 of Merōps of Perkōtē, who outstripped all other men in seercraft, and tried to prevent his sons from going off to murderous warfare. But the two of them would not obey him,
 for the spirits of black death were urging them onward.

Those who lived in the region of Perkōtē and Praktion, 835 who held Sēstos and Abydos and noble Arisbē, were led by Asios, son of Hyrtakos, a leader of men: Asios, son of Hyrtakos, who was brought from Arisbē by his tall sorrel horses, from the Sellēis river.
 Hippothoōs led the tribes of fierce Pelasgian spearmen, 840 who had their homes in rich-soiled Lárisa: they were led by Hippothoōs and Pylaïos, scion of Arēs, two sons of Pelasgian Lēthos, Teutamos's son.

The Thracians were led by Akamas and the hero Peiroōs—all those the strong-flowing stream of Hellespont encloses. 845

Euphēmos was the leader of the Kikonian spearmen, the son of Troizēnos, Zeus's nursling, Keas's son.

Pyraichmēs led the Paiōnians with their back-bent bows from far away out of Amydōn, from the broad stream of Axios, whose waters are the loveliest flowing on this earth. 850

The Paphlagōnians were led by stout-hearted Pylaimenēs from the land of the Enetoi, home to a breed of wild mules.
 These held Kytōros and dwelt around Sēsamos, in their famous homes beside the Parthenios river, in Krōmna, Aigialos, and lofty Erythinoi. 855

The Halizōnians had Odios and Epistrophos as their leaders, from far-distant Alybē, where is the birth of silver.

The Mysians were led by Chromis and the bird-seer Ennomos, who despite his seercraft could not stop the black death-spirit, but died at the hands of Aiakos's swift-foot grandson⁵ 860 in the river, along with the other Trojans he cut down there.

The Phrygians' leaders were Phorkys and godlike Askanios from distant Askania, eager to join the press of battle.

The Maiōnians were commanded by Mesthlēs and Antiphos, Talaimenēs' two sons, whom the Gygaian lake-nymph bore, 865 and they led the Maiōnians whose homeland was under Tmōlos.

Nastēs commanded the Karians, men of barbarous speech, who held Mīlētōs, Mount Phthirēs with its dense woodlands, Maiandros's streams, and Mykalē's rocky heights.
They had Amphinachos and Nastēs as their leaders, 870 Nastēs and Amphinachos, Nomiōn's splendid sons.
Amphinachos went off to war decked out in gold like a girl, the young fool: that could not save him from a miserable end.
He died at the hands of the swift-foot grandson of Aiakos in the river, and smart Achilles carried off the gold. 875

Sarpēdōn and noble Glaukos led the Lycians from far-distant Lycia, from the eddying Xanthos river.

5. Achilles.

Book 3

When both sides had been marshalled, with their leaders, the Trojans advanced with clamor and loud cries, like birds, like the clamor of cranes that goes up high to heaven when they're escaping winter storms and endless rain, and, calling, fly towards the streams of Ocean, 5 to Pygmy warriors bringing death and destruction down through the air, an offer of grim conflict.
But the Achaians came on in silence, breathing fury, all determined to stand firm, each one by another.

As when on a mountaintop the south wind sheds thick mist, 10 no friend to the shepherds, but for a robber better than night, and a man can see no further than he throws a stone, just so from under their feet a thick dust cloud went up as they marched on, making good speed across the plain.

When the two sides had come together, within close range, 15 out from the Trojans Aléxandros, divinely handsome, pranced, a leopard skin on his shoulders, with a curved bow and a sword, clutching a couple of javelins tipped with bronze, and challenged the best of the Argives, any of them, to meet him face to face, in fearsome combat. 20

Now when war-minded Menelaös first caught sight of him emerging out of the crowd with his lengthy strides, then, as a lion rejoices at finding, when ravenous, some hefty carcass—an antlered stag or a wild goat—and eat it he must, despite being set upon by swift 25 hunting dogs and tough youngsters, so Menelaös delighted at seeing Aléxandros, divinely handsome, with his own eyes, and, hot for revenge on the wrongdoer, promptly sprang, fully armed, from his chariot to the ground.

But when Aléxandros, divinely handsome, saw him 30 show up in the front ranks, he was panic-stricken at heart, and shrank back among his countrymen, evading fate;
and just as a man at the sight of a snake retreats in some mountain glen, and trembling seizes his limbs, and he backs away once more, and green pallor drains his cheeks, 35 so into the crowd of lordly Trojans Aléxandros, divinely handsome, in fear of Atreus's son, now shrank back.

But Hektōr, seeing him, rebuked him with shaming words:
“Wretched Paris, so handsome, so mad for women, seducer,
I wish you had never been born or had died unmarried! 40
Yes, that I'd prefer: far better than being left with you as this object of other men's ridicule and contempt.
Oh, they'll snigger aloud, indeed, will the long-haired Achaians, and say, here's a leading man who gets to be champion on good looks alone, without strength or courage in his heart. 45 Were you such a one when in your seafaring vessels you sailed the deep, with the trusty comrades you'd mustered, consorted with foreigners, brought back a beautiful woman from a far-off land, the child of warrior spearmen, a great grief to your father, your city, your whole nation: 50 a delight to our enemies, to yourself a cause of shame?
So will you not, then, confront the warlike Menelaös, find out the kind of man whose lusty bedmate you've taken?
No help for you from the lyre, or the gifts of Aphrodītē, or your hair or your good looks, when you're laid low in the dust. 55
The Trojans are arrant cowards: otherwise by now you'd be wearing a shower of stones for all your evil deeds.”

To him then Aléxandros, divinely handsome, replied: “Hektōr, since you rebuke me justly, nor more than is proper—always your heart is like the unwearying axe blade 60 struck through a beam by some craftsman who uses his skill to shape a ship's timber, and it adds force to his own effort: just so is the heart in your breast unshakable—do not bring up against me the sweet gifts of golden Aphrodītē.
Not to be cast aside are the gods' illustrious gifts, 65 of whatever sort—even if no man would choose them.
But now, if you want me to play the warrior, to join battle, then make the other Trojans sit down, and all the Achaians, and set me there in the middle with warlike Menelaös to battle it out for Helen and the sum of her possessions. 70 Whichever one of us wins, and proves himself the stronger, let him claim the goods and the woman, and go off home with them.
You others must swear solemn oaths of friendship, and then you can live on in rich-soiled Troy, while they sail home to horse-pasturing Argos and Achaia's lovely women." 75

So he spoke, and Hektōr, delighted by his proposal, went into the middle ground, held back the Trojans' ranks, grasping his spear in the middle, and they all sat down.
Not so the long-haired Achaians, who chose him as their target, aiming arrows at him, and showering him with stones, 80 till there came a loud shout from the lord of men, Agamemnōn:
"Argives, hold off! Don't shoot, you young Achaians!
He's trying to tell us something, is bright-helmeted Hektōr."

So he spoke: they held back from fighting, and all fell silent readily, while Hektōr, between the armies, addressed them: 85
"Hear from me, you Trojans and you well-greaved Achaians, the words of Aléxandros, over whom this strife has arisen.
What he asks is that all the Achaians and the rest of the Trojans lay aside their fine arms and armor on the bountiful earth, while he himself, in the middle, and warlike Menelaös 90 battle it out alone for Helen and all her possessions.
Whichever one wins, and proves himself the stronger, let him claim the goods and the woman, and go off home with them,
and let the rest of us swear solemn oaths of friendship."

So he spoke: all fell hushed and silent. Menelaös 95 then spoke up among them, he of the great war cry:
"Hear me too now, since it's my heart that this agony hurts worst. High time, I hold, for both sides to disengage, Argives and Trojans: you've suffered troubles galore on account of my quarrel since Aléxandros began it. 100 Whichever one of us two has death fixed as his destiny, let him die; but you others should be parted without delay.
Fetch here two lambs, one white, and the other black, for Earth and Sun, while for Zeus we provide a third.
And bring Priam the mighty hither, to swear an oath 105 in person—his sons being arrogant and faithless—lest overstepping the mark someone void oaths that were sworn by Zeus. Younger men's ideas are forever flighty, but whatever an old man's involved in, he'll always look forward and back as well, ensure what's best for both sides." 110

So he spoke, and both Achaians and Trojans were joyful, hoping now for an end to warfare's wretchedness.
 They held back their horses in line, stepped down from their chariots, took off arms and armor, laid them out on the ground, each close to the next man's, with little space between them. 115

Hektōr now dispatched two heralds to the city to bring the lambs at once and to summon Priam.
 Talthybios meanwhile lord Agamemnōn sent back to the hollow ships, with orders to fetch a lamb nor did he fail in obedience to noble Agamemnōn. 120

Now Iris went as a messenger to white-armed Helen in the form of her husband's sister, the wife of Antēnōr's son, her whom Antēnōr's son, the lordly Helikaōn, had married: Laodikē, the fairest of Priam's daughters.
 Helen she found in her quarters, weaving a great web, 125 double-sized, purple, including the many struggles between horse-taming Trojans and bronze-corseleted Achaians endured on her account at the hands of Arēs.

Standing close, swift-footed Iris thus addressed her:
 "Come with me, dear sister, to see the wondrous conduct 130 of the horse-taming Trojans and bronze-corseleted Achaians!
 They who before were waging, one side against the another, grievous war in the plain, hearts bent on deadly battle, now are sitting in silence, their conflict abandoned, leaning on their shields, their lances planted beside them; 135 for Aléxandros now and the warlike Menelaös with their long spears are about to battle it out over you, and you'll be named the dear wife of whichever one's the victor."

With these words, the goddess put sweet yearning in Helen's heart for her former husband, for her city and for her parents. 140 At once she put on a veil of white linen, and hurried out of her private chamber, shedding round tears:
 not alone, for two maidservants went along with her, Aithrē, daughter of Pittheus, and ox-eyed Klyménē, and quickly they then came to where the Skaian Gates were. 145

Now Priam and his companions—Pánthoös, Thymoitéēs, Lampos and Klytios, Hiketáōn, scion of Arēs, Oukalegōn and Antēnōr, astute men both, the community's elders—sat there above the Skaian Gates, too old now for fighting, but still most valiant 150 talkers, like cicadas, that in the woodland, aloft in trees, emit their fine sawing utterance:

 such were the Trojans' leaders, perched on the ramparts.
 When they saw Helen there on the ramparts, approaching, softly they spoke winged words to one another: 155
 "The Trojans and well-greaved Achaeans cannot be blamed for enduring woes so long over such a woman:
 terribly like the deathless goddesses she is to look at.
 Yet even so, being such, let her sail away, not linger here to bring grief to us, and our children after us." 160 So they spoke. But Priam called out, summoning Helen:
 "Come over here, dear child, and sit beside me, to catch sight of your former husband, your friends and kinsmen—in my eyes you're not to blame, I rather blame the gods who stirred up against me this wretched Achaian war— 165 and to put a name for me to that huge warrior down there, that Achaian leader, of such stature and so strong:
 others there may be taller still by a head, and yet so fine a man have I never set eyes on, nor one so majestic in bearing—he looks to be of royal blood." 170 Then Helen, glorious among women, replied in these words:
 "I revere you, my husband's dear father, I stand in awe of you!
 A sorry death should have been my choice when I came here following your son, abandoning marriage and family, my growing daughter, my sweet loving girl companions. 175
 But that's not how things turned out, and I'm worn with weeping.
 Still, I'll answer the question you put to me: that man is the son of Atreus, wide-ruling Agamemnōn, a noble king, a strong spearman, and, formerly, brother-in-law to me, the bitch—if all this really happened." 180
 So she spoke, and the old man marveled, and said:
 "Ah, happy son of Atreus, fortune's child, blest by the gods!
 How many Achaian youths have been made subject to you!
 Time was when I traveled to vine-rich Phrygia, where I viewed Phrygian troops in great numbers, with their spirited horses, 185 the men of Otreus and of Mygdōn the godlike, at that time encamped along the banks of the Sangarios river.

For I too, being their ally, was then numbered among them that day when the Amazons came, a match for men—yet not even they were as many as these sharp-eyed Achaians.” 190

Next the old man’s eye picked out Odysseus, and, pointing, “Tell me, dear child,” he asked, “about that one too—who is he?
By a head he’s shorter than Agamemnōn, son of Atreus, but looks broader in the chest and across the shoulders.
His gear he’s left on the nurturing earth, but he himself 195 goes striding through the ranks like a ram. Yes, yes indeed, it’s a ram of which he reminds me, a thick-fleeced bellwether prowling through a great flock of white sheep.”

Then Helen,
scion of Zeus, made him the following answer:
“That man is the son of Laertēs, resourceful Odysseus, 200 who was reared in the land of Ithákē, a rugged dominion, and knows all manner of wiles and sharp devices.”
Then sagacious Antēnōr in turn addressed her:

“Lady, what you just said is indeed the truth. He came here once before, on a mission, did the noble Odysseus, 205 concerning yourself, along with warlike Menelaös:
it was I who entertained and welcomed them in my halls, and took heed of the stature of both, and of their sharp devices.
Now when they joined the Trojans in assembly, and stood up, broad-shouldered Menelaös was taller; but with both seated, 210 then Odysseus it was who looked the more majestic.
And when they began to weave their words and devices, Menelaös certainly spoke with nimble fluency, in few words, but with clarity, being no blabbermouth, nor given to off-the-mark rambling, though he was the younger. 215

But whenever resourceful Odysseus got up to speak, he’d stand there looking down, eyes fixed on the ground, not moving that staff of his either forward or back, but clutching it, rooted firm, like some ignorant fellow—you’d think him just a curmudgeon, the merest simpleton. 220
But when he let out that great voice from his chest—the words resembling some driving wintry snowstorm—

then there was no living man that could match Odysseus, and we no longer bothered to question his appearance.”

Thirdly, looking at Aias, the old man asked: “Now who is that Achaian out there, so sturdy and tall, outstripping the other Argives in height by his head and broad shoulders?” 225

Then long-robed Helen, glorious among women, replied:
“That great giant is Aias, the Achaians’ bulwark, and there beyond him, among the Krêtans, Idomeneus stands, godlike, the Krêtan captains all gathered round him. 230

Often he was the guest of warlike Menelaös in our house, whenever he came across from Krêtē.
All the others, too, I see now, every sharp-eyed Achaian—
I know them all well, could tell you all their names— 235

two only I cannot see, two high commanders, Kastōr the horse breaker, Polydeukēs the skilled boxer, brothers of mine, all born of the same mother.
Either they didn’t come with them from lovely Lakedaimōn, or, if they did make the trip in their seagoing vessels, 240 they’re not willing now to join these men in combat through fear of all the shame and reproaches leveled at me.”

So she spoke; but them the nurturing earth already held under in Lakedaimōn, their dear native land.

Now heralds brought through the city the gods’ oath-offerings: 245

two lambs, with heartwarming wine, fruit of the tilled soil, in a goatskin bag, while the herald Idaios carried a shining wine bowl, together with golden goblets.

Standing by the old man, he called on him, saying: “Up now, son of Laomedōn! You are summoned by the leaders 250 of the horse-breaking Trojans and the bronze-corseleted Achaians

to come down into the plain and swear a solemn pact.
For Menelaös the warlike and Aléxandros are to do battle with long spears over the woman; and whichever of them wins, to him will go both the woman and all her possessions. 255

The rest must swear solemn oaths of friendship, and then we can live on in rich-soiled Troy, while they sail home to horse-pasturing Argos and Achaia’s lovely women.”

So he spoke. The old man shivered, but ordered his comrades to yoke the horses, and they quickly obeyed him. 260

Then Priam mounted and gathered the reins, and Antēnōr mounted the elegant chariot by his side, and together they drove the swift horses out through the Skaian gates to the plain.

When they arrived among the Trojans and the Achaians, they left the horses, stepped down on the nurturing earth, 265 and took their place amid them, between Trojans and Achaians.

Then at once there sprang up Agamemnōn, lord of men, and resourceful Odysseus, while the noble heralds brought in the victims for the gods' oaths, poured wine in the mixing bowl, and water over the hands of the kings. Then Atreus's son 270 drew out with his hand the knife he always had by him, hanging beside his sword's great sheath, and with it cut hairs from the heads of the lambs. These hairs the heralds gave out to the Trojan and the Achaian nobles. For them Atreus's son now prayed aloud, both arms upraised: 275

"Zeus, Father, ruling from Ida, most glorious, greatest,
and you, Sun, the all-seeing, all-hearing, and you rivers and earth, and you in the underworld who take vengeance on men deceased who have sworn false oaths—be you our witnesses, watch over these solemn pledges! 280

If Aléxandros should happen to kill Menelaös, then let him have and keep Helen, with all her possessions, while we sail away in our seafaring vessels. But should it befall that fair-haired Menelaös kill Aléxandros, then the Trojans must give back Helen and all her possessions, 285 and pay to the Argives such recompense as is fitting and will stay in the minds of men in time hereafter.

But if Priam and Priam's sons should not prove willing to pay recompense to us when Aléxandros is fallen, 290 then will I still fight on for such retribution, remaining here until I reach an end of warfare."

So saying, he cut the lambs' throats with the pitiless bronze, and dropped them on the ground, still gasping, their life's breath ebbing away, now the bronze had taken their strength.

Then drawing wine from the bowl they poured it into the cups, 295 and made their prayers to the gods who live for ever, and such words would one of them, Achaian or Trojan, utter:

“Zeus, greatest, most glorious, and you other immortal gods, whichever side first does violence to these oaths we swear, may their brains be spilled on the ground as is this wine, theirs and their children’s, may their wives be had by others.” 300

So they spoke, but not yet would Kronos’s son grant their prayers.

Then the scion of Dardanos, Priam, addressed them in these words:

“Now hear me, all you Trojans, all you well-greaved Achaians!
For my part, I’m going back now to windy Ilion— 305 no way could I bring myself to watch my own dear son battling it out hand to hand with warlike Menelaös.
But Zeus, I suppose, must know, and the other deathless gods, for which of these two the doom of death is decreed.”

So he, the godlike mortal, put the lambs in his chariot, 310 climbed aboard himself, and gathered the reins, and Antēnōr boarded the elegant chariot beside him, and the two set off back into Ilion together.

Now Hektōr, Priam’s son, and noble Achilles first measured out an arena, and next took lots, 315 put them in a bronze helmet, and shook them to decide which of the two should first let fly his spear of bronze.

Then the troops prayed together, lifting their hands to the gods, and words such as these would some Achaian or Trojan utter:
“Zeus, Father, ruling from Ida, most glorious, greatest, 320 whichever one it was laid these burdens on both sides, grant that he perish and enter the house of Hādēs;
but for us let there be friendship and binding oaths.”

So they spoke. Great Hektōr, bright-helmeted, shook the lots, face turned away: out jumped the lot of Paris. 325

The troops now sat down in rows, each grouped where for each his high-stepping horses waited beside his inlaid armor.¹

And now noble Aléxandros, fair-haired Helen’s husband, moved to put on round his shoulders his own fine armor.

1. This line has not occasioned as much comment as it should. Clearly, the audience is the whole army, not just the aristocratic warriors. Equally clearly, the ordinary ranks did not have horses, chariots, and expensive armor. What seems likely is that each company sat close to their captain’s chariot, using it as a marker for location.

The greaves first of all he fastened about his shins—330 finely made, and fitted with silver ankle pieces.
 Next, to cover his chest, he put on the corselet
 of his brother Lykaōn, refitted for his personal use.
 About his shoulders he slung the silver-studded sword of bronze; then came the shield, both large and sturdy,335 and on his valiant head he set his well-wrought helmet with its horsehair crest's plumes nodding terribly above him, and took a stout spear, well fitted to his grasp, while warlike Menelaōs likewise donned his battle gear.

So when they were armed, each on his side of the throng,340 they advanced to the mid-space between Trojans and Achaians, eyeing one another fiercely. Those watching were amazed, both Trojans, breakers of horses, and well-greaved Achaians, as they came to close quarters in the marked-out arena, brandishing their spears, each one full of rage at the other.345 Aléxandros first let fly his far-shadowing spear and struck Atreus's son's shield, well-balanced on every side; but the bronze spear did not break through, its point was turned in the shield's thickness. At him now charged, spear ready, Atreus's son Menelaōs, with this prayer to Zeus the Father:350
 "Zeus, Lord, grant me revenge on this man who did me wrong—the noble Aléxandros! Crush him beneath my hands, so that any man, even of those born long hereafter, may shrink from wronging the host who offers him friendship."

He spoke, then poised his far-shadowing spear and threw it355 and struck Priam's son's shield, well-balanced on every side.
 Right through the shining shield drove the heavy spear, and through the richly worked corselet it made its way:
 straight on, close in by his ribs the spear ripped through his tunic, but he leaned to one side and escaped the black death-spirit.360
 Then the son of Atreus, drawing his silver-studded sword, reached up high and struck down at the helmet's boss; but on it the sword broke in three or four pieces, escaped from his hand, so that Atreus's son cried out, eyes raised to heaven:
 "Zeus, Father, no other god is more malicious than you!365
 I thought I would get my revenge for Aléxandros's wrongdoing; instead my sword broke in my hands, while my spear flew from my grasp in vain—I failed to hit him."

With that,

he sprang, grabbed Paris's crested helmet, jerked him round, and was hauling him off towards the well-greaved Achaians, 370 choking on the sewn strap round his soft throat that was fixed tightly under his chin to hold the helmet steady.
 And he'd have dragged Paris away, won glory past measure, had not Aphrodītē, Zeus's sharp-eyed daughter, noticed, and snapped the strap—from the hide of a slaughtered bull!— 375 so that the empty helmet came away in his strong hand.
 Among the well-greaved Achaians the hero then whirled and tossed it, to be retrieved by his trusty companions, while he leapt back, in a raging passion to kill with his bronze spear. But Aphrodītē wafted Paris away, 380 easily, as a god can, veiled him in a dense mist, set him down in his own fragrant bedchamber, then herself went off to summon Helen. Her she encountered on the high rampart, and round her a throng of Trojan ladies.
 She caught hold of Helen's scented robe, and tugged it, 385 speaking to her in the likeness of an aged woman, a wool dresser, who, when Helen still lived in Lakedaimōn, worked up fine wool for her, and was one she dearly loved.
 It was in her semblance that Aphrodītē addressed her:
 "Come, now: Aléxandros is calling for you to go home! 390 He's there, in his bedchamber, on that inlaid bed, resplendent—so handsome, such fine clothes—you wouldn't think he'd just come from fighting a man, but was off to a dance, or had just finished dancing, and was sitting there—"

So she spoke

and quickened the heart of Helen in her bosom. 395
 On recognizing the goddess—her elegant neck, her ravishing breasts and bright-gleaming eyes—although amazed, Helen now spoke out, addressed her as herself:
 "Strange goddess, why are you set on deceiving me like this?
 Will you drive me still further afield, to some teeming city— 400 in Phrygia maybe, or in charming Maiōnia—where some new mortal man may have caught your fancy, just because Menelaös has beaten godlike Aléxandros, and is minded to take hateful me back home again?
 Is that why you've come here now, heart brimming with guile? 405

You go, then, sit at his side, renounce the paths of the gods, and nevermore let your feet return you to Olympos, but always just worry about him, take care of him, till he makes you his wedded wife—or maybe his slave girl!
I'm not going back there—it would be too shameful—to lie in that man's bed: all the women of Troy thereafter would blame me for it. I have measureless sorrows at heart.”

410

To her then in wrath bright Aphrodītē made answer: “Don't provoke me, you stubborn woman, lest I abandon you in my rage, come to hate you as terribly as I now love you, and work you grim trouble, caught in the middle between Trojans and Danaäns: a nasty end you'd have then.”

415

So she spoke, and Helen, Zeus's scion, shivered in fear, and went, veiling her face behind her shining mantle, silent, unseen by the Trojan ladies, the goddess leading.
When they came to Aléxandros's richly elegant abode, the handmaidens quickly turned back to their tasks, while she,
queen among women, went up to her high-roofed chamber.
Aphrodītē, that laughter-lover, now fetched a chair for her—she, a goddess!—and set it in front of Aléxandros.
Then Helen, scion of Zeus the aegis-bearer, sat down and with eyes averted, thus reproved her husband: “So you're back from the fight. I'd rather you had died there, beaten by the strong man who at one time was my husband.
Time was when you vaunted yourself against warlike Menelaös—you were the better man, with stronger hands, truer spear!
Well, off with you then, go challenge warlike Menelaös to duel with you once more! But no, I must now require you to stop this, and not to face the fair-haired Menelaös man to man, or do battle with him, or risk a fight, fool that you are, lest you fall a quick prey to his spear.”

420

425

430

435

Then Paris in these words made answer to her:
“Woman, don't chide my heart with such harsh reproofs.
This time Menelaös had Athēnē's help, and beat me, but another time I shall win: there are gods on our side too.
But now come, let's to bed, and enjoy some lovemaking, for never has passion so enveloped my senses—not even when I first snatched you away from lovely Lakedaimōn, 440

and sailed off, taking you, on our seagoing vessels, and on the island of Kranaë bedded you lovingly— 445 as now I want you, and sweet desire takes possession of me.”

This said, he led the way bedwards. His wife went with him.

So those two lay down together on the inlaid bedstead,
But Atreus’s son like a wild beast raged through the ranks, hoping to catch a glimpse of Aléxandros the godlike; 450 but no one, whether Trojan or one of the far-famed allies, could point out Aléxandros to warlike Menelaös—nor, had he been seen, would they have kept him hidden out of love, for all of them hated him like black death.

Then there spoke up among them the lord of men, Agamemnōn: 455 “Hear me, Trojans, Dardanians, allies! Victory, plainly, must go to Menelaös, the warlike! Do you now, therefore, surrender Helen, together with all her possessions, and deliver to us such recompense as is fitting,
and will stay in the minds of men in time hereafter.” 460

So spoke Atreus’s son, and all the Achaians applauded.

Book 4

The gods, seated by Zeus, were gathered together on the golden floor, and among them the lady Hēbē was pouring them nectar, and they with their golden cups pledged one another while gazing out at the Trojans' city.
Now the son of Kronos was minded to irritate Hērē 5 with taunting remarks, and said, speaking deviously:
"Two goddesses, no less, Menelaös has as his helpers—Hērē of Argos and Athēnē the Defender.
But they sit here at a distance, getting enjoyment only as onlookers, whereas Aphrodītē, lover of laughter, 10 stands by her man, protects him from the death spirits—indeed, just lately she saved him when he thought he'd die!
Still, the victory must go to warlike Menelaös, so we should be figuring out how these matters shall be:
are we once more to stir up vile warfare and grim fighting, 15 or rather to bring about friendship between the two sides?
If this last choice should turn out welcome and pleasant to all,
then might King Priam's city remain inhabited, and Menelaös go home, taking Argive Helen with him."

So he spoke, but Athēnē and Hērē muttered against him, 20 sitting side by side, planning trouble for the Trojans.
Athēnē kept quiet now, said nothing openly,
though angry with Zeus her father, gripped by wild resentment;
but Hērē's breast could not contain her fury. She said:
"Most dread son of Kronos, what's this you're telling us? 25
How can you mean to void and nullify all my labor—the sweat that I sweated in toil, the exhaustion of my horses as I gathered the troops, bringing trouble to Priam and his sons?
Do this, but we'll not all endorse it: we, the other gods!"

Deeply angered, to her cloud-gatherer Zeus made answer: 30
"Are you mad? What great harm have Priam and Priam's sons ever done you, to make you rage endlessly for Ilion, that well-built citadel, to be destroyed?
Only if you were to penetrate their gates and lofty ramparts, and devour Priam raw, him and all his sons, together 35 with every other Trojan, would you finally glut your anger!

 Act as you like, but don't let this quarrel in future become a great cause of dissension between us two.
 One other thing I will tell you, and you take it to heart: 40 Whenever I, too, am minded to bring down a city, and choose one in which the men are your special favorites, do nothing to thwart my anger, but let me be, now I'm willing to yield to you—though with unwilling heart, since of all cities beneath the sun and starry heavens in which men bred on earth maintain their dwellings, 45 sacred Ilion has ever been most honored in my heart, and Priam, lord of the fine ash spear, and Priam's people.
 For never yet has my altar lacked its share of the feasting, neither libations nor savor, the honor that's due to us."

To him then spoke in answer the ox-eyed lady Hērē: 50
 "Three cities there are that I love far above all others:
 Argos and Sparta and wide-streeted Mykēnai:
 Lay these waste whenever your heart is stirred against them!
 I'm not standing as their defender, I don't grudge them to you.
 For suppose I was reluctant, didn't want them destroyed, 55
 My reluctance would be useless, since you're far the stronger.
 Yet my toil also must not be made of no account:
 I too am a god, of the same descent as yourself, sired as the first of his daughters by devious Kronos—on two counts, since I'm the oldest, and because I'm known 60 as your consort, while you rule over all the immortals.
 But on this let us both yield, each one to the other,
 I to you, you to me: then the rest of the immortal gods will follow our lead. So, act now, order Athēnē to enter the fearful conflict between Trojans and Achaians 65 and try to arrange that the Trojans are first, and in defiance of their sworn oaths, to do harm to the arrogant Achaians."

So she spoke, and the Father of men and gods did not refuse her, but straight away spoke winged words to Athēnē:
 "Go quickly down to the hosts of the Trojans and Achaians, 70 and try to arrange that the Trojans are first, and in defiance
 of their sworn oaths, to do harm to the arrogant Achaians."

So saying he urged on Athēnē—already eager to go—and down she darted from the heights of Olympos.
 As the son of devious Kronos dispatches a meteor 75 to be a portent for sailors or a widespread encampment of troops—a bright one, and a trail of sparks flies from it—like that as she swooped to earth was Pallas Athēnē.
 She landed between the lines, amazing those who saw her, both Trojan horse breakers and well-greaved Achaïans, 80 and thus would a man exclaim, turning to his neighbor: “Surely once more evil warfare and the dread noise of battle will return—unless now friendship’s being set between the two sides by Zeus, long since the dispenser of warfare to mortals.”

 Such was the talk among Achaïans and Trojans. But she 85 came down into the thick of the Trojans in the likeness of a man, Laodokos, Antēnōr’s son, a strong spearman, looking for godlike Pandaros, hoping to find him—and find him she did, the son of Lykaōn, noble, mighty, standing there, and around him the mighty ranks of shield-bearing 90 troops that had followed with him from the streams of Aisēpos.
 Then, standing close, she addressed him with winged words:
 “Will you do now what I ask you, skilled son of Lykaōn?
 Would you dare to let fly a swift shaft at Menelaös?
 Among all the Trojans you’d reap great gratitude and renown, 95 and of them most in the eyes of the prince Aléxandros.
 From him you, above all others, would get the richest gifts
 if he were to see Menelaös, Atreus’s warlike scion, felled by your arrow, and laid on the grievous funeral pyre!
 So come now, shoot that arrow at glorious Menelaös, 100 and vow to Apollo, the wolf-born, the famous archer, a splendid rich offering consisting of first-born lambs when you get back to sacred Zeleia, your city.”

So Athēnē spoke, and thus persuaded the wits of this witless man. At once he took out his polished bow, made from the horns 105 of a wild goat he’d once shot beneath the breastbone, watching from cover as it trotted out from the rocks, then hit in the chest: it fell back among the boulders.
 The horns on its head had grown to sixteen palms in length, and these a craftsman in horn had worked and fitted together, 110 smoothing them well overall, and added a golden tip.

 This bow he now grounded firmly, bent it and strung it, his worthy companions sheltering him with their shields in case the Achaians' warlike sons might try to rush him before Menelaös, Atreus's warlike son, was hit. 115 Now he opened his quiver's lid, took out an arrow, brand-new, winged, a vehicle for dark anguish.
 Quickly he settled this bitter shaft to the bowstring, made his vow to Apollo, the wolf-born, the famous archer, of a splendid rich offering of first-born lambs 120
 when he got back home to his city of sacred Zeleia, then drew, clutching notched arrow and ox's sinew together, brought the string back to his nipple, to the bow the iron arrowhead.
 And when he'd drawn the great bow into a curve, it twanged, the bowstring sang loud, the sharp arrow leapt, 125 eager to speed its way through the throng.

Yet even now,

Menelaös, the blessed gods, the immortals, did not forget you.
 First among them was Zeus's daughter, the spoil bringer,¹ who stood before you, diverted the piercing missile, swept it just clear of your flesh—just as a mother 130 will swat flies away from her child that's bedded in sweet sleep—and turned it, herself, to where the golden buckles of the baldric were fastened, and the corselet was folded double.
 Into the fitted baldric the bitter arrow struck, right through the baldric's decorations it was driven, 135 right through the finely wrought corselet it forced its way, and the kilted guard he wore to shield his flesh, a defense against missiles, his chief protection—through that too it sped.
 The arrow scraped skin and flesh as it passed, and at once dark blood trickled down from the wound it made. 140

As when

some woman—perhaps a Maiōnian or a Karian—stains ivory with purple, to make a cheek piece for horses, and it lies in a storeroom, and many the riders who long

1. This is Athēnē: the epithet “spoil bringer” (ἀγγελίη, ageleîē) is (like so many Homeric epithets) of dubious meaning: most often interpreted as the bringer, driver, or carrier of spoil, it was also sometimes thought to mean “war leader.”

to flaunt it, but there it lies, a prince's pleasure—his horse's adornment and its driver's source of pride— 145 just so, Menelaös, were your shapely thighs stained with blood:
 they, and your shins, and the fine ankles beneath them.

He shuddered then, did the lord of men, Agamemnōn, when he saw the dark blood trickling down from the wound;
 and Menelaös himself, the warlike, likewise shuddered.² 150
 But when he saw that the barbs and their binding were still clear of the flesh, the spirit within his breast recovered.

With a deep groan, the lord Agamemnōn spoke among his comrades, Menelaös's hand in his, and they groaned in sympathy:
 "Dear brother, it was for your death, then, that I swore this oath, 155 sending you out, alone, before the Achaians, to battle the Trojans, since they have now shot you, and trampled down the oaths they swore. Yet an oath's not in vain—the lambs' blood, the unmixed libations, the handclasps in which we put our trust.

Though the Olympian may not bring instant retribution, 160 bring it in time he will. Men pay heavily for their atonement—with their own heads, through their wives, or through their children.
 For this I know full well, in my heart and in my mind:

A day will come when sacred Ilion will perish, with Priam, lord of the fine ash spear, and Priam's people; 165 and Zeus, high-throned son of Kronos, the sky dweller, will, in fury at such deceit, shake his black-cloud aegis over them all. These matters will not fail of fulfillment.

But dreadful sorrow for you will be mine, Menelaös my brother, if you die now, and fulfil your lifetime's destiny; 170 and a contemptible creature I'd be, back in thirsty Argos, for at once the Achaians' minds will turn to their native land, and we'd be leaving the Trojans and Priam a cause for boasting in Argive Helen! The plowland will rot your bones as you lie here in Troy, your mission unaccomplished, 175 and one of the arrogant Trojans will thus declare, as he capers upon the grave mound of glorious Menelaös:

2. It has long been wondered why both Menelaös and Agamemnōn should have been so alarmed by what was clearly a very superficial wound. Gilbert Murray was almost certainly right when he argued years ago in The Rise of the Greek Epic (129–30) that the passage looked back to an era when poisoned arrows were a commonplace (cf. line 218, where Machaön sucks blood from the wound), being banned, by general agreement, from warfare only later (like lethal gas after World War I).

‘So may Agamemnōn’s anger always find fulfillment, as now all in vain he has brought here his host of Achaians, and gone back home to his own dear native country 180 with empty ships, and left brave Menelaös behind.’ Thus someone will speak: that day let the wide earth gape for me.”

But fair-haired Menelaös spoke encouragingly to him:
 “Take heart—and do not frighten the Achaian rank and file!
 Not in any fatal spot did the sharp shaft lodge: before that 185 my gleaming baldric stopped it, and under that the leather apron and kilted guard that the coppersmiths armored for me.”

In answer to him then spoke the lord Agamemnōn:
 “Indeed may it be so, dear brother, dear Menelaös!
 A physician will handle your wound, will spread upon it 190 medicinal herbs to relieve you of your dark pains.”

That said,
 he then addressed Talthybios, the sacred herald: “Talthybios, go with all speed, summon Machâōn here, the mortal son of Asklēpios, peerless healer, to see to Menelaös, Atreus’s warlike son, 195 whom someone has shot and hit—an expert archer, some Trojan or Lycian: glory for him, for us sorrow.”

So he spoke: the herald heard, and did not disregard him, but went straight off through the well-greaved Achaians’ ranks, looking out for the hero Machâōn. He found him standing 200 at ease, all around him the strong ranks of shield-bearing troops who had accompanied him all the way from horse-pasturing Triikka.
 So he approached, and addressed him with winged words:
 “Up with you, son of Asklēpios! Lord Agamemnōn needs you to attend to Menelaös, the warlike son of Atreus, 205 whom someone has shot and hit—an expert archer,
 some Trojan or Lycian: glory for him, for us sorrow.”

So he spoke, and stirred up the spirit in Machâōn’s breast, and they set off through the wide camp of the Achaian troops.
 When they arrived at the place where fair-haired Menelaös 210 lay wounded, with all the chieftains in a circle around him, Machâōn, the godlike mortal, came in among them, and at once pulled out the arrow through the fitted belt, so that,

as it was drawn through, its sharp barbs broke off backwards.
 Then he undid the gleaming baldric, and beneath it the leather 215 apron and kilted guard that the coppersmiths had armored, and when he saw the wound that the bitter arrow had made, he sucked out the blood, with skill applied the healing herbs that Cheirōn had once given to his father in friendship.

While they were busy around Menelaös of the great war cry, 220 the ranks of the shield-bearing Trojans began to advance, so they armed themselves once more, minds reverting to battle.

Then you would not have seen illustrious Agamemnōn asleep, or shrinking in fear, or unwilling to join battle, but most eager for the conflict that brings men honor. 225
 His horses he left behind, with his bronze-inlaid chariot, and these fierce-breathed steeds were held back by his charioteer, Eurymedōn, son of Peiraios's son Ptolemaios, with strict instructions to have them on hand for whenever fatigue might assail his limbs while marshalling so many. 230 Out there on foot he worked his way through the ranks:
 those of the fleet-horsed Danaäns that he saw as hot for the fray he'd approach, and give them words of rousing encouragement:
 "Argives, never relax that fighting spirit of yours!
 Zeus, the Father, will lend no support to liars— 235
 Those who first did violence in defiance of their oaths, surely their tender flesh will be eaten by vultures—yes, and we shall carry off their dear wives and little children in our vessels, as soon as we've captured their citadel."

But any he saw holding back from hateful warfare, 240 these he would strongly reprove with indignant words:
 "You contemptible arrow-brave Argives, have you no shame?
 Standing there in a dumbstruck daze, like a bunch of fawns, exhausted after scampering over some lengthy plain, that stop, stock-still, with no spark of courage left in them! 245 That's you, stuck in a stupor, away from the fighting—maybe you're waiting until the Trojans reach your fine-sterned vessels, hauled up here on the shore of the grey sea?
 Or is it to see if Kronos's son will stretch his arm over you?"

So, acting the lord, he ranged through the army's ranks, 250 and came, as he went through the mass of troops, to the Krētans.

They were arming for battle around doughty Idomeneus, and Idomeneus stood in the forefront, brave as a wild boar, while Mērionēs rallied the rearguard companies.
 Seeing them, Agamemnōn, the lord of men, rejoiced, 255 and at once greeted Idomeneus with winning words: “Idomeneus, you I do honor above all the swift-horsed Danaäns, whether it be in warfare or any other business, or indeed at the feast, when the elders’ fire-bright wine is mixed in the bowl by the chief men of the Argives. 260 For though all the other long-haired Achaians drink their allotted portion, your cup stands always full, just as mine does, to drink whenever the spirit moves you.
 Now rouse up for battle, like the man you claim you once were!”

 To him then Idomeneus, the Krētans’ leader, replied: 265 “Son of Atreus, to you I shall be a trusty comrade just as I promised and swore, from the very beginning.
 But now urge on all the other long-haired Achaians, so we can join battle the soonest! The Trojans are forsworn, and for them hereafter there shall be death and sorrow: 270 by breaking their oath they were the first offenders.”

 So he spoke, and Atreus’s son moved on, gladdened at heart, and came to the two named Aias as he strode through the throng:
 they were arming, and backed by a cloud of troops. As when from his lookout point a goatherd perceives a cloud 275 approaching across the deep, blown by the west wind, and to him, being at a distance, it looks blacker than pitch as it passes over the deep, bringing a mighty tempest, and he shrinks at the sight of it, and drives his flock to a cave—just so, beside both Aiases, the dark and serried ranks 280 of vigorous youths, Zeus’s nurslings, were on the march into deadly battle, all bristling with shields and spears.
 Seeing them, the lord Agamemnōn rejoiced in his heart.
 and he then addressed them, speaking with winged words:
 “You two Aiases, leaders of bronze-corseleted Achaians, 285 to you—out of place to urge you—I give no orders: you yourselves are exhorting your men to battle fiercely!
 If only—by Zeus the Father, by Athēnē and Apollo!— such a spirit might be engendered in every man’s heart, then would King Priam's city soon totter to its fall, stormed and sacked at our hands." 290

That said, he left them there and went on his way in search of others; and next he came upon Nestōr, the Pylians' lucid spokesman, arraying his comrades and urging them on to battle, those led by tall Pelagōn and Alastōr and Chromios, 295 and lord Haimōn, and Bias, the shepherd of his people.
The mounted fighters he set in front, with their horses and chariots, and behind them, in large numbers, the valiant foot soldiers, to be a strong wall of battle. The cowards he drove to the middle, so that all, even though unwilling, would be forced to fight. 300
He first briefed the mounted fighters, giving them orders to rein in their horses and not get entangled with the masses:
"And let no man, trusting in his horsemanship and valor, be eager to fight with the Trojans alone, in front of the rest—but don't retreat either: that way you'll be less effective! 305
When a man in his chariot comes within range of an enemy's, then let him lunge with his spear, for that's the best way by far—it's how men in the olden days would storm cities and ramparts, holding this purpose and spirit within their hearts."

So thus the old man urged them on, from his knowledge of wars long past; and at the sight he rejoiced, did the lord Agamemnōn, 310 and addressed him as follows, uttering winged words:
"Old sir, if only, like the heart in your breast, so might your knees still serve you, your strength remain unimpaired!
But age, ineluctable, weighs on you: how I wish some other 315 warrior had your years, and you were among the youths!"

Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman, to him made answer:
"Son of Atreus, I too most heartily wish I still had the strength that was mine the day I slew noble Ereuthaliōn!
But no way do the gods grant mortals all things at once— 320
Then I was young, but now old age is my companion.
Even so, I shall go round the mounted fighters, instruct them with words of counsel: that is an old man's right.
The wielding of spears belongs to a later generation, men younger than me, men with confidence in their strength." 325

So he spoke, and Atreus's son moved on, gladdened at heart, and found Peteos's son Menestheus, whipper of horses, standing there, and around him the Athenians, war-cry masters, and close by there stood resourceful Odysseus, and with him the ranks of the Kephallēnians—no weaklings they— 330 were waiting: not yet had their forces heard the war cry, since only now were the ranks of Achaians and horse-breaking stirring themselves to action. So they stood there, idle, till some other Achaian body should move forward, make a charge at the Trojans, get the battle started. 335 Seeing these drew a rebuke from the lord of men, Agamemnōn, so that he spoke out, addressed them with winged words:

Trojans

“You there, son of King Peteos, Zeus's nursling, and you, the master deceiver, mind set on crafty profit!
 Why do you hang back nervously, waiting upon others? 340
 You two should be out up front there with the foremost troops, ready to play your part in the fiery conflict! You're always the first to hear my call to the feasting when we Achaians make ready a dinner for the elders:
 then you're happy enough to eat roast meat, and swill 345 honey-sweet wine by the cupful, as long as you wish—but now you'd cheerfully stand by and watch, were there ten Achaian companies battling before you with the pitiless bronze.”

With a dark glance resourceful Odysseus answered: “Son of Atreus, what's this talk that's escaped the barrier of your teeth? 350 How can you say that we hold back from fighting whenever we Achaians make bitter war on the horse-breaker Trojans?
 You'll see—if you care to, if you have the slightest interest—Tēlemachos's dear father engaged with the front-line fighters of these same horse-breaker Trojans. Your words are empty wind.” 355

To this the lord Agamemnōn answered, smiling at him as he took in his indignation, unsaying the words he'd uttered: “Son of Laertēs, scion of Zeus, resourceful Odysseus!
 Mine was no heavy rebuke, nor am I giving you orders:
 Full well I know that the spirit within your breast 360 harbors friendly thoughts: you think the same way that I do.
 Come then, we'll make things right later, if any wrong word has been uttered—and may the gods reduce all this to nothing!”

So saying, he left them there, and went in search of others, and came upon Tydeus's son, bold-hearted Diomēdēs, 365 standing there by his horses and dovetailed chariots, with Sthenelos, son of Kapaneus, at his side. The sight of him once more drew a scolding from the lord of men, Agamemnōn, so that he spoke out, addressed him with winged words:
 "Now then, you son of Tydeus, that fierce horse breaker, 370 why are you skulking down here, one eye on the battlefront?
 It wasn't Tydeus's way to shrink back thus: no, rather he'd be far in front of his comrades, embattled with the foe!
 So they tell it who saw him in action: myself, I neither met him nor saw him; still, they say he excelled all others. 375 Now once—as guest, not as enemy—he visited Mykēnai with godlike Polyneikēs, recruiting troops. At that time they were campaigning against the sacred walls of Thēbē, and urgently begged to be given some first-class allies.
 Our people were ready to help them, had agreed to the request, 380 but Zeus changed their hearts with a show of ill-omened signs.
 So they left, and when they'd got some distance on their way they came to the reed-thick Asōpos with its grassy banks, and from there the Achaians sent Tydeus ahead with a message.
 So he set off, and found a large group of Kadmeians 385 banqueting in the house of that mighty force Eteoklēs.
 Now, stranger though he was there, Tydeus the charioteer had no fear at being alone in this crowd of Kadmeians, whom he challenged to trials of strength, and easily beat every man jack of them, such a help was Athēnē to him. 390
 But these Kadmeian horse whippers then got furious, and on his way back they ambushed him in strength—fifty young fighting men, and a couple to lead them: Haimōn's son Maiōn, a man like the immortals, and Autophonos's son, the war veteran Polyphontēs. 395
 But on these too Tydeus let loose an unseemly fate:
 he slew the lot, spared one only to go back home again—Maiōn, in obedience to the gods' signs. Such a man was Aitōlian Tydeus. Yet the son he sired could not match him in battle, though a better maker of speeches." 400
 So he spoke, and not one word did mighty Diomēdēs say in reply, from respect for his honored king's rebuke.

But the son of renowned Kapaneus made this reply:
 “Son of Atreus, don’t lie when you know how to tell the truth!
 We two do call ourselves far better men than our fathers, 405 seeing we captured the stronghold of seven-gated Thēbē when we’d brought a lesser force against their stronger ramparts, trusting in the gods’ omens and the support of Zeus—although it was through their own reckless folly that they perished.
 So, never rank our fathers as equal in honor to us.” 410

But to him, with an angry glance, mighty Diomēdēs said:
 “Friend, sit down, be silent, and listen to what I tell you:
 I do not fault Agamemnōn, the shepherd of the people, for urging the well-greaved Achaians into battle, since great honor will come to him should it happen that the Achaians 415 slaughter the Trojans, and take sacred Ilion—but great grief, should it be the Achaians who are slaughtered.
 So come, let us two also reclaim our fighting spirit!”
 With that he sprang, armed and armored, from his chariot to the ground.
 Fearful the clash of bronze on the king’s chest as he moved: 420
 Even the stoutest heart would have quailed in terror at it.

As when on an echoing shoreline the waves of the sea crash down one after the other, driven on by the west wind—first cresting out in deep water, but then they break on the beach with a thunderous roar, and around the headlands 425 surge, arch, and peak, spew out the frothing brine:
 so then, one after the other, the Danāan companies moved unendingly into battle. Each leader issued the order to his own troops; the rest marched on in silence. You’d think the vast numbers following had no voice in their breasts— 430 so speechless they were, so scared of their captains—while on them glinted the fine-wrought armor in which they marched.
 But the Trojans—like countless ewes in a rich man’s steading that stand and wait to be eased of their white milk, and keep up a ceaseless bleat as they hear the cries of their lambs— 435 so the Trojans’ clamor went up through their massed forces, for they had no speech in common, no single language, but a mixture of tongues, men drafted from many regions.
 They were spurred on by Arēs, their foes by grey-eyed Athēnē, and Terror and Panic, and Strife—so incessantly eager, 440 the sister and comrade of man-slaying Arēs: at first she rears her crest only a little, but very soon her head is set in the heavens while she walks the earth.

 She it now was that spread evil contention in their midst as she passed through the massed ranks, increasing men’s agony. 445

When they had come to one place, and were met together, buckler slammed against buckler, spears thrust, the bronze-clad rage
 of warriors pressed the attack, their bossed shields ground hard each upon the other, and a mighty hubbub went up.
 There were groans and triumphant shouts, from warriors killing 450 or being killed, while the earth ran wet with blood.
 As when in winter two mountain torrents discharge a massive body of water down from their mighty springs to where the two streambeds meet in some hollow ravine, and far off in the mountains the herdsman hears their thunder: 455 so from those met in battle came shouts of triumph and anguish.

Antilochos was the first to take down an armored Trojan, a seasoned front-line fighter, Thalysios’s son Echepōlos:
 his first shot struck the boss of his horsehair-crested helmet and stuck in his forehead: right through into the bone 460 the bronze spear point pierced. Darkness shrouded his eyes, and he crashed like a tower amid the grind of battle.
 When he fell, the lord Elephēnōr caught hold of his feet—Chalkōdōn’s son, who led the high-spirited Abantes—and was dragging him out from the missiles, all too eager 465 to strip off his armor. This effort lasted an instant only, for as he was lugging the corpse high-spirited Agēnōr saw him stoop, and where his ribs were exposed beyond the shield struck home with a bronze-tipped spear, and loosened his limbs.
 So the vital breath left him, and a hard-fought tussle took place 470 between Achaians and Trojans over his corpse: like wolves they sprang one at another, and fighter battered fighter.

There Telamōnian Aias felled Anthēmion’s young son, a bachelor in his prime, Simoeisios, whom his mother bore on her way down from Ida, by the banks of the Simoeis, 475 having gone up there with her parents to see to their flocks.

 Hence his name, Simoeisios; yet he never repaid his parents the cost of his rearing—too brief his life span, eclipsed by a spear thrust he took from high-spirited Aias.
 Striding out in front, he was hit in the chest, above the right 480 nipple: clean through his shoulder the bronze spear drove, and he slumped to the ground in the dust, like a black poplar that's grown in the bottom land of a great marsh meadow:
 smooth, except for the branches sprouting from its top, which a wheelwright has felled with his axe of gleaming iron 485 to bend into a wheel rim for an elegant chariot, and it lies there drying out by the riverbank. Such was the slaying of Anthemios's son Simoeisios by Aias, scion of Zeus. At whom, then, bright-corseleted Antiphos, Priam's son, aimed through the throng with his knife-sharp spear, 490 and missed; but struck Leukos, Odysseus's trusty comrade, full in the groin, as he was dragging away the corpse:
 he collapsed on it, and the body slipped from his grasp.
 This killing left Odysseus wrathful at heart, and through the front ranks he strode, in a helmet of gleaming bronze, 495 coming up close, and stood there, took aim with his bright spear, glancing quickly around. The Trojans all shrank back as he threw; not in vain was his missile cast, but struck a bastard son of Priam's, Dēmoköön, who'd come over from Abydos, leaving behind his stable of racing mares. 500 Him Odysseus, enraged on account of his comrade, speared full on the temple: clean through to the other temple drove the sharp bronze point. Darkness blacked out his eyes, he fell with a thud, and his armor rattled upon him.
 Then the front-line fighters gave ground, with illustrious Hector; 505 the Argives raised a loud cheer, dragged off the bodies, and advanced still further forward. Apollo, furious as he looked down from Olympos, cried out to the Trojans:
 "Stir yourselves, horse-breaker Trojans, don't yield the battle to these Argives—their flesh is not made of stone or iron 510 to resist the flesh-severing bronze when they take a hit:
 no indeed, nor yet has Achilles, sweet-haired Thetis's son, joined battle, but off by the ships is nursing his heartsick wrath."

So, from the citadel, the terrible god. The Achaians were urged on by Zeus's daughter, illustrious Trītogéneia,³ 515 ranging through the ranks, on the watch for men giving ground.
 Fate there now ensnared Amarynkeus's son Diōrēs:
 by a jagged rock he was struck, on his right shin near the ankle, and the man who threw it was a leader of Thracians, Peirōs, Imbrasos's son, who had come to Troy from Ainos.
 Both tendons, and leg bones too, the pitiless stone 520 utterly crushed: he collapsed on his back in the dust, both hands reaching forward to his own dear comrades as he gasped out his life. Then the stone thrower ran up, Peirōs, and speared him beside the navel. Out on the ground 525 all his guts splashed, and darkness shrouded his eyes.

But as Peirōs withdrew he was speared by Aitōlian Thoas in the chest, over one nipple, and the bronze jammed in his lung.
 Forward at him ran Thoas, tugged out from his torso the weighty spear, then drew his keen-edged sword, 530 and thrust it in Peirōs's mid-belly, robbed him of life, but failed to strip off his armor, for around him gathered his comrades, topknotted Thracians, grasping their long spears;
 and they, huge though he was, both strong and noble, thrust Thoas back from them: he staggered, gave ground. 535
 The two lay stretched in the dust beside each other, both leaders, one of the Thracians, the other of the Epeians in their bronze corselets; and many more died around them.

From now a late entrant could no more make light of the work—one who'd still taken no hit, was uncut by the sharp bronze— 540 as he turned through the thick of it, even were Pallas Athēnē leading him by the hand, warding off the rush of missiles; for too many Achaians and Trojans on that day lay one by the other, stretched out face down in the dust.

3. A traditional epithet of Athēnē (also at 8.39, 22.183), but its meaning remains uncertain—and the explanations given in antiquity suggest that Hellenistic scholars were no wiser than we are. Modern philology suggests that trīto- (with lengthened iota), i.e. “third” is meant, so that Athēnē was Zeus’s “third-born”, or genuine, daughter; but this too remains unconvincing. As with so many Homeric epithets, we simply have to admit that the original meaning was lost very early.

Book 5

NOW on Tydeus's son Diomēdēs Pallas Athēnē bestowed power and courage, that he might be clearly preeminent among all the Argives, and gather illustrious renown.¹
From his helmet and shield she made blaze an unwearying flame, like that star of the harvest season that shines out most intensely 5 after dipping in Ocean's stream: of such a nature was the light that she made to gleam from his head and shoulders, and she thrust him into the center, where the struggle was greatest.

There was a Trojan, one Darēs, both wealthy and virtuous, a priest of Hēphaistos; and this man had two sons, 10
Phēgeus and Idaios, well skilled in all kinds of fighting.
These now broke out from the line and went against Diomēdēs—they mounted in their chariot, while he advanced on foot.
When they got close enough, each of them to the other, Phēgeus was the first to hurl his far-shadowing spear, 15 at Tydeus's son, but the point flew over his left shoulder and missed him. Then Tydeus's son in turn attacked with the bronze.
Not in vain from his hand did the missile fly, but struck Phēgeus full in mid-breast, threw him clear of his horses.
Then from the fine-crafted chariot Idaios sprang down, 20 but dared not make a stand over his slain brother, nor would he himself have escaped the black death spirit without the aid of Hēphaistos, who saved him, hid him in darkness, to ensure that aged Darēs was not wholly undone by grief.
But his horses the son of high-spirited Tydeus drove off, 25 and gave to his comrades to lead to the hollow ships, and when the high-spirited Trojans saw Darēs' two sons—one in flight, the other lying slain beside his chariot—the spirits of all were dismayed. But grey-eyed Athēnē

1. What follows is a remarkable killing spree by Diomēdēs, a sustained sequence of successful assaults only halted by divine intervention. Such spotlighted one-man performances by Iliadic heroes (e.g., Agamemnōn, bk. 11; Hektōr, bk. 15; Patroklos, bk. 16; Achilles bks. 19–22) are a formal feature of Homeric epic, known as aristeiai, or “displays of excellence” (see Glossary).

grasped fierce Arēs' hand, and thus addressed him: "Arēs, 30 Arēs, ruin of mortals, blood-guilty, city-stormer, should we not now leave both Trojans and Achaians to battle it out, let our father Zeus apportion the glory, while we two withdraw, avoid Zeus's anger?"

So saying, she led fierce Arēs away from the fighting, 35 sat him down beside the Skamandros river. Meanwhile the Danāans routed the Trojans: each one of their leaders killed him a man. First of all the lord of men, Agamemnōn, knocked the Halizōnēs' leader, tall Odios, off his chariot just as he turned to flee, drove the spear into his back 40 between the shoulders, and right through to his chest.
He fell with a thud, and his armor rattled upon him.

Idomeneus slew Phaistos, the son of Maiōnian Bōros, who had come there from rich-soiled Tarnē.
Idomeneus, famous spearman, ran him through with his long 45 lance, in the right shoulder, just as he was mounting;
he slumped from his chariot, and loathsome darkness took him.

Him Idomeneus's henchmen stripped of his armor; and now Skamandrios, Strophios's son, well trained in the chase, Menelāos, son of Atreus, took down with his sharpened spear, 50 fine hunter though he was, one whom Artemis herself taught to shoot all wild things that the mountain woodlands nourish.

Yet of no avail to him now was Artemis the archer, nor the skilled bowmanship in which he once excelled, but Atreus's son Menelāos, that famous spearman, 55 plunged, as he fled before him, a spear into his back between the shoulder blades, drove it through to his chest.
He slumped down face first, and his armor rattled upon him.

Mērionēs brought down Phereklos, son of Tektōn, and Harmōn's grandson, whose hands were skilled to fashion 60 all kinds of intricate work: he was dear to Pallas Athēnē.
He it was built for Aléxandros those trim ships that started the trouble, became a curse to all Trojans—and to himself, who knew nothing of the gods' planned ordinances.
When Mērionēs in his pursuit caught up with Phereklos 65 he speared him in the right buttock, and the spear point pierced right through to the bladder beneath the bone:

he screamed and fell to his knees, and death enfolded him.

Megēs now killed Pēdaios, Antēnōr's son—a bastard, but noble Theanō reared him devotedly, 70 like her own children, out of affection for her husband.
But Phyleus's son, famed spearman, rushing forward, stabbed into his neck tendon with a sharp spear: clean through his teeth the bronze went, and severed his tongue at the root.
He collapsed in the dust, teeth clamped on the cold bronze. 75

Eurypylos, son of Euaimōn, took down high-spirited Dolopiōn's son, the noble Hypsēnōr, who'd been made priest of Skamandros: the people revered him like a god.
In pursuit of him went Eurypylos, Euaimōn's splendid son, as he fled, and, still running, closed in, raised his sword, 80 slashed at one shoulder, cut off the weighty arm, that dropped, still spurting blood, onto the ground; his eyes were closed by blood-red death and all-mastering fate.

Thus they were laboring in the grind of battle;
but as for Tydeus's son, you could not tell which side 85 he was fighting on—was he with the Trojans or the Achaians?— so wildly he ranged the plain, like some swollen winter torrent that, rushing onward, sweeps away dikes unable, however close-packed, to hold back its raging progress, nor can its sudden coming be stopped by the flourishing vineyard's 90 walls, when a Zeus-sent rainstorm augments its waters, and many good man-made works collapse before it. Just so before Tydeus's son's advance the massed Trojan battalions were routed, not standing to face him, despite their numbers.

When Lykaōn's fine son Pandaros caught sight of him storming 95 across the plain, and driving those battalions before him, at once against Tydeus's son he bent his curved bow, aimed true, and hit him in the right shoulder as he pressed on forward, on the plate of his corselet: clean through winged the bitter shaft, piercing the flesh, and the corselet was blood-bespattered. Then 100 over him loud exulted Lykaōn's fine son: "Rouse up now, all you high-spirited Trojans, you spurrers of horses! The best warrior of the Achaians is hit, and he won't, I assure you, long survive my strong missile, if it's true it was Lord Apollo, Zeus's son, who encouraged me to come here from Lycia." 105

Boastful words; but the swift shaft did not fell Diomēdēs.
He gave ground, went back, stood there in front of his chariot and horses: called out to Kapaneus's son Sthenelos: "Quick now, good son of Kapaneus, get down from the chariot, come and pull this bitter shaft out from my shoulder." 110

So he spoke,
and Sthenelos instantly leapt down onto the ground from the driver's place, stood by him, drew the swift arrow out through his shoulder. Blood spurted from the soft folds of his tunic.
Then Diomēdēs, good at the war cry, made this prayer:
"Hear me, unwearied child of Zeus of the aegis! 115
If ever with kindly heart you stood beside my father in the madness of battle, now befriend me too, Athēnē!
Let me take down this man, let him come within my spear cast, whose shot caught me unawares, who now boasts over me, who swears that not for much longer shall I look on the sun's bright light." 120

So he spoke in prayer, and Pallas Athēnē heard him.
She made his limbs buoyant, his legs and the arms above them, and standing close by his side spoke to him winged words:
"Take heart now, Diomēdēs, for your battle against the Trojans, for in your breast I have set your father's dauntless fury— 125 such as he had, he, the horseman, Tydeus the shield wielder;² and the mist that was over your eyes I have taken away to let you clearly distinguish a god from a mortal. So now if some god comes here to make trial of you, no way are you to meet in battle any one of the other immortals 130 save Aphrodītē alone, Zeus's daughter. But if she enters the fighting, her you may wound with your keen-edged bronze."

This said,
grey-eyed Athēnē departed. Then Tydeus's son went back and plunged headlong into the ranks of the foremost fighters.
Though before he'd been hot in his heart to battle Trojans, now 135 a fury three times as great possessed him, like that of a lion

2. "Shield wielder" (σάκεσπαλος, sakéspalos) is an interesting epithet: Tydeus did not merely carry a shield, he used it—a mark of his savage fierceness—as an aggressive weapon.

that a shepherd out in the country, guarding his fleecy sheep, has wounded, but not killed, as it leapt the sheepfold's wall, arousing its rage, so that he now abandons his defense and retreats to the steading's shelter, leaving his terrified flock 140 without protection—the sheep in huddled heaps, while the lion in its fury springs out from the high sheepfold—so strong Diomēdēs raged as he mingled with the Trojans.

Astynoōs now he slew, and Hypeirōn, his people's shepherd, the one hit above the nipple with a cast of his bronze-tipped spear, 145 the other with his great sword on the collarbone by the shoulder he struck, slicing off the shoulder from neck and back. Leaving these he went off in pursuit of Abas and Polyīdos, both sons of a dream interpreter, the aged Eurydamas. Though the old man read no dreams against their homecoming, still 150 strong Diomēdēs slew them, and stripped them of their armor.
 Next he went after Xanthos and Thoōn, Phainōps's twin sons, his latest-born: he himself was worn out by bitter old age and sired no other son to leave heir to his possessions.
 Diomēdēs dispatched them both, destroyed their vital spirit, 155 left for their father mourning and bitter sorrow, since they never came home alive from the fighting for him to welcome them back: distant kinsmen divided his property.

Next he took on two sons of Dardanos's scion Priam, both in one chariot, Echemmōn and Chromios. 160 Just as a lion springs in among cattle, breaks the neck of a calf or cow, as they graze in their woodland pasture, so did Tydeus's son force the pair of them, all unwilling, out of their chariot, then stripped the armor from them, and gave his comrades their horses to drive off to the ships. 165

Aineias watched him wreak havoc among the warriors' ranks, and set off through the fighting and the chaos of flying spears looking for godlike Pandaros, to see if he might find him; and he came on Lykaōn's son, the strong, the illustrious, and confronted him, and addressed him in these words: 170
 "Pandaros, where now are your bow and your flighted arrows?
 Where's your famous skill, in which no man here is your rival, nor can any in Lycia boast that they're your better?
 So come, flight a shaft at this man—but first supplicate Zeus—whoever he is, whose huge prowess has done such endless harm to the Trojans, unstringing the knees of so many warlike fighters—unless this be some god with a grudge against Trojans over a sacrifice: a god's wrath sits heavily on us mortals.” 175

In answer to him then spoke Lykaōn's splendid son:
“Aineias, counselor to the bronze-corseleted Achaians, 180
I find him in all respects like the warlike son of Tydeus.
By his shield I recognize him, by his helmet's visor, by the look of his horses—yet he might, I'm not sure, be a god!
If he's the man I say, though, the warlike son of Tydeus, not without some god's aid can he rage thus: an immortal 185 must be standing close by him, shoulders hidden in mist, who turned aside my swift shaft, the moment it reached him—for just now I let fly a shaft at him, pierced his right shoulder clean through the plate of his corselet, so that I told myself I'd dispatch him straight to Hādēs. Yet nevertheless 190
I failed to destroy him: some god must be resentful.
Nor have I at hand either horses or a chariot to mount in, though in Lykaōn's stables there are, I think, eleven—fine ones, just carpentered, newly made, with canvas covers spread over them, and by each its two-horse team 195 stands munching its fodder of white barley and spelt.
Indeed, I got strong advice from Lykaōn, the old spearman, at my departure, while still in our well-built house:
he wanted me to go mounted, with chariot and horses, and be to the Trojans a leader in their fierce engagements. 200
But I ignored his counsel—far better had I listened!— and spared the horses, for fear they might lack fodder amid the crush of troops, they that were used to eating their fill, and left them, and journeyed on foot to Ilion, trusting my bow. But that, it seems, was to be of no use— 205 already I've sent shafts winging at two of their leading men, the sons of Tydeus and Atreus, hit them both squarely, drew blood from each one, yet only roused them more.
Ill-fated I was, then, when I took my curved bow from its peg that day on which I first set off to lovely Ilion 210 with my Trojans, doing a service to illustrious Hektōr.
But if I survive to go home, once more see with my own eyes my fatherland, and my wife, and my great high-roofed house, then may some stranger at once strike the head from my shoulders if I don't break this bow with my hands and cast it away 215 into a blazing fire: it's served me no better than wind."

To him then Aineias, leader of Trojans, made answer:
"Don't talk in that way. Things will not get any better until we two together, with chariot and horses, go out against this man, and make trial of him in arms. 220 Come now, get into my chariot, see for yourself the breed of these horses of Trōs,³ well trained to charge swiftly over the plain, in pursuit or retreat! This pair will bring us back safe to the city, if yet once more to Tydeus's son Diomēdēs Zeus grants the glory. 225 So come now, you take the whip and the bright-polished reins, and I'll dismount to join in the fighting—or else you face this man's charge, while I look after the horses."

In answer to him then spoke Lykaōn's splendid son:
"Aineias, you yourself should keep the reins and the horses. 230 Better with a known driver will they pull your curved chariot if we are forced to retreat before the son of Tydeus.
I fear they might take fright and stampede, might well refuse to carry us out of the fighting, without your voice to rule them, and high-spirited Tydeus's son would then assail us, 235 and kill us both, and drive off your whole-hoofed horses.
So you yourself should control your chariot and your horses, while I meet this man's assault with my keen-edged spear."

After conversing thus they mounted the inlaid chariot, and eagerly urged their swift steeds against the son of Tydeus. 240 Now Sthenelos saw them, Kapaneus's splendid son, and at once to the son of Tydeus addressed winged words:
"Diomēdēs, Tydeus's son, so dear to my heart, I see two powerful warriors set on doing battle with you, men of unmeasured strength: one, a well-skilled archer, 245 Pandaros, also claims to be the son of Lykaōn;
the other, Aineias, claims he was sired by blameless

3. Trōs, who started this breed of divine (and divinely speedy) horses, was the great-great-grandfather of Aineias: the original pair was given to him by Zeus in compensation for the abduction of his son Ganymēdēs. Aineias' father Anchīsēs "later managed to breed from their stock by stealth" (265–72 below; cf. 318–24, 8.105–8, and Kirk, 2: 83).

Anchīsēs, and also that his mother is Aphroditē!
 So let's pull back in our chariot—and don't, I beg you, rage on this way in the forefront, lest you maybe lose your life.” 250

To him with a fierce glance strong Diomēdēs made answer:
 “No arguments for retreat! You won't change my mind. It's not a family tradition of mine to shrink from combat or to crouch down and hide: my fury remains firm set.
 I don't want to mount that chariot. Just as I am I'll go on 255 and face them: Pallas Athēnē will not let me be afraid.
 And as for those two, their swift horses won't carry them both safely away from us, even should one of them escape.
 And another thing I will tell you, and you take it to heart:
 If Athēnē of many counsels should grant me the renown 260 of killing them both, then you must tether these swift horses in place here, lash their reins firmly onto the chariot rail, and yourself set your mind to seizing Aineias's horses and driving them from the Trojans to the well-greaved Achaians; for they're from that stock which far-seeing Zeus gave Trōs 265 as amends for his son Ganymēdēs, being the finest of all horses anywhere under sunlight or daybreak. This was the breed from which that lord of men, Anchīsēs, stole, by putting his mares to them, without Laomedōn's knowledge, and from these mares six foals were born to him 270 in his stables: four he kept, to be nurtured at his mangers;
 the last two he gave to Aineias as harbingers of rout, so—capture this pair, and we'd win ourselves high renown.”

Such was their conversation, the one to the other.
 Meanwhile the two approached, driving their swift horses, 275 and the first of them to speak was Lykaōn's splendid son: “Stout-hearted warlike son of illustrious Tydeus, indeed my swift shaft failed to dispatch you, my bitter arrow; but now I'll make trial of you with my spear, and hope to hit you.”

So saying, he swung and let fly his far-shadowing spear, 280 and hit Diomēdēs' shield: clean through it drove the bronze spear point in its flight, came near the corselet, and a great shout went up from Lykaōn's splendid son: “You're hit in the midriff, right through! I'm pretty certain you won't survive long now! You've given me great glory!” 285

To him then, still unperturbed, strong Diomēdēs made answer:
“You didn’t hit me, you missed. Still, I fancy the two of you won’t rest until one or the other has fallen, and glutted Arēs the oxhide-shield warrior with his fill of blood.”

So saying he let fly, and Athēnē guided his missile close by one eye to the nose, and it sheared through the white teeth.
The man’s tongue was cut off at its root by the stubborn bronze, and the spear point came out below, from the back of his jaw.
He fell from his chariot, and his armor rattled upon him, gleaming and polished bright; and the swift-footed horses shied away in terror. There his spirit and strength were undone. 290 295

But Aineias sprang down with his shield and his long spear, afraid that somehow the corpse might be dragged off by the Achaians.
Lion-like he bestrode him, trusting in his strength, holding before him his spear and his nicely balanced shield, 300 hot to kill any fighter who might come to confront him, and roaring defiance. But Tydeus’s son hefted a rock in his hands—a great feat, that would take two mortals and more, such as men are today; yet, alone, he easily wielded it, struck Aineias’s hip, where the thighbone turns 305 in its socket—what’s commonly known as the cup—and crushed this cup, as well as severing both tendons.
The rock’s rough edge tore off the skin. Then the warrior sank to his knees and remained thus, leaning on one strong hand thrust to the ground, while black night shrouded his vision. 310

Now indeed Aineias, that lord of men, would have perished, if not for the quick sharp eye of Zeus’s daughter Aphrodītē, his mother, on whom Anchīsēs sired him when out herding his oxen: about her dear son she flung her white arms, and before him spread a bright fold of her robe to hide him 315 and act as a wall against missiles, lest some swift-horsed Danaän might let fly bronze at his body and rob him of life.

So she brought her dear son safely out from the conflict.
Nor did the son of Kapaneus forget the instructions given him by Diomēdēs, good at the war cry: 320 he tethered his own whole-hoofed horses well away from the turmoil, lashing their reins tight to the chariot rail, and made straight for the fine-maned horses of Aineias, drove them off from the Trojans to the well-greaved Achaians, and turned them over there to Deïpylos, his dear comrade— 325 whom he honored above all of his age: their minds were as one—to drive to the hollow ships. That done, the hero mounted his chariot, picked up the gleaming reins, and at once in search of Tydeus's son urged on his strong-hoofed horses with furious zest. But the latter had taken his pitiless bronze 330 in pursuit of Kypris, aware what a weakling goddess she was—not the kind who lords it in a battle of warriors, no Athēnē she, for sure, no Enyo, sacker of cities!⁴

 Now, when he overtook her in his chase through the crowded ranks, he sprang at her, did high-spirited Tydeus's son, and lunged, 335 and sliced into the flesh of her hand with his keen-edged bronze—that delicate hand! The spear drove straight into her flesh—clean through the fragrant robe toiled on by the Graces themselves—at the base of her palm: out flowed the goddess's blood, immortal ichōr, such as flows in the veins of the blessed gods, 340 for they neither eat bread nor drink fire-bright wine, and so are bloodless, and come thus to be called immortals.
 She screamed aloud, and let her son fall, but Phoibos Apollo gathered him up in his arms and kept him safe in a dark cloud, lest one of the swift-horsed Danaāns 345 might fling bronze into his breast and rob him of life.
 But over her Diomēdēs, good at the war cry, shouted:
 "Back off, daughter of Zeus! Give up fighting and warfare!
 Does it not suffice you to mislead weakling women?
 If you meddle with battle again, I tell you, you'll shudder 350 at its very name, even if you only hear it from others."

So he spoke, but she went off distraught, in a sorry state, and was met by wind-footed Iris, who led her from the turmoil, bent double with pain, her lovely flesh now darkened.
 Then, away on the left of the battlefield, she found fierce Arēs, 355 sitting, his spear left leaning against a cloud, with his swift horses. She fell on her knees before her beloved brother, and begged him with many prayers for his gold-bridled horses:

4. Kypris, i.e., "she of Cyprus", was a common epithet of Aphroditē, though in the Iliad it occurs only here (five times) in bk. 5, and "does not participate in a formulaic system" (HE 2: 450). Enyo was a minor war goddess: her name is limited to Diomēdēs' aristeia. Arēs (whom she attends at 592) has the linked epithet Enyalios.

“Dear brother, come to my rescue, give me your horses!
 I need to go to Olympos, the abode of the immortals— 360
 I have a most painful wound, that this mortal person dealt me:
 Tydeus’s son, who’d fight now even with Zeus our father.”

So she spoke, and Arēs gave her his gold-frontleted horses, and she climbed aboard the chariot distraught at heart, and Iris mounted beside her, grasped the reins in her hands, 365 and whipped up the horses. They, nothing loath, took flight, and quickly arrived at the gods’ abode, steep Olympos.
 There wind-footed swift Iris made the horses stop, unyoked them from the chariot, fed them ambrosial fodder.
 But glorious Aphrodītē collapsed in the lap of Diōnē,⁵ 370 her mother, who clasped her daughter in her arms, soothingly stroked her, and addressed her with these words:
 “Which of the gods in heaven, dear child, has done this to you, without reason, as though you were openly misbehaving?”

To her then sweetly-smiling Aphrodītē made reply: 375
 “It was Tydeus’s son wounded me, high-spirited Diomēdēs, because I was taking my dear son away from the fighting—Aineias, by far the dearest of all men to me: for now the grim fighting’s no longer between Trojans and Achaians—these Danaäns are fighting even with the immortals.” 380

To her then the glorious goddess Diōnē made reply: “Bear up, my child, and endure, despite what you’re suffering; for many of us suffer likewise—we, the Olympos-dwellers—at the hands of men, and bring harsh grief on one another.
 Thus Arēs suffered,⁶ when Ōtos and powerful Ephialtēs, 385 the sons of Alōeus, bound him in prisoning fetters, and there in a brazen jar he lay chained for thirteen months.
 Then indeed would Arēs, that glutton for war, have perished, had not their stepmother, beautiful Ēëriboia, told all to Hermēs, who rescued Arēs by stealth— 390

5. Diōnē (the di- may simply indicate “goddess”) was of uncertain parentage; and there is a better-known myth (Hes. Th. 188–93) reporting Aphrodītē’s birth from the foam generated by Ouranos’s severed genitals. Perhaps a Homeric desire here to keep clear of the latter?

6. Ōtos and Ephialtēs, sons of Poseidōn, were among the Giants (nine fathoms tall when nine years old) who piled Ossa on Olympos (Od. 11.305–20). Their assault on Arēs was in revenge for his killing Adonis, whose safeguarding had been their responsibility.

in a sorry state now, worn out by his harsh bonds.
 Thus Hērē suffered, when Hēraklēs, Amphitryōn's strong son, shot her in the right breast with a three-barbed arrow;
 then she too was seized by unquenchable agony.
 Huge Hādēs was another one hurt by a bitter arrow, 395 when this same man, son of Zeus the aegis-bearer, among the dead shot him in Pylos, gave him over to pain.
 So he went to the house of Zeus and high Olympos grieving at heart, transfixed with pain: for the arrow had pierced his powerful shoulder, affected his heart. 400 But Paiëōn,⁷ by applying painkilling herbs and ointments healed him: no mortal he, not made for death.
 Brutal and violent man, who did vile acts without thinking, who with his archery troubled the gods that hold Olympos!
 Now against you the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē, has set 405 this man: fool that he is, Tydeus's son's mind does not grasp the fact that there's no long life for a man who fights the gods—that Papa won't come back for his children to greet or cling round
 his knees: no return from the wars and the bitter grind of battle.
 So now let Tydeus's son, mighty warrior though he be, 410 take care lest someone better than you should fight him, and indeed lest Aigialeia, Adrēstos's watchful daughter, should rouse her household from sleep with her agonized wailing for her wedded husband, the finest warrior of the Achaians—she, the strong-hearted wife of Diomēdēs the horse breaker.” 415
 So saying, with both hands she wiped the wrist clean of ichōr:
 Aphrodītē's arm was made whole, her sharp pains were allayed.
 But as they both looked on, Athēnē and Hērē kept needling Zeus son of Kronos with sarcastic comments, the first to speak being the grey-eyed goddess Athēnē: 420 “Zeus, father, will you be angry with me for what I tell you?
 It would seem that our Kypris has been urging some Achaian lady to go with the Trojans, whom now she madly adores,

7. About Ēēriboia nothing certain was known even in antiquity. Amphitryōn's strong son is Hēraklēs. The shooting of Hādēs at Pylos is recorded only here and was much discussed by baffled Hellenistic scholars (Kirk, 2: 102, cf. Ganz 70). Paiëōn was a god of healing, mentioned on a Linear B tablet from Knossos, who much later came to be identified with Apollo.

and while caressing whichever well-dressed Achaian she chose, scratched her delicate hand on the lady's golden brooch." 425

So she spoke; but he smiled, did the father of gods and men, and spoke thus, calling her over, to golden Aphrodītē:
"Not for you, my child, is the business of warfare: you should rather be concerned with the charming works of marriage, and leave all these other things to swift Arēs and Athēnē." 430

But while they were talking like this, each one to the other, Diomēdēs of the great war cry sprang at Aineias, well aware that he was protected by Apollo himself:
yet not even the great god awed him, he was still urgent to kill Aineias, and strip his splendid armor from him. 435 Three times he lunged at Aineias, mad-keen to cut him down; three times his gleaming shield was slammed back by Apollo.
But when for the fourth time he charged, like some divine being,
then in a terrible voice Apollo the archer shouted:
"Think well, son of Tydeus! Withdraw, do not presume 440 to think like the gods, since in no manner is the race of immortals akin to that of earthbound men."

Such his words: Tydeus's son gave ground a little, backwards, to keep clear of the wrath of Apollo the archer, who then took Aineias out of the turmoil, set him down far away 445 in sacred Pergamon, where his own shrine had been founded:
there Lētō together with bow-hunter Artemis healed him in the great sanctuary, shed splendor on him, while a phantom was fashioned by silver-bowed Apollo, a clone of Aineias himself, with his kind of armor, 450 and round that phantom both Trojans and resplendent Achaians hacked at the ox-hide shields protecting each other's chests, the round shields and the fringed leather bucklers. Then indeed to fierce Arēs there spoke Phoibos Apollo: "Arēs, Arēs ruin of mortals, blood-guilty, city-stormer, 455 won't you now intervene, drag this man out of the fighting—Tydeus's son, who at present would even fight Zeus the Father?
First he tackled Kypris, wounded her hand at the wrist,
then he came charging at me like some superhuman creature."
So he spoke, and set himself down on Pergamon's heights, 460 while killer Arēs entered the Trojans' ranks, spurred them on, in the likeness of Akamas, quick-footed Thracian leader, calling on Priam's sons, Zeus's nurslings, to take action:

 "You sons of Priam, a king well favored by Zeus, how long will you let your people be slaughtered by the Achaians? 465
 Will it be till the fighting is round our strong-built gates?
 That man is down whom we honored as much as noble Hektōr—Aineias, great-hearted Anchīsēs' son. So come now, let's rescue our noble comrade from the tumult of battle."

With these words he aroused each man's urgency and spirit, 470 while Sarpēdōn severely rebuked illustrious Hektōr:
 "Hektōr, that rage you once had—where has it vanished to?
 Did you think you'd hold this city without troops or allies?
 Just you alone, with your brothers and your sisters' husbands?
 Not a single one of these now can I see or recognize— 475
 No, they're cowering back like dogs set around a lion,
 And the fighting's left to us, who are only your allies!
 Such an ally am I, and I came here from far away—far distant is Lycia, by the eddying Xanthos river, where I left my dear wife and my infant son, and many 480 possessions, things that the needy all eye with longing.
 Yet even so I urge on the Lycians, am fired up myself to engage hand to hand, though there's nothing here of the sort that the Achaians might want to drive or carry off—whereas you just stand around, don't even command 485 your men to be steadfast, and fight to protect their wives!
 Take care you're not snared in the seine of a catch-all net and end as the prey and spoil of enemy warriors, who'll soon lay waste your city and its flourishing people!
 All this should be your concern, both night and day, 490 with entreaties to the commanders of your far-famed allies to stand firm: that's how you'll avoid such stern rebukes."

So spoke Sarpēdōn, and his words stung Hektōr's spirit.
 At once he sprang to the ground, in his armor, from his chariot, brandishing two sharp spears, ranged widely through the ranks, 495 urging them on to fight, stirred up the clash of battle.
 So they rallied, stood firm, facing up to the Achaians, and the Argives closed ranks at their coming, did not falter.
 As the wind blows chaff across the sacred threshing-floors when men are winnowing, when golden-haired Dēmētēr 500 amid gusts of wind works hard to separate grain from chaff, and the heaps of chaff slowly whiten, so now the Achaians became white with the flying dust kicked up amongst them to the brazen sky by the horses' hooves, as battle was joined once more, and the charioteers came wheeling around. 505

They bore their hands' fury straight onward, while fierce Arēs shrouded the battle in darkness to help the Trojans, ranged across the whole field, thus fulfilling the injunctions of gold-sworded Phoibos Apollo, who commanded him to arouse the Trojans' spirits, seeing that Pallas Athēnē 510 had gone away, since it was she was supporting the Danaäns.

Now Apollo himself sent Aineias forth from the wealthy sanctuary, put great strength in the breast of the people's shepherd.
 So Aineias was back there among his companions, who rejoiced to see him rejoin them alive, unhurt and sound of limb, 515 and full of high courage. But they questioned him not at all, being concerned with that other work, which he of the silver bow and Arēs, ruin of mortals, and ever-fierce Strife were rousing.

Meanwhile both Aiases and Odysseus and Diomēdēs were urging the Danaäns on to battle; but they themselves 520 had no fear of the Trojans' violence or of their onsets, but stood there steadfast, like clouds that the son of Kronos on a windless day sets down on mountain summits—quite still, while the rage of the north wind sleeps, and the other furious winds, that scatter the shadowy clouds 525 with the force of their screaming gales: in such a way did the Danaäns face the Trojans: steadfast, unyielding, while Atreus's son ranged through the ranks with many a call to his troops: "My friends, be men now, make brave your hearts, feel shame before one another in this violent combat— 530
 of those who feel shame more survive than lose their lives, while runaways get no glory, win no battles."

With that he threw his spear swiftly, hit a prime fighter, Deïkoön, a comrade of high-spirited Aineias, Pergasos's son, whom the Trojans honored like Priam's own 535 offspring, since he was quick to fight in the front ranks.
 His shield was hit by the spear that lord Agamemnōn cast, and failed to stop it: the bronze point drove clean through,

pierced his baldric, and entered the lower part of his belly.
He fell with a thud, and his armor rattled upon him. 540

Then in return Aineias killed two Danaän prime fighters, sons both of Dioklēs, Krēthōn and Orsilochos, whose father dwelt in Phērē, a well-built settlement, a man of rich livelihood—his lineage that of the river Alpheios, whose broad stream flows through Pylian country— 545 who sired Orsilochos to be lord over many men.
Now Orsilochos in turn sired high-spirited Dioklēs, and to Dioklēs were born these two sons, being twins, Krēthōn and Orsilochos, fine all-round warriors both.
When these two reached manhood they went on the black ships 550 to horse-rich Troy with the Argives, seeking indemnity for Atreus's sons, Agamemnōn and Menelaös; but themselves it was that the fate of death now obliterated.
They resembled a pair of lions, high mountain dwellers, reared by their mother as cubs in some deep woodland thicket: 555 the pair of them, snatching cattle and fattened sheep, wreak havoc on the steadings of shepherds, till finally they themselves fall victim to men's hands, are slain with the sharp bronze.
Just so these two, overcome by the hands of Aineias, crashed headlong, like a couple of tall felled fir trees. 560

Now

their falling stirred pity in Menelaös the warlike:
through the front ranks he strode, armored in gleaming bronze, spear poised and ready—with Arēs inflaming his rage, so that he might be destroyed at the hands of Aineias.
But Nestōr's high-spirited son Antilochos saw him: through 565 the front ranks he strode, concerned for the people's shepherd, lest he suffer some hurt, and lose them all they'd toiled for.
Both men had their arms raised, each with his keen-edged spear aimed at the other, both in a fury to do battle: but Antilochos then took his place beside the people's shepherd, 570 and Aineias did not stand firm, swift warrior though he was, when he saw those two side by side, and holding the line:
who then, after dragging the corpses to the Achaians' ranks, left them—ill-fated pair—in the hands of their companions, and themselves turned back to join the front-line fighters. 575

There they took down Pylaimenēs, a match for Arēs, lord of the high-spirited Paphlagōnian shield men:
 him the son of Atreus, famed spearman Menelaös, ran through as he stood there, going in at the collarbone, while Antilochos caught Mydōn, his henchman and charioteer, 580 Atymnios's noble son, as he wheeled his whole-hoofed horses, with a flung rock, square on the elbow: from his hands the reins, white with ivory inlay, fell, and were dragged in the dust.
 Antilochos sprang at him, drove his sword-point through Mydōn's temple: gasping, he slumped from the fine chariot 585 headlong into the dust on head and shoulders, held up firm for a moment—he'd hit a deep sand-drift—but then his horses downed him, trampled him into the dust, as Antilochos whipped and drove them back to his own lines.

Hektōr glimpsed them across the lines, ran at them, 590 whooping aloud, and the ranks of the Trojans followed after in full strength: Arēs led them, and Enyo, queenly goddess:
 she brought with her the reckless tumult of battle, while Arēs, fists brandishing an enormous spear, ranged now in front of Hektōr, now behind him. 595

Seeing Arēs, Diomēdēs of the great war cry shuddered.
 As when a man stops, helpless, on his way across a great plain, confronted by a swift river flowing down to the sea, and seeing it in foaming spate starts sharply backwards, so now Tydeus's son gave ground, and called to his troops: 600
 "Friends, we were always in great awe of noble Hektōr—as a spearman, as a brave warrior, even though there was always one of the gods at his side, keeping ruin from him:
 so now accompanying him is Arēs, clad in a mortal warrior's form! Keep facing the Trojans, but give ground 605 steadily. Do not strive to match the gods in battle."

While he spoke, the Trojans drew ever closer to them.
 Then Hektōr killed two men well skilled in warfare, a pair in one chariot, Anchialos and Menesthēs, and their fall stirred great Aias, Telamōn's son, to pity: 610 he stepped up close, stood, and hurled his bright bronze spear and hit Amphios, son of Selagos, who had his dwelling in Paisos, a man of much wealth, of broad acres; yet destiny drove him to come as an ally to Priam and his sons.

 He was hit through the belt by Telamōn's son Aias, 615 who into his nether belly plunged the far-shadowing spear.
 He fell with a thud, and illustrious Aias ran up to strip off his armor. The Trojans now showered him with their sharp and gleaming spears: many lodged in his shield.
 He set his heel on the corpse, drew out the bronze 620 spear, yet was not able to work the man's splendid arms free from his shoulders, so beset he was by missiles, and he feared the strong ring-defense of these proud Trojans facing him, spears in their hands, so many, so brave, and despite his height, and strength, and manly valor 625 they thrust him away from them: he staggered and backed off.

So these were laboring in the hard-fought conflict.
 Now Tlēpolemos, Hēraklēs' son, a big strong fellow, was urged against godlike Sarpēdōn by all-mastering destiny; and when in their advance they were close one to the other— 630
 the son and the grandson of Zeus the cloud-gatherer—then Tlēpolemos was the first of the two to speak. He said:
 "Sarpēdōn, the Lycians' counselor, what necessity brings you to skulk here, you, a fellow unskilled in battle?
 They lie who claim you're the offspring of Zeus the aegis-bearer: 635 truth is, you fall very far short of those real men who were sired by Zeus in the days of our ancestors.
 Of a different breed, they say, was that mighty force Hēraklēs
 —my father, large-spirited, with the heart of a lion, who once came here on account of Laomedōn's mares⁸ 640 with only six ships and a handful of followers, yet sacked the city of Ilion, widowed its streets.
 But yours is a coward's heart, and your people are perishing.
 No help of any sort, I think, to the Trojans will be your coming from Lycia, be you never so strong: 645 vanquished, rather, by me you'll pass the gates of Hādēs."

To him Sarpēdōn, the Lycian leader, responded:
 "Tlēpolemos, that man did indeed destroy sacred Ilion,

8. The semi-divine horses mentioned at 222 (see n. 3). Hēraklēs rescued Laomedōn's daughter Hēsionē from a sea monster; Laomedōn had promised him some of the horses as a reward, but reneged on his promise, after which Hēraklēs sacked Troy.

through the senselessness of one person, lordly Laomedōn, who rewarded his good work with the harshest of insults, 650 and refused him the mares for which he had come so far.
 But for you, here, I tell you, the black death-spirit will bring your end at my hands: laid low by my spear you'll give glory to me, and your soul to horse-proud Hādēs."

So spoke Sarpēdōn. Tlēpolemos lifted his ash spear, 655 and both men's long lances sped from their hands at the same instant. Sarpēdōn's struck home square on the neck, clean through which its lethal point now penetrated, Tlēpolemos's sight was shrouded by the murky gloom of night;
 while his own long spear struck home on Sarpēdōn's left thigh, 660 and the zestful point drove in forcefully, scraping the bone, but Sarpēdōn's father Zeus still warding off death from him.

Then his noble comrades began to carry godlike Sarpēdōn out of the fighting, weighed down by the length of the spear that dragged behind; yet no one had noticed it, let alone thought 665 of pulling the ash spear out of his thigh, to let him walk, so busy they were, such toil they had in his protection.

On the other side, the Achaians, well-greaved, began carrying Tlēpolemos out of the fighting. This noble Odysseus noticed—he of the steadfast spirit—and his heart was hot for action. 670

Now he debated his choice, what he thought, how he felt:
 Was he to further pursue the son of loud-thundering Zeus?
 Or should he set out to kill many more of the Lycians?
 But since it was not fated that great-hearted Odysseus should lay this strong son of Zeus low with the keen-edged bronze, 675 Athēnē now turned his mind toward the Lycians in general.

So he went on to take down Koiranos, Alastōr, Chromios, Alkandros, Halios, Noēmōn, and Prytanis: and more Lycians still would great-hearted Odysseus have slain had not great bright-helmeted Hektōr taken sharp notice. 680 Through the front ranks he strode, in his helmet of gleaming bronze, bringing fear to the Danaäns. But there was joy at his coming for Zeus's son Sarpēdōn, who addressed him piteously:
 "Son of Priam, don't let me lie here, as prey for the Danaäns, but come to my aid! Then, afterwards, let life leave me 685 if it's in your city—seemingly I was not destined to make the journey back to my own, my native land, and gladden the heart of my wife, and my infant son.”

So he spoke: bright-helmeted Hektōr made him no answer, but hurried past, eager as quickly as might be 690 to drive back the Argives, to take the lives of many.

Then the noble companions of godlike Sarpēdōn set him down under the splendid oak, sacred to Zeus of the aegis, and out through his thigh the ash spear was thrust by his dear comrade, strong Pelagōn. The breath of life 695 left him, and over his eyes a mist was shed. But he got his breath back again, and the blustering north wind’s gusts now restored the life he’d so painfully gasped out.

The Argives, hard-pressed by Arēs and bronze-clad Hektōr, though they did not turn and flee to their black ships, yet 700 could not hold firm in the battle line, kept backing off, now that they’d noticed Arēs among the Trojans.

So who was the first, who the last that got to be slaughtered by Hektōr, the son of Priam, and brazen Arēs?

Godlike Teuthras, and, next, Orestēs, driver of horses, 705
Trēchos, Aitōlian spearman, Oinomāos, Helenos, Oinōps’s son, bright-kilted Oresbios who dwelt in Hylē—a man much occupied with wealth—close by the Kephisian lake, and near him lived other Boiōtians, all of them owners of rich and fertile acres. 710

But when the goddess, white-armed Hērē, saw them busily killing off Argives in violent combat, then straight away she addressed Athēnē with winged words: “Well now, unwearying child of Zeus of the aegis, vain indeed was the promise we made to Menelaös, 715 that he’d sack strong-walled Ilion before returning home, if we allow baneful Arēs to rage on in this fashion!
So, let us two likewise put our minds to daring valor.”

Thus she spoke; the grey-eyed goddess Athēnē did not disregard her. Off she went to harness the gold-bridled horses— 720 she, Hērē, high goddess, daughter of great Kronos!— while Hēbē quickly, at the chariot’s sides, set the curved and eight-spoked wheels round the iron axle. Of these the outer rim is of gold, imperishable: laid on it are tires of fitted bronze, a marvel to look upon, 725 with hubs of silver, revolving on either side, while the body is tightly woven with straps of gold and silver, and there are two rails that run around it.

From it stood out the silver pole, and on its end she bound fast the yoke, and to it fastened the harness, 730 both of fine gold, while Hērē brought under the yoke the swift-footed horses, impatient for strife and the war cry.

But Athēnē, the daughter of Zeus the aegis-bearer, let fall on her father's floor the soft embroidered robe that she herself had made, worked with her own hands, 735 and, donning the tunic of Zeus the cloud-gatherer,
armed herself in all grim warfare's accoutrements.
Over her shoulders she spread the tasseled aegis—
a fearful thing, crowned all around with Panic, and Strife is on it, and Prowess, and heart-chilling Pursuit; 740 there too is the Gorgon head of the fearful monster, fearful and terrible, portent of Zeus the aegis-bearer.
She set on her head the helmet, double-bossed, quadruple-plated, all golden, its inlay showing the troops of a hundred cities.
Into the fiery chariot then she stepped, grasped her spear— 745 weighty, huge, thick—with which she quells the ranks of men, the heroes who've angered this child of a mighty sire.
Now Hērē gave a quick flick of her whip to the horses;
of themselves the sky's gates groaned open, guarded by the Seasons, to whom are entrusted the firmament and Olympos, 750 whether to lift off the thick clouds, or impose them.
Straight through those gates they drove their goad-spurred horses, and found the son of Kronos apart from the other gods, ensconced on the topmost peak of many-ridged Olympos.
Then the goddess, white-armed Hērē, halted the horses, 755 and to most high Zeus, son of Kronos, put this question:
"Zeus, father, are you not wroth at these violent deeds of Arēs—that he's destroyed so many—and such fine—Achaian troops, pointlessly, out of due order, to my grief, while Kypris and silver-bowed Apollo, at their ease, rejoice at having 760 let loose this madman who knows nothing of decent conduct?"

Zeus, father, will you hold it against me if I give Arēs a painful beating, and chase him away from the battlefield?”

Then in reply to her words Zeus the cloud-gatherer said:
“Yes, go to it, rouse up against him Athēnē the spoil-bringer: 765 she’s especially used to inflicting harsh pain upon him.”

So he spoke, and the goddess, white-armed Hērē, did not ignore him. She whipped up her horses, and they, not unwilling, winged their way between earth and starry heaven. As far as a man’s gaze reaches into the hazy distance 770 while he sits on a lookout point, staring over the wine-hued deep, such the span that the gods’ neighing horses leap at one bound.
But when they came to Troy and its two flowing rivers, where Simoeis and Skamandros merge their streams, then the goddess, white-armed Hērē, halted her horses, 775 unharnessed them from the chariot, hid them in thick mist, while Simoeis made ambrosia spring up for their grazing.

Now the two queens strutted off like a brace of wild pigeons, eager to come to the aid of the Argive warriors; and when they reached the place where the most and the bravest 780 stood ranged round the mighty person of Diomēdēs, the horse breaker, like lions that rend and eat raw flesh, or wild pigs, boars, whose strength is far from trifling, then white-armed Hērē, the goddess, stopped and shouted, in the likeness of great-hearted Stentōr, the brazen-voiced, 785 whose shout matched in volume that of fifty other men: “Shame, Argives! Cowardly creatures, good only to look at!
So long as noble Achilles took part in the fighting, then the Trojans would not even venture beyond the Dardanian gates, so scared they were of that massive spear of his. But now 790 they fight far away from the city, out by the hollow ships.”

So saying she aroused the passion and spirit of every man, while to Tydeus’s son now sped the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē, and found the king close beside his horses and chariot, cooling the wound that the arrow of Pandaros dealt him; 795 for the sweat was giving him trouble under the broad strap of his round shield. He was troubled, his arm had wearied from lifting the strap and wiping the dark blood clots away.
Laying hold of his horses’ yoke the goddess declared:

“Not much indeed like himself was the son that Tydeus begot— 800
 Tydeus was short of stature, but what a great fighter!
 Even that time when I wouldn’t let him do battle or parade his courage—when, no other Achaians with him, he came to Thēbē as a messenger, to its great crowd of Kadmeians. I told him to feast in their halls, relax, 805 but he with his fierce spirit, the same as always, challenged the young Kadmeians, beat them at everything easily—such a supporter I was on his behalf!
 Now beside you too I stand as a guardian, ready and eager to bid you battle the Trojans— 810 yet either fatigue from much fighting has entered your limbs, or maybe you’re in the grip of craven fear—if so, you’re no true offspring of Tydeus, Oineus’s warrior son.”

Then in response to her words strong Diomēdēs declared:
 “I know you, goddess, daughter of Zeus of the aegis: 815 so I’ll answer you readily, tell the truth, hide nothing.
 No craven fear grips me, no shrinking from action. But I still remember the charges that you yourself laid on me:
 you would not permit me to battle, at close quarters, the rest of the blessed gods; but should Zeus’s daughter Aphrodītē 820 enter the fighting, her I should wound with the sharp bronze.
 That is why I have pulled back myself, and have ordered all the rest of the Argives to regroup here, being well aware that it’s Arēs who lords it at present over the battlefield.”

Then in answer to him spoke the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē: 825 “Diomēdēs, Tydeus’s son, so dear to my heart, you need not fear Arēs because of that, nor any one of the other immortals—such a supporter I am on your behalf!
 So come, straight off at Arēs drive your whole-hoofed horses—Get up close, hit him, don’t be in awe of frantic Arēs, 830 this raving madman, a sick piece of work, a two-faced liar, who just now promised, when talking with me and Hērē, to fight the Trojans, yes, and give aid to the Argives—but now consorts with the Trojans, his promises forgotten.”

So saying, she seized Sthenelos, pulled him backwards, 835 dumped him out of the chariot. Nimbly he jumped aside, while she now mounted and stood beside noble Diomēdēs, a goddess hot for the fray. Loud creaked the oaken axle under its load: it bore a great man, and a terrible goddess.

 Pallas Athēnē then grasped the whip and the reins, 840 and instantly straight at Arēs she drove the whole-hoofed horses.
 He was busy stripping the armor from huge Periphas, by far the best man among the Aitōlians, Ochlēsios's splendid son.
 Him bloodstained Arēs was stripping; but Athēnē put on the cap of Hādēs,⁹ to stop mighty Arēs from seeing her. 845

But when Arēs, ruin of mortals, saw noble Diomēdēs, he left giant Periphas lying there, on the same spot where he'd first cut him down and robbed him of his life, and made straight for Diomēdēs, the horse breaker, and then 850 when, in their advance, they were near the one to the other, Arēs lunged out over the yoke and the horses' reins with his bronze spear, hungry to snatch the life out of him; but it was caught by the hand of the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē, who jerked it up over the chariot, to miss its target. Next, Diomēdēs of the good war cry thrust out hard 855 with his bronze spear, and Pallas Athēnē drove it into Arēs' lower belly, where the kilt guarded him.
 Here he hit, here he wounded him, ripping his fine flesh, and tore the spear out again. Then brazen Arēs bellowed as loud as the war cry of nine thousand—no, ten thousand— 860 fighting troops, as they clash in his, Arēs', strife.
 Now Achaians and Trojans were seized by fear and trembling, so loudly bellowed Arēs, he of warfare insatiate.

Like a black tornado that's formed out of the clouds after a heat-spell, when a blustering wind arises, 865 so to Tydeus's son Diomēdēs did brazen Arēs look, as he rose through the clouds to the wide heaven.
 Swiftly he came to the gods' seat, to steep Olympus, sat down by Zeus son of Kronos, anguished at heart, showed him the immortal blood still flowing from his wound, 870 and tearfully thus addressed him with winged words:

9. The sole mention by Homer of this cap of invisibility, a very old, widespread piece of folklore evidently linked to the popular etymology of Hādēs, "the unseen one" (Kirk, 2: 147). "[I]t is of course not necessary to suppose that the poet conceives Athena as literally putting on a cap," Leaf solemnly informs us; this was just "the traditional—almost proverbial—way of saying that she makes herself invisible to Ares" (1: 194).

“Zeus, father, are you not angered at seeing these violent deeds?
 We gods must always endure the most cruel suffering through each others’ ill will when we ally with mortals!
 We’re all at war with you, for you bore this mad accursed 875 daughter of yours, her mind always set on lawless acts!
 Look, all the other gods who are on Olympos are obedient to you, each one of us is your subject; yet her you oppose in no way, neither by word nor deed, but give her her head, since the little horror’s your child. 880
 So now Tydeus’s son, the arrogant Diomēdēs, she’s incited to vent his fury against the immortal gods.
 First he tackled Kypris, wounded her hand at the wrist,
 then he came charging at me like some superhuman creature.
 But my quick feet let me escape—otherwise long since 885
 I’d have been lying there in agony among the gruesome corpses, alive still, yet made strengthless by his bronze’s strokes.”
 To him with a fierce glance spoke Zeus the cloud-gatherer:
 “Don’t sit here by me and whine, you two-faced trimmer!
 Of all the gods on Olympos, I find you the most hateful— 890
 quarrels are what you love most, and wars and battles.
 You’ve got all your mother’s spirit, ungovernable, unyielding—Hērē! It’s all I can do to make her heed my orders, so it’s by her promptings, I’d guess, that you’re in this trouble.
 Still, I can’t bear to let you endure pain any longer— 895 you’re my offspring, it was to me your mother bore you.
 Had it been any other god who sired such a little horror, you’d long since have found yourself down lower than the Titans.”

 So saying, he commanded Paiëōn to make Arēs whole, and over his wound Paiëōn spread pain-killing medicines 900 and healed him: for he was not made of mortal stuff. As when an infusion of fig juice quickly thickens white milk that was liquid before, and it curdles as a man stirs it, so swiftly now did he heal impetuous Arēs, and Hēbē gave him a bath, and dressed him in elegant garments, 905 and he sat there by Zeus son of Kronos, exulting in his glory.

 Then those two—Hērē of Argos and Athēnē the Defender—went back to great Zeus’s palace, after thus making Arēs, ruin of mortals, give up his slaughter of warriors.

Book 6

The grim strife of Achaians and Trojans was left then to itself:
now this way, now that, the battle kept shifting across the plain, as each side aimed at the other their bronze-tipped spears, between the Simoeis river and the waters of Xanthos.

Aias, Telamōn's son, the Achaians' bulwark, was first 5 to break through the Trojans' ranks, bringing hope to his comrades; for he laid low the foremost fighter among the Thracians, Eussōros's son Akamas, a big strong fellow—threw first, caught the boss of Akamas's helmet with its horsehair crest:
the bronze spear-point stuck in his forehead, entered 10
the cranium, and darkness enveloped both his eyes.

Diomēdēs, good at the war cry, now slew Axylos, Teuthras's son, whose home was in well-built Arisbē:
a person of wealth and substance, hospitable too, for his house stood on the high road, was open to everyone. 15 Yet of these not one was there to save him from wretched death, by facing the foe before him: Diomēdēs cut off both him and his henchman Kalēsias, at that time his charioteer; together they entered the underworld.

Euryalos slaughtered Drēsos and Opheltios, then went 20 after Aisēpos and Pēdasos, whom on a time a nymph, a naiad, Abarbarea, bore to blameless Boukoliōn.
Boukoliōn was the offspring of noble Laomedōn, his first-born, though his mother bore him in secrecy.
Tending his flocks he was when he lay with the nymph, 25 who conceived and delivered twin sons. It was of these that Mēkisteus's son undid the power and the resplendent limbs, and stripped off the armor from their shoulders.

Astyalos fell to the staunch fighter Polypoitēs; Odysseus it was finished off Pidytēs of Perkōtē 30 with his bronze spear, while Teukros killed noble Aretaōn.
Antilochos, Nestōr's son, with his shining spear laid low Ablēros; Agamemnōn, lord of men, slew Elatos who dwelt in steep Pēdasos by the banks of wide-flowing Satnioeis. The hero Lēitos caught Phylakos 35 as he fled him; Eurypylos slaughtered Melanthios.

But Menelaös, good at the war cry, now took Adrēstos alive, for his two horses, stampeding across the plain, were snagged by a tamarisk branch, broke loose from the curved chariot at the pole's end, themselves made off for 40 the city, to which all the rest were bolting, panic-stricken; but he himself was thrown from his chariot, over the wheel, headlong into the dust, on his face. Then stood over him Atreus's son Menelaös, with his far-shadowing spear, and Adrēstos clutched his knees and besought him, saying: 45
 "Take me alive, son of Atreus, accept a fitting ransom!
 Much treasure's laid up in the house of my rich father—bronze, gold, and iron worked with much toil: from these
 my father would gladly pay you ransom past counting should he learn I am still alive by the Achaians' ships." 50

These words moved the spirit in Menelaös's breast:
 indeed, he was on the point of having his henchman take Adrēstos to the Achaians' swift ships, but Agamemnōn ran up to confront him, crying out in rebuke:
 "Menelaös, dear brother, what makes you care so much 55 for these people? Did you get the best treatment in your home from Trojans? Not one of them should escape sheer doom at our hands, no, not even the child whose mother still carries him in her belly: let the people of Ilion all perish together, unmourned, eradicated!" 60

Thus

the hero altered the mind-set of his brother, since what he urged had been destined. Menelaös with one hand thrust the hero Adrēstos away from him. Lord Agamemnōn stabbed him hard in the side. He collapsed. The son of Atreus, one heel on his chest, tore out the ash-wood spear. 65

Now Nestōr with a great shout cried out to the Argives:
 "My friends, you Danaän warriors, henchmen of Arēs, let no man now in his thirst for plunder hang back far in the rear, to let him bring most back to the ships:

no, let us rather kill foemen: that way you'll have leisure to strip the armor from corpses scattered across the plain." 70

With these words he aroused each man's fury and spirit:
then would the warlike Achaians have once more driven the Trojans, overcome by their craven spirit, back up into Ilion had there not come forward to speak to Aineias and Hektōr 75 Helenos, Priam's son, far the best of the diviners:
"Aineias and Hektōr, on you, above all other Trojans and Lycians, lies the weight of battle: you are the best in every venture, both for fighting and counsel.
Stand firm, then, and rally your troops before the gates, 80 visit all ranks, before they run off and tumble into their women's arms, a delight to their enemies!
Then, when you two have aroused all ranks to action, we'll make our stand here, face the Danaäns in battle, worn out though we are, since necessity forces us. 85 Hektōr, you should go into the city, carry back word to your mother and mine: she's to assemble the older women at the temple of grey-eyed Athēnē on the acropolis, and when she's unlocked the doors of that sacred domain, let her choose the robe that she deems the finest and largest 90 of those in her hall, the one that's most precious to her, and spread it over the knees of fair-haired Athēnē, vow
to sacrifice in her shrine a dozen yearling heifers that have never felt the goad, in the hope that she may pity
our town, and the Trojans' wives and infant children, 95
and hold back from sacred Ilion Tydeus's son,
that brutal spearman, that powerful source of rout, who has, I declare, proved the strongest of all the Achaians.
Not even Achilles so scared us, the leader of men, who they say was born of a goddess; this madman rages 100 over the mark, there's none can match him for violence."

So he spoke, and Hektōr did not disregard his brother, but leapt to the ground from the chariot in his battle gear, brandishing two sharp spears, and ranged widely through the ranks, urging them on to fight, stirred up the clash of battle. 105
So they regrouped, stood firm, facing up to the Achaians, and the Argives now gave ground, left off their killing, thinking that some immortal from starry heaven had come down to aid the Trojans, the way they'd rallied.

Now Hektōr with a great shout cried out to the Trojans: 110 “High-spirited Trojans, and you, our far-famed allies, be men, my friends, bear in mind your fighting spirit while I make my way to Ilion, exhort our elderly counsellors and our wives to offer their prayers to the immortals, to promise them ample sacrifice.” 115

After so saying, bright-helmeted Hektōr departed, the rim of black hide that ran round the outer edge of his bossed shield knocking on both neck and ankles.

Now Glaukos son of Hippolochos and the son of Tydeus met between the two armies, impatient to fight; and when 120 they came close, advancing the one against the other, Diomēdēs, good at the war cry, was the first to speak:
“Who are you, good sir, of all mortal men there are?
Never yet have I seen you in battle that brings men honor before, yet now you’ve advanced far ahead of the rest 125 in daring, since you stand up to my far-shadowing spear.
Unhappy are those whose sons confront my strength!
But if you are some immortal come down from heaven, then I will not myself do battle with the heavenly gods;
for not even the son of Dryas, mighty Lykourgos, 130 lived long after striving against the gods in heaven—that time he harried the nurses of frenzied Dionysos headlong down from Mount Nysa, and they all together threw down their ritual wands, assailed by the ox-goad of Lykourgos the killer, while Dionysos took flight, 135 plunged under the sea waves in terror, was received, panicking at the man’s shouts, in the bosom of Thetis.
The gods, the easy livers, now took against Lykourgos, and Kronos’s son made him blind; nor did he survive much longer, since all the deathless gods hated him. 140
So I would not choose to fight these blessed divinities!
But if you are a mortal, who eats what the earth yields, then come close, that you may the sooner enter destruction’s bounds.”

The illustrious son of Hippolochos answered him:
“Great-spirited son of Tydeus, why question my lineage? 145

As the generation of leaves, so is that of mankind:
 some leaves the wind scatters earthwards, but the fertile woodland grows others as spring returns in season.
 So with men: one generation grows, while another dies.
 But if you insist on knowing this too, the true facts 150 of my ancestry—something familiar to many—there is a city, Ephyrē, back in horse-pasturing Argos, where Sisyphos dwelt, the most crafty of all mankind, Sisyphos, Aiolos's son; the son he begot was Glaukos, and Glaukos in turn begot the blameless Bellerophōn. 155 On him the gods bestowed both good looks and seductive manliness, but against him Proitos plotted evil, drove him out of the realm, since he was far stronger, though Zeus had made him subject to Proitos's scepter.
 Now Proitos's wife was mad for him, queenly Anteia, 160 yearned to lie with him secretly, yet could never overcome the high-minded refusals of steadfast Bellerophōn.
 So she made up a false story that she told to King Proitos:
 "Either die yourself, Proitos, or else kill Bellerophōn, who attempted to lie with me in love against my will." 165
 So she spoke, and the king was angered by what he heard.
 Kill Bellerophōn he would not: his conscience shrank from that.
 But he sent him to Lycia, and gave him fatal tokens, many murderous signs incised in a folded tablet, to be shown to his father-in-law, and secure his death.¹ 170 So to Lycia he went, with the gods' faultless protection, and when he reached Lycia and the Xanthos river, the king of broad Lycia readily paid him honor:
 nine days he entertained him, sacrificed nine oxen, but when rosy-fingered Dawn appeared on the tenth day, 175 then he questioned his guest, asked to see whatever message he'd brought him from his son-in-law, Proitos.
 Now after he got his son-in-law's wicked message,

1. This is the only clear reference to writing in Homer. Whether the poet thought of the "murderous signs" as Hittite hieroglyphs, Linear B symbols, or the new alphabet is quite uncertain. Kirk inclines to the alphabet on the basis of the "folded tablet" (Kirk 2: 181). West argues that Homer "composed the Iliad with the aid of writing and over a long period" (West 2011, 10–11). Powell denies that the "signs" are anything more than "marks" and claims that Homer, though aware of writing, "does not use or understand it" (HE 3.943–44). The debate continues.

first he ordered Bellerophōn to kill the invincible Chimaira, a beast of divine, not earthly lineage, 180 a lion in front, a serpent behind, a goat in the mid-part, fearsomely breathing forth the fury of blazing fire.
 Her Bellerophōn slew, fulfilling the gods' portents; next he battled the far-famed Solymoi, calling this the toughest engagement of warriors in which he'd ever fought; 185 thirdly, he slaughtered the Amazons, women well-matched against men.
 Then, as he was returning, the king wove another smart trick:
 choosing from all broad Lycia the very best troops he set up an ambush. But none of these men came back home, for every last one was slain by blameless Bellerophōn. 190 Then, when the king recognized him as a god's strong scion, he kept him there, offered him his own daughter, gave him half of all his royal entitlements; and the Lycians measured him out an estate, the best land there was, fine acres of orchard and plowland for him to possess. 195
 His consort bore three children to warlike Bellerophōn: Isandros, Hippolochos, and Laodameia.
 With Laodameia Zeus the counselor lay in love, and she bore him godlike Sarpēdōn, he of the bronze helm.
 But finally even Bellerophōn, hated by all the gods, 200 became a solitary wanderer on the Aleian plain, eating his heart out, avoiding the trodden paths of men.
 Isandros his son was killed by Arēs, that glutton for war, on a campaign against the far-famed Solymoi;
 and his daughter golden-reined Artemis slew in anger. 205 Hippolochos, though, begot me: I declare myself his son.
 He sent me to Troy, and repeatedly urged upon me always to be the best, preeminent over others, nor ever to shame the line of my ancestors, by far the finest in Ephyrē and in all broad Lycia. 210
 This is the bloodstock, the lineage I'm proud to claim as mine."

 So he spoke: Diomēdēs, good at the war cry, rejoiced, planted his spear-point deep in the nurturing earth, and in friendly terms addressed the shepherd of the people:
 "Then you are my family's guest-friend, from way back! 215
 For noble Oineus once did entertain blameless

Bellerophōn in his halls, kept him there for twenty days, and the two gave each other the fine gifts of guest-friendship—from Oineus a baldric gleaming with scarlet, and from Bellerophōn a gold cup, two-handled, the same one 220
 I left back at home when I travelled here! But Tydeus I don't remember, being still a little child when he departed, that time the Achaian force perished at Thēbē.
 That makes me your friend and host in the Argive heartland, and you mine in Lycia, when I visit that country. Therefore 225 let us, even in the close fighting, avoid each other's spears, seeing I have many, both Trojans and far-famed allies, to kill—anyone a god grants me, or I can run down, while you have Achaians in plenty to cut down—if you can catch them!
 Now let's exchange armor, so that these men too may know 230 we declare ourselves to be guest-friends from ancestral times."

After thus speaking they sprang down from their chariots, clasped one another's hands, gave pledges of friendship;
 but Zeus son of Kronos robbed Glaukos of his senses, for the armor he exchanged with Tydeus's son Diomēdēs 235 was gold for bronze, one hundred oxen's worth for nine.

When Hektōr reached the Skaian gates and the oak tree, there ran out and gathered round him the Trojans' wives and daughters, enquiring about their sons and brothers, their neighbors or husbands; each one of them in turn he urged 240 to pray to the gods, for mourning was to be the lot of many.

But when he came to Priam's resplendent palace, with its polished stone colonnades—and in it there were fifty bedchambers, also of polished stone, set close each to the next; and in them there all the sons 245 of Priam slept, by the side of their wedded wives, while opposite in the courtyard were his daughters' dozen roofed bedchambers, also of polished stone, set close each to the next; and there the sons-in-law of Priam slept, by the side of their wedded wives— 250
 there his bountiful mother came out to meet him, bringing with her Laodikē, her most beautiful daughter, and she clasped him by the hand, and thus addressed him:

“Why have you left the rough fighting to come here, my child?
 These accursed Achaians’ sons must be pressing you hard 255 in the struggle around our city: did your spirit drive you here to pray with raised hands to Zeus from the topmost ramparts?
 Wait here, let me bring you honey-sweet wine, to pour a libation to Zeus the Father and the other immortals first—then enjoy it yourself, if you feel like drinking. 260
 When a man is worn out—just as you are worn out from fighting to save your fellows—wine greatly augments his strength.”

Then great bright-helmeted Hektōr answered her: “Bring me no mind-soothing wine, my lady mother, lest you unstring my limbs, and I forget my strength and courage; 265 besides, with unwashed hands I dare not pour out libations of fire-bright wine to Zeus; no prayers to the lord of storm clouds, Kronos’s son, by a man who’s smeared with blood and filth!
 But you should go to the shrine of Athēnē, the spoil-bringer, bearing burnt offerings, when you’ve assembled the older women; 270 and choose the robe that you deem the finest and largest of those in your hall, the one that’s most precious to you, and spread it over the knees of fair-haired Athēnē, vow
 to sacrifice in her shrine a dozen yearling heifers that have never felt the goad, in the hope that she may pity 275
 our town, and the Trojans’ wives and infant children,
 and hold back from sacred Ilion Tydeus’s son,
 that brutal spearman, that powerful source of rout!
 So, off with you to the shrine of Athēnē, the spoil-bringer, and I’ll go in search of Paris, require his presence, see if 280
 I can make him listen to me! Ah, how I wish that the earth would gape where he stands! The Olympian reared him to be a bane to the Trojans, to great-hearted Priam and Priam’s sons.
 Should I see him going down to the house of Hādēs, then I’d say that my mind had forgotten its wretched grief.” 285

So he spoke. She went into the palace, summoned her handmaids, sent them out through the city to collect the older women.
 She herself went down to the fragrant storeroom where her robes were kept, the fine work of Sidonian women, whom Aléxandros himself, divinely handsome, 290 had fetched back from Sidon, sailing the wide seas—that voyage on which he brought high-born Helen home.

From these robes Hekabē picked her gift to bring to Athēnē—the finest for its embroidery, and the largest, that shone like a star, and lay beneath all the others. 295
 Then she set out, accompanied by a crowd of older women.

When they reached Athēnē's temple, high on the citadel, the doors were opened for them by fair-cheeked Theanō, Kissēs' daughter, and wife of Antēnōr the horse breaker, since the Trojans had made her Athēnē's priestess. Then 300 they all, with ecstatic cries, raised up their hands to Athēnē, while fair-cheeked Theanō took the robe and laid it across the knees of Athēnē, the fine-tressed goddess, and invoked in prayer great Zeus's daughter: "Lady Athēnē, our city's protector, queen among goddesses, 305 now break Diomēdēs' spear, now grant that he himself fall prone in front of the Skaian Gates, and at once we'll sacrifice in your shrine a dozen yearling heifers that have never felt the goad, in the hope that you may pity
 our town, and the Trojans' wives and infant children." 310
 So she prayed; but Pallas Athēnē shook her head in denial.

Such were these women's prayers to great Zeus's daughter;
 but Hektōr had made his way to the house of Aléxandros, the fine house that he himself had built with the very best craftsmen then to be found in rich-soiled Troy: they'd made him 315 a bedchamber, main hall, and courtyard close beside the houses of Priam and Hektōr, high on the citadel.
 There Hektōr, dear to Zeus, entered, grasping a spear eleven cubits long: its bronze point in front of him gleamed bright; round the shaft there ran a golden ferrule. 320
 He found the man in his chamber, cleaning his splendid armor, his shield and corselet, and handling his back-bent bow, while Argive Helen sat there among her serving women, assigning to each her rare and delicate handiwork.
 Hektōr took one look, and rebuked him with shaming words: 325
 "Wretched fellow, it isn't decent for you to sit and sulk!
 Your people are fighting and dying outside the citadel and its sheer walls: it's you who set the din of battle as a flaming noose round this township. You'd be quick yourself to attack those you saw holding back from loathsome warfare! 330
 So up with you, or too soon deadly fire will scorch the city!"

To him then Aléxandros, divinely handsome, replied:
 You rebuke me justly, Hektōr, not more than is proper;
 so let me too tell you something: listen, and mark my words.
 Not so much out of rage or vexation at the Trojans 335 did I come and sit here: I wished to surrender to my sorrow.
 But now my wife, working on me with gentle words, has been urging me back to the fighting, and I myself feel that this would be better. Victory shifts from man to man.
 So just wait while I put on my battle gear, or else 340 go, and I'll follow: I'm sure I can overtake you."

So he spoke, but bright-helmeted Hektōr answered not one word, and him now Helen addressed with words of conciliation:
 "My brother-in-law, I'm a bitch, a horrible mischief-maker!
 How I wish that on the same day my mother first bore me 345 a grim blast of the storm wind had carried me off to some mountaintop, or else to some wave of the thunderous sea where the wave would have swept me away before any of this could happen! But no, since the gods ordained these troubles, then I wish I'd been bedfellow to a better man, who could feel 350 the righteous wrath of his fellows, their manifold insults.
 But his mind is not stable now, nor will ever be hereafter:
 for this, too, I foresee, he will reap his just reward.
 So come in now, my brother-in-law, relax in this chair, since it's you above all whose mind is beset with troubles 355 because of me, the bitch, and Aléxandros's blind folly:
 on us Zeus has settled a wretched fate: now and forever to be subjects of song for listeners as yet unborn."

Then great bright-helmeted Hektōr answered "Don't try to make me sit, Helen: though you love me, you'll not persuade me. 360 My spirit's already spurring me on to bring help to the Trojans, who greatly long for me in my absence.
 So, you rouse up him there, let him stir himself to action, soon enough to catch up with me while I'm still in the city:
 for I'm going first to my own house, in order to visit 365 my household, my dear wife, my infant son—who knows if I'll ever come safely home to them again, or whether the gods will destroy me at the hands of the Achaians?"

That said, bright-helmeted Hektōr went on his way, and quickly came to his well-built house, but did not 370 find white-armed Andromachē there at home: she'd gone, taking her child, together with one fine-robed attendant, to stand high up on the ramparts, wailing and shedding tears.
 So Hektōr, on not finding his blameless wife inside, went and stood at the threshold, and spoke with her handmaidens: 375
 "Come now, you handmaidens, answer me truly—where did white-armed Andromachē go when she left the house?
 To visit one of my sisters, or a brother's wife? Or was it to Athēnē's shrine, where the other fair-tressed Trojan women have gone to propitiate the awe-inspiring goddess?" 380

In reply to his question a busy housekeeper said:
 "Hektōr, since you urgently need a truthful answer, she's not gone to one of your sisters, nor to any brother's wife;
 nor to Athēnē's shrine, where the other fair-tressed Trojan women have gone to propitiate the awe-inspiring goddess, 385 but up onto Troy's great rampart, since she'd heard the Trojans were weary, the Achaians in great strength.
 So she hurried off to the wall, as fast as she could,
 like a crazy woman, along with a nurse to hold the child."

So spoke the woman, the housekeeper. Hektōr hurried back 390 from his house, the way he'd come, down the well-paved streets.
 When he'd traversed the great city and reached the Skaian Gates, through which he'd have to pass to return to the plain,
 there his bountiful wife came running to meet him, Andromachē, the daughter of great-hearted Ēētiōn— 395 Ēētiōn, whose home lay under wooded Plakos, in Thēbē below Plakos, lord of the Cilician people, whose daughter was the wife of bronze-clad Hektōr.
 She it was who now met him, and with her the servant clutching to her breast the tender child, still a baby, 400 Hektōr's beloved son, like some beautiful star, whom he called Skamandrios, but all others Astyanax, the city's king, since Hektōr alone guarded Ilion.
 Now he smiled as he looked at the child, saying not a word, but Andromachē came up beside him, still shedding tears, 405 and clasping his hand in hers addressed him in these words:

“Crazed man, your might will destroy you: you show no pity for your infant son, or for me, luckless woman, who’ll soon become your widow; too soon will all the Achaians set upon you and kill you! More profitable for me, 410 bereft of you, would it be to sink into the earth: no other consolation I’ll have, once you’ve met your destiny:
 nothing but grief. I’ve no father, no lady mother:
 my father was slain by noble Achilles, when he sacked that teeming city of the Cilician people, 415 high-gated Thēbē: yes, he cut down Ēētiōn, though he would not strip him—he shrank back from that as shameful—but cremated him there in his fine inlaid armor, heaped a funeral mound over him, and round it mountain nymphs, daughters of Zeus of the aegis, planted elm trees. 420 And of my seven brothers that were in our halls each one on the same day entered the realm of Hādēs, for all were slaughtered by noble swift-footed Achilles as they tended their white sheep and their shambling oxen.
 My mother, who was queen below wooded Plakos, 425 he brought back here, along with the rest of the plunder, and freed her again in return for ransom past counting;
 but in her father’s halls archer Artemis struck her down.
 Hektōr, you are my father, my lady mother, my brother too, as well as my young strong husband— 430
 I beg you, show some compassion, stay here on the wall, don’t make your son an orphan, your wife a widow!
 Station your troops by the fig tree, where the city’s most open to scaling, where the ramparts are vulnerable to assault—Three times has a picked force come there to make the attempt, 435 led by both Aiases, and by famous Idomeneus, with the sons of Atreus and Tydeus’s valiant offspring:
 someone, perhaps, well skilled in soothsaying told them, or else it’s their own spirit that drives them, urges them on.”

Then great bright-helmeted Hektōr answered her: “Wife, 440 all this is my concern too, but I’d be deeply ashamed before the Trojan men and deep-robed Trojan women if like a coward I hang back, far from the fighting. No, my spirit won’t let me, I’ve trained myself to excel always, to battle among the foremost Trojans, striving 445 to win great glory both for my father and for myself.

 For this I know well, in my heart and in my mind:
 A day will come when sacred Ilion will perish,
 with Priam, lord of the fine ash spear, and Priam's people.
 Yet it's not the Trojans' coming miseries that so concern me— 450 not what Hekabē will endure, or our sovereign Priam, or my brothers, so many, so valiant, who all may end up trodden into the dust by their hate-filled enemies—no, it's your grief I think of, when some bronze-corseleted Achaian will lead you away, weeping, your day of freedom gone, 455 to work the loom, maybe in Argos, for some other mistress, or fetch water back from the spring—Messeis or Hypereia—resentful, unwilling, but burdened by harsh necessity.
 And someone may say, when he sees you shedding tears:
 'Why, this is the wife of Hektōr, the very best warrior 460 of all the horse-breaker Trojans, when they fought around Ilion!' That's what they'll say, and for you there'll come still further sorrow,
 widowed of such a man who could spare you the day of enslavement!
 But may the heaped-up earth obliterate my corpse before I hear your cries, see them dragging you away." 465

So saying, illustrious Hektōr reached out to his son, but the child shrank back, screaming, into his fine-sashed nurse's bosom, distraught at the sight of his dear papa, terrified by the bronze, and the horsehair crest he glimpsed nodding scarily from the helmet's top. At this 470 his dear father and lady mother both burst out laughing, and at once illustrious Hektōr took off the helmet and laid it, bright-gleaming, on the ground, and then kissed his beloved son, and rocked him in his arms, and uttered a prayer to Zeus and the rest of the gods: 475
 "Zeus and you other gods, grant that this my child may also become, like me, renowned among the Trojans, my equal in strength, and rule with might over Ilion; so one day may someone claim 'He's far better than his father' as back he comes from the wars, bearing the bloodied gear 480 of the foe he has killed, and may his mother's heart rejoice."

So saying, he placed in the arms of his beloved wife his son, and she took him to her sweet-scented bosom, laughing and crying. At the sight her husband felt pity, caressed her with his hand, and spoke these words to her: 485 “My sad wife, don’t grieve at heart for me overmuch:

 no man shall send me to Hādēs before my fated day—though that day, I must tell you, no man has ever escaped, be he coward or hero, when once he’s born to this world!
 Go back to the house now, attend to your proper tasks, 490 the loom and the distaff, give your handmaids their orders, set them to work. But warfare shall be the business of men:
 all those—and myself above all—who are native to Ilion.”

So speaking, illustrious Hektōr picked up his helmet with its horsehair crest, and his dear wife went off homeward, 495 often turning to look back, and shedding big tears. But then quickly she reached home, the well-built house of Hektōr, killer of men. Inside she found her many handmaidens, and now she stirred them all to sad lamentation: so while Hektōr still lived, in his own house they mourned him, 500 for they thought he would never again come back from the war alive, or escape the rage and hands of the Achaians.

Nor did Paris stay long there in his own lofty house, but when he’d put on his splendid armor, inlaid with bronze, he hurried out through the city, trusting his nimble feet. 505
 As when some stalled horse, grain-fed at the manger, snaps his halter and gallops, hooves clattering, over the plain, off to bathe in the flow of his favorite river, proudly holding his head high, while about his shoulders his mane streams loose, and he trusts in his splendid strength 510 while his knees carry him swiftly to the haunts and pastures of mares, so Priam’s son Paris went striding down from lofty Pergamos,² gleaming bright in his armor like the sun, laughing aloud as his swift feet carried him on, and quickly he overtook noble Hektōr, his brother, just as he was 515 turning back from the place where he’d conversed with his wife.
 First to speak was Aléxandros, the godlike: “My brother,
 I fear I’m holding you up, when you want to be moving, by my lateness: I didn’t come at the time you told me to.”

2. Not to be confused with the Mysian city of Pergamon; Pergamos was the highest quarter of Troy, its acropolis, where Apollo’s temple stood (5.446).

In answer to him bright-helmeted Hektōr said: 520 “Look, no one in his right mind would choose to disparage your work in battle: your courage is not in question.
But you choose to hang back, not to fight, and it pains me to the quick of my heart when I hear those shaming comments about you from the Trojans, who face much harsh combat on your behalf. 525 Well, let’s be off: all this we’ll make right later, should Zeus let us set out one day, for the deathless gods of heaven, in our halls the wine bowl of freedom, when at last we’ve driven the well-greaved Achaians from the land of Troy.”

Book 7

So saying, illustrious Hektōr charged out through the gates, and with him Aléxandros, his brother: in their hearts both were hungry for battle and combat. Just as a god will provide eager sailors with a more than welcome tailwind, when they're weary of thrusting back seawater 5 with polished pinewood oars, and the labor's loosened their limbs,
so these two now appeared before the eager Trojans.

Then they started in. Paris cut down king Areithoös's son, Menesthios, native of Arnē, whom the war-club-wielding Areithoös sired on ox-eyed Phylomedousa; 10 and Hektōr struck Ēioneus with his sharp-tipped spear in the neck, under his good bronze helmet, undid his limbs; and Glaukos son of Hippolochos, the Lycians' leader, hit Iphinoös with his spear in the hard-fought combat—Dexios's son—as he leapt up behind his swift mares, 15 in the shoulder: he fell to the ground, his limbs were loosened.

When the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē, noticed these two slaughtering Argives in the hard-fought combat, she set off, quickly darting down from the heights of Olympos to sacred Ilion. Apollo hurried across to meet her, 20 for he'd glimpsed her from Pergamos, and wanted victory for the Trojans. The two of them met beside the oak tree, and the first to speak was the son of Zeus, Lord Apollo: “What's your urgency this time, daughter of mighty Zeus?
Why has your great spirit sent you down from Olympos? 25
Do you want to give victory, for a change, to the Danaäns?
You've certainly no pity for the Trojans who are dying.
Look, if you'd do as I say, it would make things better by far.
Let's break off the warfare and fighting now, at least for today—though hereafter they'll battle again, till they witness 30 Ilion's end, since it's dear to the hearts of you immortal ladies to see this city at last laid waste.”

In answer to him then spoke the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē: “Let it be so, archer: it’s what I myself had in mind coming down from Olympos to visit the Trojans and Achaians. 35
 But tell me, how do you plan to stop these men from fighting?”

In answer to her then spoke the son of Zeus, Lord Apollo:
 “Let us stir up the mighty passion of Hektōr the horse breaker, to the end that he may challenge some Danaän to face him, man against man, in the grimness of single combat. Then 40 the bronze-greaved Achaians are sure, in their resentment, to find an individual who’ll duel with noble Hektōr.”

So he spoke, and the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē, did not dissent. Now Helenos, Priam’s son, sensed in his heart the plan that the gods had chosen as they debated,¹ 45 and he went and stood beside Hektōr, and spoke to him, saying: “Hektōr, son of Priam, equal of Zeus in counsel, will you be persuaded by me, since I am your brother?
 Tell all the rest, both Achaians and Trojans, to be seated while you challenge whoever’s the best of the Achaians 50 to fight single-handed against you in fearful conflict, seeing it’s not yet your time to die, to meet your allotted fate:
 thus I have heard it said by the gods who live forever.”

So he spoke, and Hektōr took great pleasure in his words.
 Into the midst he strode, holding back the Trojan ranks 55 with his spear, grasped in the middle, and they all sat down, and Agamemnon settled the well-greaved Achaians, while Athēnē and the lord of the silver bow, Apollo, perched in the likeness of birds—vultures—high up on the tall oak of Zeus, the Father and aegis-bearer, 60 enjoying the sight of the warriors, whose serried ranks bristled with shields, helmets, spears. Just in the way the deep sea’s ruffled by a cat’s-paw breeze each time the west wind first stirs, and the deep turns black beneath it, so were the ranks of Achaians and Trojans as they settled 65 themselves in the plain, and Hektōr, between them both, now spoke:

1. Priam’s son Helenos has the power of prophecy (cf. 6.76) and can thus intuit what the gods have decided. His role as seer is not stressed (any more than that of Kassandrē), but as Kirk says, “the Trojans need a prophet, if only to balance Kalkhas” (Kirk 2: 237).

“Hear me out, you Trojans, and you well-greaved Achaians, while I tell you what the heart in my breast dictates. Our oaths the high-throned son of Kronos has not let be fulfilled, but rather has evil in mind for both sides, until either 70 you capture Troy of the fine ramparts, or else yourselves are brought low by the side of your own seafaring vessels.
 In your ranks are the best men of all the Achaians: from them let the one whose spirit impels him to fight me now come forth out of the mass, be your champion, battle noble Hektōr!
 So thus I declare, and let Zeus be our witness to it: 75
 If that man cuts me down with the keen-edged bronze, he can strip off my armor, take it back to the hollow ships, but must give back my corpse to be carried home, so that Trojans and Trojans’ wives may grant it its proper due of fire. 80
 But if I should slay him, and Apollo lets me triumph, I shall strip off his armor, take it back to sacred Ilion, and hang it up there in the shrine of Apollo the archer;
 but his corpse I’ll surrender at the well-benched vessels, to let the long-haired Achaians offer him funeral rites, 85 and raise him a burial mound beside the wide Hellespont.
 And one day in the future someone not yet born may say, as he sails his many-benched vessel over the wine-faced deep, ‘This is the burial mound of a warrior long deceased, slain, fighting valiantly, by illustrious Hektōr.’ Thus 90 someone will speak, and my fame will never perish.”

Such were his words, and they all sat quiet, in silence, ashamed to refuse the challenge, yet scared to accept it.
 But at last Menelaös stood up and spoke among them, with bitter contempt, greatly saddened at heart: “Ah me, 95 you empty braggarts, you women, not men, of Achaia!
 This will be an embarrassing business, deep, deep disgrace, if no Danaän now steps forward to stand against Hektōr!
 But you—may you all become mere earth and water, sitting here, every one a lifeless clod, without glory! 100 Against this man I will don arms myself, though it’s on high that the issues of victory rest, with the immortal gods.”

This said, he put on his magnificent armor. And now, Menelaös, the end of your life would have been made manifest at Hektōr’s hands, since he was more powerful by far, 105 had not the Achaian princes sprung up and caught hold of you, while Atreus's son himself, wide-ruling Agamemnōn, clasping your right hand, addressed you in these words:

 "You're out of your mind, Menelaös! There's no need for this madness in you. Hold back, for all your distress, 110 don't let mere rivalry drive you to fight a better man: Hektör, Priam's son, from whom others, too, shrink back—even Achilles shuddered at meeting this man in battle that brings men glory, and he is better by far than you.
 Go and sit down now in the company of your comrades: 115 the Achaians will find an antagonist to fight with this man, and even though he be fearless, and a glutton for battle, he'll be glad enough, I tell you, to bend knee and rest, if he escapes deadly warfare and the horrors of combat."

With these words the hero won over his brother's mind, 120 since what he urged made good sense. Menelaös agreed, and his attendants, rejoicing, took the armor from his shoulders, while Nestör rose to his feet and addressed the Argives:
 "What a business! Great grief, for sure, is come upon Achaia.
 Loud would be the groans of old Pēleus, driver of horses, 125
 the Myrmidons' noble counselor and spokesman, who once, in his own house, took pleasure in questioning me, asking about all the Argives, their birth and lineage.
 Were he to hear that they all were now cringing before Hektör he'd keep raising his hands in prayer to the immortals 130 that his spirit might leave his limbs for the house of Hādēs!
 How I wish—Zeus, Father, Athēnē, Apollō!—I were as young as I was when, gathered near swift-flowing Keladōn, men of Pylos and spear-mad Arkadians fought together outside the walls of Pheia, around Iardanos's streams. 135 Ereuthaliōn stood as their champion, a godlike man, wearing upon his shoulders the armor of the lord Areithoös:
 noble Areithoös, tagged with the nickname "Clubber" by warriors—and by their fine-sashed women too—since his weapon was neither the bow nor the long spear 140 but a club of iron with which he smashed through the ranks.
 Him Lykourgos killed, by trickery, not by might,
 in a narrow defile, where his iron club could not save him from destruction: Lykourgos got his blow in first, spearing him through the midriff, slammed him down on his back, 145 stripped him of the armor brazen Arēs had given him.

 This gear he then wore himself in war's bruising turmoil;
 But when Lykourgos was coming to old age in his halls he gave it to his dear henchman Ereuthaliōn to wear, and clad in that armor he challenged all our best warriors; 150 but they all shuddered in terror, and none dared face him.
 My own unflinching spirit set me on in my boldness to do battle with him, though I was the youngest of them all.
 So I fought against him, and Athēnē gave me the glory.
 This was the tallest, strongest man that ever I killed— 155 a sprawling mass, spread-eagled this way and that. How I wish I were still that young, that my strength were still intact—then would bright-helmeted Hektōr quickly get his fight!
 But you lot, though you're the best the Achaians can muster, not even so are you minded, much less eager, to face Hektōr." 160

Thus the old man chastised them. Then nine in all stood up:
 by far the first to rise was the lord of men, Agamemnōn, next came the son of Tydeus, powerful Diomēdēs, followed by the two Aiaes, both clad in daring valor;
 after them Idomeneus with Idomeneus's henchman 165 Mērionēs, a match for Enyalios the killer, and close behind these Eurypylos, Euaimōn's splendid son.
 Next Thoas, Andraimōn's son, stood up, and noble Odysseus:
 all these were set on doing battle with noble Hektōr.
 Then Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman, spoke among them again: 170
 "Now shake the lots thoroughly, to find out who'll be chosen, for he'll surely bring good fortune to the well-greaved Achaians and to his own spirit, should he chance to escape from deadly warfare and the terrible grind of combat.'
 So he spoke: now each man marked his own lot, and they 175 tossed them into the helmet of Atreus's son Agamemnōn, while the troops all prayed, arms uplifted to the gods, and thus would someone say, staring up at the broad sky:
 "Zeus, Father, let the lot fall on Aias, on Tydeus's son, or on the king of gold-rich Mykēnai himself." 180

So they spoke,
 and Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman, shook the helmet, and out leapt the lot which they themselves had hoped for:

that of Aias. A herald carried it round the crowd from left to right, displayed it to all the Achaian leaders:
 none recognized the lot, each denied it was his. But when, 185 as the herald went through the crowd, he reached the man who'd thrown it, marked, into the helmet, illustrious Aias, then Aias stretched out his hand, and he put the lot in it.
 At a glance Aias knew his mark, and rejoiced at heart, then dropped the lot on the ground beside his foot, exclaiming: 190
 "My friends, this lot is mine, and I rejoice in my heart, since I'm convinced I shall conquer noble Hektōr.
 But come, while I'm putting on my armor for the battle, you should all pray to Lord Zeus, the son of Kronos, silently, by yourselves, so the Trojans learn nothing of it— 195 or out loud, since in any case there is no man we fear, and none who can put me to flight, his will against mine, using either force or skill, for I don't think I was born and raised, on Salamis, completely unskilled myself."

So he spoke, and they prayed to Lord Zeus, the son of Kronos, 200 and thus would someone say, looking up at the broad sky:
 "Zeus, Father, ruling from Ida, most glorious, most great, grant victory to Aias, let him win a great triumph—or, if you love Hektōr too, and care for his welfare, then furnish both men with equal strength and glory." 205

Such their words, while Aias was arming himself in gleaming bronze. But when all his gear was attached, all his body protected, he stepped forth like huge Arēs when he goes to war among men whom the son of Kronos has assembled to fight in the rage of heart-devouring strife: 210 just so sallied forth huge Aias, the bulwark of the Achaians, with a smile on his grim features, taking lengthy strides on his feet below, as he brandished his far-shadowing spear.
 The Argives indeed rejoiced as they watched him, but a fearful trembling seized on the limbs of every Trojan— 215 even Hektōr's own heart beat faster against his rib cage, yet he had no chance to withdraw, to lose himself in the mass of his people, since he it was had made the fighting challenge.
 So Aias drew near, hefting his tower-like shield of bronze and sevenfold bull's hide, that Tychios toiled at making: 220 Tychios, first among hide workers, whose home was in Hylē, who'd worked Aias's glinting shield with seven layered hides from well-fed bulls, and on top an eighth, of hammered bronze.

 Holding this out from his chest, Aias, Telamōn's son, marched up close to Hektōr, and addressed him threateningly: 225
 "Hektōr, you're going to learn, very clearly, man to man, what champions the Danaāns still have amongst them, even after Achillēs—the lionheart, the rank breaker!
 He now beside his curved, deep-voyaging vessels lies raging at Agamemnōn, the shepherd of the people; 230 yet we too are such men as can stand and face you—and we're many! So begin the battle, the warfare!"

To this great Hektōr, the bright-helmeted, made his answer:
 "Aias, scion of Zeus, son of Telamōn, lord of your people, don't try to scare me as though I were some weak child, 235 or a woman, knowing nothing of the business of warfare!
 Not so: I'm well acquainted with combat and killings,
 I know how to wield—see, to left, to right—my toughened oxhide shield: that's real shieldmanship in battle!
 I'm skilled at charging into the mêlée of galloping horses, 240
 I can, at close quarters, dance the measure of deadly Arēs; yet I don't mean to catch such a one as you off guard by a furtive sighting and cast: I'll throw openly, hope to hit you."
 That said, he poised and let fly his far-shadowing spear, and hit Aias's sturdy shield, with its seven oxhide layers, 245 on its outermost bronze, that formed the eighth layer on it.
 Through six of these folds the tough bronze tore its way, but was stopped by the seventh hide. Then in response Aias, scion of Zeus, let fly his far-shadowing spear, and struck Priam's son on his all-round well-balanced shield: 250 clean through the gleaming shield pierced the weighty spear, clean through the subtly worked corselet it forced its way, and tore a hole in his tunic, close to the rib cage—but Hektōr leaned off to one side, escaped the black death-spirit.
 Both grasped their long spears, pulled them out at the same moment, 255 and fell on each other like lions that devour raw meat or wild boars, creatures of no small strength. Priam's son thrust with his spear, struck the other's shield in the middle, but the bronze failed to break the surface, its point was bent, and Aias sprang at him, pierced his shield: the spear point 260 went clean through, brought his fierce charge to a halt, tore its way into his neck, and the black blood spurted up.

 Yet not even so did bright-helmeted Hektōr yield, but started back, and hefted in one strong hand a rock that lay on the plain, black, jagged, huge, and with it 265 struck Aias's fearsome sevenfold oxhide shield in the middle, right on the boss, and the bronze re-echoed.
 In reply now Aias heaved up an even bigger rock, whirled and flung it, with measureless force in his throw, crushed the shield in with this rock that was like a millstone, 270 and Hektōr's knees gave way, he lay stretched on his back beaten down under his shield. But Apollo quickly raised him.
 Now with their swords they'd have been lunging hand to hand, had not the heralds, those envoys of Zeus and mortals, come, one from the Trojans, one from the bronze-clad Achaians: 275 Talthybios and Idaios, both men of sound understanding.
 They held out their staffs between them, and the herald Idaios, a master of wise advice, made this proclamation:
 "Fight no longer, dear sons; abandon your battle!
 You both are dear to the heart of Zeus the cloud-gatherer, 280 both men of the spear: that indeed we have seen for ourselves!
 Besides, night is upon us, and it's good to yield to night."

 In response to his words then Aias, Telamōn's son, declared:
 "Idaios, you must tell Hektōr to give the answer to this,
 since it was he who issued the challenge to all our best men. 285 Let him go first: I am ready to do whatever he says."

 Then great bright-helmeted Hektōr spoke as follows:
 "Aias, since some god gave you both stature and power, and good sense too, and with spear you outclass all Achaians, let us now take a break from fighting, cease our combat— 290 for today at least: hereafter we'll battle again, until heaven decides between us, lets one or the other triumph:
 besides, night is upon us, and it's good to yield to night.
 This way you'll cheer all the Achaians beside their ships, and most your own kin and comrades, such as you have; 295 while I, throughout this great city of King Priam's, shall encourage the men of Troy and their long-robed women who are bound for the gods' assembly to pray on my behalf.
 Come then, let's give one another ennobling gifts, so that Achaians and Trojans may say amongst themselves: 300 “Truly these two fought each other in heart-devouring strife, yet still reached an agreement, parted in friendship.”

So speaking, he offered Aias a silver-studded sword, complete with matching scabbard and well-cut baldric, and Aias gave him a sash, that was dyed bright purple. 305 So they parted, one to the Achaian host, the other to the gathering of the Trojans, who rejoiced when they saw Hektōr alive and whole, and coming towards them—having got clear of Aias’s violence, his irresistible hands—and escorted him to the city, scarce believing him to be safe. 310
On the other side now the well-greaved Achaians led off Aias, agog at his victory, to noble Agamemnōn.

When these arrived at the huts of Atreus’s son, for them the lord of men, Agamemnon, made sacrifice of an ox, a male, five years old, to Kronos’s all-powerful son. 315
This they then flayed and got ready, butchered the carcass, cut up the meat with skill, threaded the bits on skewers, grilled them with care, then drew them all off. But when they were through with their work, and the meal had been got ready, they feasted, and no one’s heart lacked a fair share in the feasting, 320 and Aias received in his honor the whole length of the chine from Atreus’s heroic son, wide-ruling Agamemnōn.
But when they had satisfied their desire for food and drink, for them, first, the old man Nestōr began to weave a plan—Nestōr, whose counsel had earlier, too, seemed best. 325
He, with friendly intent now spoke before the assembly:
“Son of Atreus, and you other leaders of all the Achaians:
The dead of the long-haired Achaians now are many, whose dark blood impetuous Arēs has spilt around swift-flowing Skamandros: their souls have gone down to Hādēs. 330
So at dawn you must call a halt to the Achaians’ fighting, and we’ll gather up the corpses, wheel them back here on oxcars and mulecars. After that we’ll cremate them a little way off from the ships, so each man may carry home their bones to their sons—when we’re back in our native land. 335 And round the pyre let us heap up, there in the plain, one communal burial mound, and quickly build beside it high walls, a protection for our vessels and ourselves, and in the walls let us fashion close-fitted gateways, wide enough to let chariots be driven through them, 340

 and outside, close to these, we should dig a deep ditch running all round that hold off troops and horses if ever we're under assault by these overweening Trojans."

So he spoke, and all the princes gave him their assent.
 The Trojans too held a meeting, up on Ilion's citadel, 345 in alarm and disorder, alongside the gates of Priam, and amongst them wise Antēnōr was the first to speak:
 "Listen to me, you Trojans, Dardanians, and allies,
 while I say what the heart in my breast is bidding me tell you.
 Come, then: Argive Helen, along with her possessions— 350 let's give her, to take away, back to the sons of Atreus.
 Now we're fighting with oaths forsworn, so I have no hope of anything going our way unless we take this course."

This said, he sat down, and there then stood up amongst them the noble Aléxandros, fair-haired Helen's husband, 355 who in reply now addressed him with winged words:
 "Antēnōr, the things you are saying no longer please me:
 you can think up a different speech, one better than this.
 If your public message is meant in all seriousness, then the gods themselves must surely have addled your wits. 360
 So I will speak out before the Trojans, breakers of horses, and declare to your face: I refuse. My wife I'll not give back.
 But all the possessions I brought from Argos to our home—all—I'm prepared to return, and add to them from my store."

This said, he sat down, and there then stood up amongst them 365
 Priam, of Dardanos's lineage, a match for the gods in counsel.
 He with friendly intent now spoke before the assembly:
 "Listen to me, you Trojans, Dardanians, and allies,
 while I say what the heart in my breast is bidding me tell you.
 For now, take your dinner throughout the city, as usual, 370 and keep a good lookout, and each of you stay alert; but at daybreak let Idaios make his way to the hollow ships to inform Atreus's sons, Agamemnōn and Menelaös, of the words of Aléxandros, over whom this quarrel began;
 and let him add this wise proposal: that they should agree 375
 to a truce from dolorous warfare, until we have burned

our dead: after that we'll fight again, until heaven decides between us, gives victory to one side or the other."

So he spoke: they listened attentively, and obeyed him.
Their dinner they ate at their posts, throughout the army, 380 and at daybreak Idaios made his way to the hollow ships.

There he found, in assembly, the Danaäns, henchmen of Arēs, at the stern end of Agamemnōn's vessel. Standing there amongst them, the herald, strong of voice, now spoke as follows:
"Son of Atreus, and you other leaders of all the Achaïans, 385
I am ordered by Priam and the rest of our eminent Trojans to repeat to you—in the hope you may find them agreeable—the words of Aléxandros, over whom this quarrel began.
The goods that Aléxandros—how I wish he had perished first!— brought back to Troy in his hollow ships, all these 390 he's willing to give back, and increase from his own store;
but as for the wedded wife of illustrious Menelaös, her he will not return, though indeed the Trojans urge it.
This too they bade me propose: that you should agree to a truce from dolorous warfare, until we have burned 395
our dead: after that we'll fight again, until heaven
decides between us, gives victory to one side or the other."

So he spoke, and they all became hushed in silence, until at last Diomēdēs, good at the war cry, addressed them:
"Let no man now accept these goods from Aléxandros, 400 nor Helen either: it's obvious, even to the witless, that already destruction's noose is tightening round the Trojans."

So he spoke: the Achaïans' sons all roared their approval, in delight at the words of Diomēdēs the horse breaker.
Then the lord Agamemnōn made this reply to Idaios: 405
"Idaios, you hear for yourself the Achaïans' utterance, their answer to you: this gives me pleasure as well.
As for the dead, I don't object to your burning them:
You can't dilly-dally with corpses: as soon as they're dead, you have to quickly give them the comfort of fire. These oaths 410 let Zeus now witness, Hērē's loud-thundering husband."

So saying, he raised his scepter for all the gods to see, and Idaios made his way back to sacred Ilion. There all were met in assembly, Trojans, Dardanians, gathered together, all waiting upon the return of Idaios. At last he arrived, and delivered his message, standing amongst them. Then they quickly made ready for both tasks, fetching the corpses, and gathering firewood, while the Argives likewise, setting off from their well-benched ships,

hastened, some for firewood, others to bring in the dead. 420

The sun's first rays were striking the fields as it rose from the streams of Ocean—deep-flowing, silent, peaceful—climbing the sky, as the two sides met one another.

A hard task it was to identify each individual, but they washed off the clotted gore with water, shedding warm tears, and hoisted them onto the wagons. 425

Great Priam forbade all keening, so it was in silence that they loaded the pyre with corpses, grieving at heart, and, when they'd burned them, went back to sacred Ilion.

Likewise on the other side the well-greaved Achaians loaded the pyre with corpses, grieving at heart, and, when they'd burned them, went back to the hollow ships. 430

When it was not yet dawn, but a grey half-darkness, then at the pyre there gathered a chosen troop of Achaians, and round it they now began raising in the plain one communal burial mound, and beside it built high walls, a protection for their vessels and themselves, in which they then constructed close-fitting gateways,
wide enough to let chariots be driven through them,
while outside, close to these, they dug a deep ditch, both wide and ample, bristling with sharpened stakes. 440

Thus they labored on, did the long-haired Achaians; and the gods, sitting there by Zeus, the lord of lightning, were amazed at the bronze-clad Achaians' mighty work.
First to speak amongst them was Poseidōn the Earth-Shaker: 445
"Zeus, Father, is any mortal left on this boundless earth who'll still tell the immortals his thinking, his intentions?
Don't you see that the long-haired Achaians are at it again—they've built a wall to defend their ships, and round it have dug a ditch, yet without fitting sacrifice to us gods!
Its fame will reach out as far as the dawn light spreads, 450 and men will forget the wall that Phoibos Apollo and I built, with enormous labor, for the hero Laomedōn.”²

Greatly troubled, Zeus the cloud-gatherer responded: “Come, wide-ruling Earth-Shaker, what a thing to have said! 455
Some other one of the gods might be scared by this idea—one far feebler than you in both strength and forcefulness.
But your fame will surely reach as far the dawn light spreads!
Think now: once they’re gone, these long-haired Achaians, back with their ships to their own dear native land, 460 you can break up their wall and shred it all into the sea, and once more cover the whole long shoreline with sand:
so let the Achaians’ great wall be leveled, destroyed.”
Such was the way they talked, the one to the other.

As the sun went down, the Achaians’ work was completed, 465 and they slew oxen by the huts, and had their dinner, and ships arrived from Lēmnos, ferrying wine,
a flotilla dispatched by Jason’s son Eunēos, whom Hypsipylē bore to Jason, shepherd of his people; and for Atreus’s sons, Agamemnōn and Menelaös, 470 Jason’s son sent some special wine, a thousand measures.
From this convoy the long-haired Achaians bought their wine, some in exchange for bronze, others for gleaming iron, others again for hides, or the cattle themselves, and some in exchange for war captives. They set up a lavish feast, 475 and then, all night through, the long-haired Achaians feasted, as did the Trojans and their allies in the city; and all night through Zeus the counselor planned them harm, thundering fearfully, so that pale terror seized them.
They spilt on the ground the wine from their cups: no one dared 480 to drink more till they’d poured a libation to the almighty son of Kronos. Then they lay down and took the gift of sleep.

2. Perhaps in punishment for some divine indiscretion (the sources are unclear), Poseidōn and Apollo were obliged to build the walls of Troy for Priam’s father, Laomedōn, king of Troy, and take care of his flocks and herds. When Laomedōn refused to pay them for their work, Poseidōn dispatched a sea monster against the Trojans (20.145–48) and Apollo afflicted the city with plague. Further references at 12.3–33 and 21.441–57.

Book 8

As saffron-robed Dawn was spreading over the whole earth, Zeus, who delights in the thunderbolt, assembled the gods up on the highest peak of many-ridged Olympos.
He addressed the meeting himself, and the gods all listened.
“Hear me out, all you gods, and all you goddesses, 5 while I tell you what the heart in my breast commands me.
And let none of you deities—whether male or female—make an attempt to thwart my scheme, but all alike assent to it, so I may speedily bring these things to pass!
Any I note as minded to leave the gods, and go off 10 to bring help to either the Danaäns or the Trojans, will return to Olympos smitten and in bad shape—or I’ll seize him and cast him down into gloomy Tartaros, far off, where lies the deepest chasm below the earth, where the gates are fashioned of iron and the threshold of bronze, 15 as far beneath Hādēs as the sky is above the earth:
then you’ll see by how much I’m the strongest of all gods!
Come on, you gods, just try it, that you all may know the truth—take a cable of gold, suspend it from the heavens, and all of you lay hold of it, both gods and goddesses: 20 you still couldn’t drag out of heaven down to earth Zeus, supreme counselor, however great your effort!
But I, were I minded to pull with a will, could haul it up along with earth itself, and all the sea besides; as for the cable, thereafter I’d loop it around a peak of 25
Olympos, and leave the whole mass to hang in space!
It’s by that much I outmatch the gods, outmatch mankind.”

So he spoke, and they all became very quiet and silent, shocked by his words, so powerfully had he addressed them.
But at last the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē, took him up: 30 “Son of Kronos, our father, supreme among potentates, we too indeed know well that your strength is ungovernable, yet even so we feel pity for the Danaän spearmen who will now fulfill a wretched fate, and perish.

Yet though we'll keep out of the battle, as you order, 35 we'll offer advice to the Argives, such as may help them, so that they don't all perish through your fit of anger."
 Zeus the cloud-gatherer smiled at her, and replied:
 "Cheer up, Tritogéneia, dear child: the things I just said were not meant seriously, and to you I'm kindly disposed." 40

That said, to his chariot he harnessed his bronze-shod team, racers both, with their flowing golden manes, arrayed himself likewise in gold, took hold of the whip—well-wrought, of gold—stepped up to the driver's place, and lashed his steeds into action: they eagerly flew off 45 midway between the earth and the starry heavens.

To spring-rich Ida he came, the mother of wild beasts, and Gargaros, site of his precinct and smoking altar.
 There the Father of gods and men reined in his horses, unharnessed them from the chariot, hid them in thick mist, 50
 and sat himself down on the heights, exulting in his splendor, gazing out at the Trojans' city, the ships of the Achaians.

Now the long-haired Achaians hurriedly took their meal, separately in their huts: that done, they donned their armor.
 The Trojans likewise, on their side, in the city, armed themselves; 55 though fewer, they too were hot to join the crush of battle through the harsh need of protecting their wives and children.
 Then all the gates were flung open, the troops poured through them, on foot and mounted both, and a mighty clamor went up.

When they had come to one place, and were met together, 60 buckler slammed against buckler, spears thrust, the bronze-clad rage of warriors pressed the attack, their bossed shields ground hard each upon the other, and a mighty clamor went up.
 There were groans and triumphant shouts, from warriors killing or being killed, and the earth ran wet with their blood. 65

While it was morning still, and the sacred light brightening, both sides' shots struck home, and men dropped, hit; but when the sun reached, and bestrode, the midpoint of the sky, then Zeus, the father, held up his golden scale and on it set two dooms of grief-laden death, 70 for horse-breaker Trojans and bronze-corseleted Achaians.
 By the middle he grasped and raised it: the Achaians' fated day sank, and their fates all settled on the provident earth, while those of the Trojans were raised to the wide sky.

 Zeus himself thundered loudly from Ida, sent a fiery flash down among the Achaian troops; when they saw it they were struck with amazement. Pale fear seized them all.

75

Then neither Idomeneus dared stand fast, nor Agamemnōn, nor the two Aiases, servants of Arēs both; Gerēnian Nestōr alone remained, the Achaians' protector, and he not willingly; his horse was done for, hit by an arrow from noble Aléxandros, husband of fair-haired Helen, on the top of its head, where the first hairs of the mane spring from the skull, its most vulnerable point.

80

It reared up in agony as the shaft struck into its brain, and, reeling from the wound, stampeded the yoke horses.

85

Then, while the old man jumped down and with his sword was cutting the horse's traces, through the rout there came Hektōr's swift horses, bringing a daring charioteer—Hektōr himself. And now the old man would have perished had not at once Diomēdēs, good at the war cry, noticed, and with a fearsome shout now urged Odysseus on:

90

"Son of Laertēs! Scion of Zeus! Resourceful Odysseus!
 Where are you off to, back turned, like some coward, with the rest?
 Hey, someone may plant a spear in your back as you run!
 Stand firm then, let's keep this wild fellow away from the old man!"

95

So he spoke, but noble Odysseus, the much-enduring, paid him no heed, hurried on to the Achaians' hollow ships;
 and Tydeus's son, though alone, moved up to the front line, stood there before the horses of the old man, son of Nēleus, and addressed him, speaking with winged words: "Good old sir, these young fighters, clearly, are wearing you down:
 your strength is not what it was, a harsh old age attends you, your charioteer's a weakling, your horses are sluggish.
 Come now, get into my chariot, see for yourself the breed of these horses of Trōs—how well they're trained to course on the plain here, in pursuit or flight—the ones I took from Aineias, harbingers of rout!
 Your team here our squires can attend to, while these we'll drive straight at the horse-breaker Trojans, so even Hektōr may know well whether my spear too is raging in my grasp."

100

105

110

Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman, did not ignore his words.
 While Nestōr's mares were looked after by the two squires, powerful Sthenelos and the courtly Eurymedōn, both warriors climbed aboard Diomēdēs' chariot, 115 and Nestōr took in his hands the shining reins, whipped the horses, and quickly they came abreast of Hektōr, who charged straight at them. Tydeus's son let fly his spear, and missed him, but hit his charioteer, Ēniopeus, the son of high-spirited Thēbaios, 120 in his chest beside the nipple, as he gathered the reins, and he fell from the chariot, and the galloping horses swerved aside, and there his life and strength were undone.
 Bitter grief for his charioteer now spread over Hektōr's heart, yet he left him—though sad for his comrade—to lie there, 125 and looked for another bold driver; not very long did his pair lack a master, for in short order he found Iphitos's son, the dashing Archeptolemos, made him mount up there behind the horses, put the reins into his hands.

Destruction would have followed, actions irreparable, 130 and they'd have been penned up in Ilion like sheep, had the Father of gods and men not quickly taken note, thundered terribly, and let fly a white-hot bolt, hurling it earthwards in front of Diomēdēs' horses, so that a terrible flame of burning sulphur shot up, 135 and the two horses cowered in terror under the chariot.
 Then the shining reins slipped out of Nestōr's hands, and he, terrified at heart, cried out to Diomēdēs:
 'Son of Tydeus, turn back your whole-hoofed horses, flee!
 Can't you see that the might of Zeus is not behind you? 140
 For now it's him, it's Hektōr, to whom Zeus, son of Kronos, gives glory today; hereafter, if he so pleases, he'll grant it to us. But there's no man can thwart his purpose, however valiant: Zeus is more powerful by far."

Diomēdēs, good at the war cry, answered him thus: 145
 "In all this, indeed, old sir, you have spoken duly;
 but there's this bitter concern besets my heart and spirit, that one day Hektōr will say, speaking among the Trojans, 'Tydeus's son fled before me, all the way to the ships.'
 So he'll boast: when he does, let the earth gape wide for me." 150

Then Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman, answered him thus:
 “Ah me, son of doughty Tydeus, what a thing to have said!
 Even were Hektōr to call you coward and weakling, neither Trojans nor Dardanians would be persuaded, nor all those high-spirited Trojan warriors’ wives 155 whose manly bedfellows you’ve cast down into the dust.”

This said, he wheeled round the whole-hoofed team for flight back through the rout, while the Trojans and Hektōr raised a fabulous clamor, showered them with baleful missiles, and great bright-helmeted Hektōr shouted loudly at him: 160 “Son of Tydeus, the swift-horsed Danaäns used to honor you above all, with meat, full cups, a privileged seat;
 but now they’ll despise you—it seems you’re a woman at heart!
 On your way, craven dolly! Not through any yielding of mine will you set foot on our ramparts, or in your vessels carry 165 our women off: long before that I’ll have settled your destiny.”

So he spoke, and Tydeus’s son was divided in his mind:
 should he wheel round his horses, fight Hektōr head-on?
 Thrice he debated, uncertain, in his mind and spirit; and thrice from Ida’s mountains Zeus the counselor thundered, 170 sending the Trojans a sign: victory in the conflict was changing sides. Hektōr now shouted to the Trojans: “Trojans! Lycians! Dardanian hand-to-hand fighters!
 Be men, my friends! Remember your fighting valor!
 Kronos’s son, I see, has now chosen me in earnest 175 for triumph and great glory—but for the Danaäns, woe!
 Fools they were, the ones who contrived these ramparts, flimsy, useless, that won’t stop my raging charge—our horses will jump without effort over the ditch they dug!
 But when I get in there, right among their hollow ships, 180 then you be mindful to have destructive fire at hand, so I can both burn their ships and kill the Argives themselves, panic-stricken with all the smoke, there by the ships.”

That said, he called out to his horses, addressed them thus:
 “Xanthos, and you, Podargos, Aithōn, and noble Lampos— 185 now recompense me for all the generous upkeep that Andromachē, daughter of great-hearted Êētiōn, lavished on you first of any—the honey-sweet wheat, the wine she mixed you to drink, when your fancy called for it—even prior to me, who indeed am her strong young husband. 190 Come on then, look sharp, move smartly, so we can seize Nestōr's shield, its fame now spread across the heavens—it's said to be all of gold, both it and its hand grips—and strip from the shoulders of Diomēdēs the horse breaker the intricate corselet that Hēphaistos labored to make him. 195

 If we could get these two things, I'd hope to force the Achaians aboard their swift ships this very night."

So he spoke,
 boasting: the lady Hērē waxed indignant at him, started up on her throne, making high Olympos tremble, and directly addressed the mighty god Poseidōn: 200

"Shame on you, wide-ruling Earth-Shaker! Even in your private heart there's no grief for the Danaāns dying, though for you to Aigai and Helikē they bring pleasing gifts in abundance—and once, indeed, you were all for their victory!
 For if we chose, all those of us who side with the Danaāns, 205 to force back the Trojans, curb the will of wide-thundering Zeus, he'd soon be sitting alone there, in a pet, on Ida."

Deeply troubled, the lordly Earth-Shaker answered her:
 "Hērē, rash chatterer, what a thing it is you've said!
 I for one wouldn't want all the rest of us fighting against 210
 Zeus, son of Kronos, since he's the mightier by far."

This was how they were speaking, one to the other. By now all the space, away from the ships, between wall and ditch was full of horses and shield men, penned in together, and he who'd penned them all was that equal of swift Arēs, 215 Hektōr, Priam's son, when Zeus gave him the glory.
 And now he'd have burned the trim ships with blazing fire had the lady Hērē not put it in Agamemnōn's mind to quickly bestir himself, urge the Achaians into action.
 So he set out along the line of their huts and vessels, 220 clutching his great purple cloak in one solid fist, and stopped by Odysseus's ship, black and deep-hulled, that lay halfway along, so a shout could reach either end, be heard at the huts both of Aias, Telamōn's son, and those of Achilles: the two who had drawn up their trim ships 225

furthest away, relying on their prowess, their hands' strength.
 Now in a carrying voice he cried out to the Danaäns:
 "Shame on you, Argives, base cowards, good only to look at!
 What's become of our boasts, when we swore we were the best—those empty public boasts you would utter on Lēmnos, 230 as you wolfed down plentiful meat of straight-horned cattle, and swilled the bowls that were brimming over with wine, that each man would take on in battle a hundred—no, two hundred!— Trojans; but now we're not even a fit match for one, Hektōr, who'll all too soon torch our ships with blazing fire! 235 Zeus, Father, was there ever a powerful king before this that you so struck with delusion, so robbed of his great glory?
 Yet I never, I tell you, ignored any splendid altar of yours on my ill-fated journey here in my many-benched vessel, but stopped at each to burn the fat and thighbones of oxen, 240 impatient though I was to lay waste strong-walled Troy.
 Still, Zeus, this plea at least fulfill on my behalf:
 allow us ourselves to escape, get clean away—don't let the Achaians be thus vanquished by the Trojans."

So he spoke: the Father felt pity for him as he wept, 245 and nodded assent, that his people should indeed go safe, not perish.
 Then he at once sent an eagle, best omen of all winged creatures, a fawn, born of a swift hind, clutched in its talons.
 It dropped the fawn close beside Zeus's splendid altar, where the Achaians sacrificed to him as sender of all such signs; 250 and so, when they saw that the bird had come from Zeus, they attacked the Trojans more fiercely, had ardor for battle.

Then not one of the Danaäns, many though they were, could claim to have urged his swift steeds ahead of Tydeus's son across the ditch and into the hand-to-hand combat: he was 255 the first by far to bring down a leading Trojan warrior, Phradmōn's son Agelaös, who was turning his horses to flee;
 but as he wheeled Diomēdēs rammed a spear in his back squarely between his shoulders, drove it through to his chest.
 He fell from the chariot: his armor rattled upon him. 260

Close behind came Atreus's sons, Agamemnōn and Menelaös, and after them the two Aiases, both clad in daring valor, followed by Idomeneus, along with Idomeneus's henchman

Mēriōnēs, a match for Enyalios, killer of men, and close behind these Eurypylos, Euaimōn's splendid son; 265 and Teukros came as the ninth, stringing his back-bent bow, hidden behind the shield of Aias, Telamōn's son.

When Aias pulled back his shield, then this hero would take a quick look round, shoot off an arrow at someone there in the fray; the man would fall, yield up his life, 270 and back the archer would dart, like a child to its mother, to Aias, who'd shelter him behind his gleaming shield.

So, who was the first Trojan that blameless Teukros slew?
 Orsilochos first, then Ormenos, and in third place Ophelēstēs, Then Daitōr, Chromios, and godlike Lykophontēs, 275 Polyaimōn's son Amopaōn, and finally Melanippos—all these in turn he stretched on the nurturing earth.

The lord of men, Agamemnōn, rejoiced at the sight of him with his powerful bow sending death into the Trojans' ranks, and he came and stood close by, and spoke these words to him: 280

"Teukros, dear heart, son of Telamōn, your people's lord, keep shooting like this! You may bring a ray of hope to the Danaāns and to your father Telamōn, who reared you as a child and cared for you in his home, his bastard though you were:
 bring him, however distant, into your glory's sphere! 285

This too I'll declare to you, and indeed it will come to pass:
 If it's granted to me by Zeus of the aegis and Athēnē to lay waste Ilion's well-built citadel, then in your hands first, after mine, I'll place the prize of honor—either a tripod, or else two horses with their chariot, 290 or a woman who's ready to go up and share your bed."

Then blameless Teukros answered him in these words:
 "Most glorious son of Atreus, why urge me on when I myself am eager already? While there's still strength in me I'll not stop; ever since we forced them back towards Ilion, 295 from that time on I've been watching my chance with my bow to bring down men. Eight long-barbed shafts I've shot off, and all are fixed in the flesh of lusty spry young fighters:
 it's only this mad dog I'm unable to hit." That said, he let fly one more shaft from his bowstring, aiming straight 300 at Hektōr, his will dead-set on bringing him down—but missed again: instead his arrow struck blameless Gorgythiōn,

Priam's fine son, in the chest: the mother who bore him had come as a bride from Aisymē, the beautiful Kastianeira, a woman most like to the goddesses in stature. 305

His head drooped to one side: as a garden poppy sinks under the load of its seed and the springtime showers, so bowed his head sideways, weighted down by its helmet.

Teukros now let fly one more shaft from his bowstring, straight at Hektōr, his will dead-set on bringing him down— 310 but missed yet again, for Apollo diverted his arrow, and struck Archeptolemos, Hektōr's dashing charioteer, as he plunged into the fray—in the chest, beside the nipple.

He fell from the chariot: his swift horses shied away in terror, and there his spirit and strength were undone. 315

Bitter grief for his charioteer now spread through Hektōr's heart; nevertheless he left him—though sad for his comrade—to lie there, and ordered Kebrionēs, his brother, then close nearby, to take over the horses' reins: he heard, and did not fail him.

Hektōr at once leapt down from his gleaming chariot, 320 with a terrible shout, scooped up a rock in one hand, and charged straight at Teukros, dead-set on bringing him down.

Teukros had drawn from his quiver another bitter arrow, and laid it against the bowstring, but bright-helmeted Hektōr—as Teukros drew the string back to his shoulder, where 325

the collarbone's fixed between neck and chest, a fatal spot—hit him right there, as he aimed, with his jagged rock, snapping the bowstring; his hand went numb at the wrist, he sank on his knees, and stayed thus. The bow dropped from his hand.

But Aias did not fail to notice his brother's collapse: 330

he ran up, and stood over him, covering him with his shield, till there reached down beneath it two of his trusty henchmen, Echios's son Mēkisteus, and the noble Alastōr, who bore Teukros off, groaning heavily, to the hollow ships.

Then once more the Olympian whipped up fury in the Trojans: 335 they thrust the Achaians straight back towards the deep ditch, and Hektōr pressed on with the foremost, exultant in his strength.

As when a hound on the heels of a wild boar or lion will snap at it from behind, while in swift pursuit, pouncing on flank or quarter—but watches in case it turns— 340 so Hektōr harried the long-haired Achaians, again and again killing the hindmost, and they took to flight in terror.

 But when they'd got past the palisade and the ditch in their flight, with many laid low by Trojan hands, then they halted and made a stand beside their vessels, 345 calling to one another, each man with lifted hands shouting his prayers to all the gods. But Hektōr kept wheeling his fine-maned horses this way and that, his eyes like those of the Gorgon, or murderous Arēs.

Seeing and pitying them, the goddess, white-armed Hērē, 350 at once addressed Athēnē with winged words: "Look now, daughter of Zeus of the aegis, are we two no longer to care for these dying Danaāns, even at their last moment?
 They're about to fulfill their wretched destiny, finished by the onslaught of one man, his mad rage unstoppable— 355 Priam's son Hektōr! Already he's done them so much harm—"

In reply to her the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē, said:
 "How I wish this man might lose both strength and life, slain by the Argives here, on his own native soil!
 It's my father who rages madly in his unwholesome mind, 360 stubborn, always malicious, thwarter of my desires!
 He has no recollection whatever of the many times
 I rescued his son¹ when he buckled under Eurystheus's tasks, and would cry to high heaven, and then from high heaven Zeus would send me down to help him. Had I only been 365 sharp-witted enough to figure this business out when he was dispatched to the realm of Hādēs' gatekeeper, to bring back from Erebos the hound of loathsome Hādēs, he'd never have got past those sheer falls of Stygian water!
 But now Zeus hates me, and has furthered the plans of Thetis, 370 who kissed his knees and, taking his chin in her hand, begged him to honor Achilles, the sacker of cities. And yet some day he'll once more call me his grey-eyed darling!
 But now you get ready for us our whole-hoofed horses, while I go into the palace of Zeus of the aegis, 375

1. The son is Hēraklēs, and the reference is to the fetching up from Hādēs of the three-headed dog Kerberos, one of the twelve Labors imposed on him (probably, as Apollodorus records, in expiation for killing his children), and carried out under the direction of his cousin Eurystheus. The river Styx, with its famous falls, was thought to guard one of the Peloponnesian entrances to Hādēs.

and arm myself in my war gear. I want to find out whether this son of Priam, bright-helmeted Hektōr, will be glad when we two show up along the battle lines, or whether a Trojan, too, will glut the dogs and birds on his fat and flesh, after falling by the Achaians' ships." 380

So she spoke: the goddess, white-armed Hērē, did not ignore her, but went off to harness the gold-frontleted horses—she, Hērē, high goddess, daughter of mighty Kronos!— while Athēnē, the daughter of Zeus the aegis-bearer, let fall on her father's floor the soft embroidered robe 385
that she herself had made, worked with her own hands,
and, donning the tunic of Zeus the cloud-gatherer,
armed herself in all grim warfare's accoutrements.

Into the fiery chariot she then stepped, grasping her spear—weighty, huge, thick—with which she quells the ranks of men, 390 those heroes who've angered this child of a mighty sire.

Now Hērē gave a quick flick of her whip to the horses;
of themselves the sky's gates groaned open, kept by the Seasons, to whom are entrusted the great firmament and Olympos, whether to lift off the thick clouds, or impose them. 395
Straight through those gates they drove their goad-spurred horses.

Zeus the Father, seeing them from Ida, exploded in wrath, and sent golden-winged Iris out to them with a message:
"Up, go now, swift Iris! Turn them back, don't let them come face to face with me here! We'd do no good by fighting. 400
For this I say straight out, and it will come to pass:
I'll cripple their swift horses in their harness, I'll hurl themselves from the chariot, which I'll smash to pieces:
not in ten circling years will they get over the wounds that my thunderbolts will inflict upon them! That way 405 Miss Grey-Eyes will learn what it means to fight her father!
With Hērē, though, I'm not so displeased or angry:
she's always been used to frustrating whatever I decree."

So he spoke, and gale-footed Iris took off with his message, setting out from the mountains of Ida to high Olympos. 410 Right outside the gates of Olympos the many-clefted she met the pair, stopped them, and passed on the word from Zeus:
"Where's the hurry, you two? What's put you in such a rage?
Kronos's son won't allow you to give aid to the Argives:

this was his threat, and he'll certainly carry it out— 415 he'll cripple your swift horses in their harness, he'll hurl yourselves from the chariot, which he'll smash to pieces; not in ten circling years will you get over the wounds that his thunderbolts will inflict upon you! That way, Miss Grey-Eyes, you'll learn what it means to fight your father! 420
 With Hērē, though, he's not so displeased or angry:
 she's always been used to frustrating whatever he decrees.
 But you're a real horror, you shameless bitch, if you truly dare to lift up your prodigious spear against Zeus."

So saying, swift-footed Iris went on her way, 425 and Hērē addressed Athēnē in the following words:
 "Look, child of Zeus of the aegis, I no longer endorse this scheme for us to fight Zeus on behalf of mortals—as for them, let one die, and another survive, by chance, while he can judge entirely as he's a mind to 430 between Trojan and Danaän. That is what's fitting."

She spoke,

and proceeded to wheel her whole-hoofed horses around.
 So the Hours unharnessed their fine-maned horses for them, and tethered them at their ambrosial mangers, and propped the chariot over against the shining courtyard wall, 435 while they themselves sat down on golden chairs among the other gods, both vexed at heart.

Zeus, the Father,

from Ida now drove his strong-wheeled chariot and horses quickly back to Olympus and entered the gods' assembly, and the famed Earth-Shaker unyoked his horses for him, 440 set the chariot on its stand, and spread a cloth over it, while far-seeing Zeus himself settled down on his golden throne, and under his feet the whole of great Olympus trembled.
 Only Athēnē and Hērē took their seats apart from Zeus, and neither greeted nor questioned him. Nevertheless 445 he understood in his heart, and addressed them, saying:
 "Why are you vexed in this fashion, Athēnē and Hērē?
 Surely you two aren't tired of destroying Trojans in battle that brings men honor, so great is your grim hatred of them?
 But such is my might, so irresistible my hands, 450

there's no way that all the gods on Olympos could shift me—and as for you two, trembling seized your illustrious limbs before you ever glimpsed warfare, and warfare's hurtful deeds.
 This I'll tell you straight out, and it would have happened:
 not on your chariot, once my thunderbolts had struck you, 455 would you have come back to Olympos, the immortals' abode."

So he spoke, but Athēnē and Hērē went on muttering against him, sitting side by side, planning trouble for the Trojans.
 Athēnē kept quiet now, expressed nothing openly, though angry with Zeus her father, gripped by wild resentment; 460 but Hērē's breast could not contain her fury. She exclaimed:
 "Most dread son of Kronos, what's this you're telling us?
 As we too know well, your strength is far from trifling—nevertheless we feel pity for the Danaän spearmen, who'll fulfill their wretched destiny, and so perish. 465 Yes, we'll abstain from battle, if you so command us; but advice we'll still offer the Argives, that will help them, and ensure that not all of them perish through your anger."

In answer to her cloud-gatherer Zeus declared:
 "At dawn tomorrow the yet-mightier son of Kronos— 470 you can watch if you want to, my ox-eyed lady Hērē—will be destroying a great mass of Argive spearmen: for mighty Hektōr will not abstain from battle until Pēleus's swift-footed is stirred to action by the ships on that day when they'll be fighting, in the direst straits, 475 at the ships' sterns, over the body of Patroklos.
 For thus it's ordained. As for you, I do not care one jot for your anger, not even should you go to the nethermost limits of earth and sea, where Iapetos and Kronos sit, without joy from Hyperīōn Helios's rays, 480 or from any breeze, but deep Tartaros surrounds them!
 Should you even wander that far, I still care nothing for your wrath, since nothing more shameless than you exists."

So he spoke, but white-armed Hērē made no answer, and down into Ocean dipped the sun's bright light, 485 drawing night's blackness across the grain-giving earth:
 against the Trojans' will daylight ebbed, but to the Achaians most welcome, much prayed for, was dark night's arrival.

Now illustrious Hektôr called an assembly of the Trojans, led them away from the ships to an open space beside 490
 the eddying river, where the ground was clear of corpses.
 Stepping down from their chariots they heard out the speech that Hektôr, beloved of Zeus, now made, in his hand a spear eleven cubits in length: before him its bronze point gleamed bright; round the shaft there ran a golden ferrule. 495 Leaning on this, he spoke his mind to the Trojans:
 "Listen to me, you Trojans, Dardanians, and allies:
 I thought, just now, we'd destroy the Achaians with their ships, and then would make our way back to windy Ilion;
 but too soon darkness fell, and that, above all, preserved 500
 the Argives and their vessels out there by the breaking waves.
 So for now we must needs yield to the blackness of night, and make ready our supper. Unyoke your fine-maned horses from their chariots, and set out fodder before them, and bring from the city both oxen and fattened sheep, 505 quickly, provide yourselves with honey-hearted wine and bread from your homes, and gather plentiful wood, so that all night long until early-stirring dawn we can burn many fires, have their flames light up the sky, in case under cover of night the long-haired Achaians 510 hurry to make their escape on the broad back of the sea.
 Don't let them board ship at ease, without a struggle:
 rather make sure that many take home a wound to nurse there, dealt by an arrow or sharpened spear while boarding their vessels, so that others may think twice 515 before launching war's miseries against the Trojans!
 And let heralds, men dear to Zeus, now proclaim through the city that stripling youths and grey-haired elders all must take station around the city on the god-built ramparts; and as for the women—our wives, each in her own house, 520 should kindle a great fire; and let a constant watch be set lest a raiding force enter the city when our troops are away.
 Be it done, great-hearted Trojans, as I now proclaim, and let this good counsel of mine suffice for the present:
 at daybreak I shall have more for you Trojan horse breakers! 525
 In high hope I pray now to Zeus and the other gods to drive off from here these dogs, brought in by the death-spirits

[whom the death-spirits brought here aboard their pitch-black vessels!].²

For this night we shall keep good watch over ourselves.
Tomorrow at dawn, then, fully armed and ready, 530
let's go to the hollow ships, start some sharp engagements:
I'll find out if Tydeus's son, this mighty Diomēdēs, will drive me back from the ships to the wall, or whether I'll cut him down with the bronze, carry off his bloodied spoils.
Tomorrow he'll measure his prowess: will he stand firm 535 against my spear's onset? Among the foremost, I think, he'll lie pierced through, and many a comrade round him, as the sun comes up tomorrow. For myself I wish I might be immortal and ageless all my days, and honored as highly as are Athēnē and Apollo, 540 as surely as now this day will bring trouble to the Argives."

Such was Hektōr's speech, and the Trojans cheered it loudly.
They unharnessed their sweating horses from under the yoke, and each man tethered his own with straps by his chariot;
and they brought from the city both oxen and fattened sheep 545 quickly, provided themselves with honey-sweet wine and bread from their homes, and gathered plentiful wood, [and offered full rich sacrifices to the immortals, so that] the wind bore the smell of them skyward, up from the plain, [savory, sweet: but the blessed gods did not share it, 550 nor did they wish to: hateful to them were sacred Ilion, and Priam, he of the good ash spear, and Priam's people.]³

So these, planning great endeavors, all night through stayed there on the battle lines, with many a fire ablaze.
Just as in the heavens about a bright moon the stars 555 shine clear when the high air is windless, and sharply visible is each mountain peak, each tall headland and ravine,

2. Line 528 has been rightly suspected as an interpolation.

3. Apart from 549, none of these lines appear here in our medieval MSS; they are quoted in the pseudo-Platonic dialogue Alcibiades II (149D) and are, except for 550, a cento of verses put together from different contexts (548: 1.315 = 2.306; 551–52: 24.27–28). Kirk reminds us that not only do the gods not consume part of the sacrifice in the Iliad, but that even their appreciation of the meat's aroma has been suppressed; and, further, that the idea that the gods were all hostile to Troy is absurd (Kirk 2: 340).

and down from heaven breaks out the infinite air, and every star can be seen, and the shepherd is glad at heart:
in such numbers, between the ships and the streams of Xanthos, 560 gleamed the fires that the Trojans kindled, out there before Ilion.
A thousand fires were alight in the plain, and by each one fifty men were gathered in the glow of the blazing fire while their horses, munching away at white barley and spelt, stood by their chariots awaiting the bright-throned Dawn.

Book 9

So the Trojans kept watch, but the Achaians were possessed by an awesome panic, the fellow of icy terror:
all their best men were assailed by unendurable grief.
As two winds whip up the deep sea, flush with fish, winds of the north and west, a gale from Thrace 5 tearing in suddenly, and at once the dark wave swells and crests, strewing much seaweed along the water's edge:
just so the Achaians' spirit was shredded in their breasts.

The son of Atreus, heart-stricken with great sorrow, went to and fro, commanding the clear-voiced heralds 10 to call every man by name to the place of assembly, but not to shout names aloud; and himself went to work among the foremost.
So they sat in assembly, much troubled, and Agamemnōn stood up, shedding tears, like a blackwater spring that pours down some sheer rock face its dark cascade: just so, 15 heavily sighing, he addressed the Argives in these words: “My friends, you leaders and lords of the Argives, Zeus, great son of Kronos, has snared me in a vile deception—harsh god, who once promised me, gave his nod to it, that I'd not return home until I'd sacked strong-walled Ilion; 20 but now he's thought up this mean trick, commands me to go back in dishonor to Argos, when I've lost so many men.
This, I suppose, is almighty Zeus's idea of a joke—he who's brought down the high ramparts of so many cities, and will bring down still more, since his is the greatest power. 25 Come, then, let us all agree to do as I declare:
Let us flee in our ships, sail back to our own country, for now we'll never capture Troy of the wide ways.”

Such his words: hushed in silence were all the Achaians' sons.
For a long time, deeply concerned, they said nothing. But at last 30 Diomēdēs of the great war cry spoke up among them:
“Son of Atreus, with you and your folly I'll first contend—here, king, as is my right, in assembly, so curb your anger!
My courage, first, you slighted in front of the Danaäns, calling me weak and unwarlike: with these accusations 35 the Argives both young and old are familiar. You received a double-edged gift from the son of Kronos, devious schemer:

 with the scepter he granted you honor above all others, yet courage, the highest power, he did not give you.
 Wretched man, do you really suppose the Achaians' sons 40 to be as weak and unwarlike as you proclaim them?
 If your own heart is truly so set on returning home, then go! The way lies before you, your ships are drawn up by the sea, all those many that came with you from Mykēnai!
 But the other long-haired Achaians will stay on here 45 until we've sacked Troy. Suppose even these likewise choose to flee in their ships, sail back to their own country, yet we two, I and Sthenelos, will fight on till we attain our object in Ilion, since a god it was brought us here."

So he spoke, and all the Achaians' sons roared approval, 50 applauding the words of the horse breaker Diomēdēs.
 Then next there rose and addressed them Nestōr the horseman:
 "Son of Tydeus, in warfare you're strong above all others, and the wisest man in counsel among those of your age:
 of all the Achaians not one man will disparage your words 55 or dismiss them; yet your speech did not conclude the matter.
 Well, you're still young: you could even be my son, my youngest-born! Even so, there was shrewdness in your advice to the Argive princes: what you said was fairly stated.
 But now I, who can claim to be older than you, will speak out 60 and go through each point: nor will any man treat my words lightly—no, not even our lordly Agamemnōn!
 Outlaw from clan, hearth, society is the man who's in love with the chilling horrors of civil conflict.
 But let us for now submit ourselves to night's darkness, 65 and prepare our meal; let the guards man their several stations along the length of the ditch we dug outside the ramparts.
 This is my charge to our younger men. But after that you, son of Atreus, must take the lead, for you are the most royal.
 Set up a feast for the elders: that's proper, not unbecoming. 70
 Your huts are filled with wine that the ships of the Achaians bring you in daily across the wide sea from Thrace—all entertainment's your province; you're lord over many.

When many are gathered together you'll follow whoever offers the best advice; and sore need have the Achaians 75 of shrewd and close counsel, since enemies near our ships are lighting numerous watch fires. Who could be pleased at that?
 This night will either shatter our army or preserve it."

So he spoke; they listened attentively, carried out his orders.
 The sentries hurried forth, dressed in their war gear, 80 Nestōr's son Thrasymēdēs, his people's shepherd, leading, and Askalaphos and Ialmenos, sons both of Arēs, together with Mērionēs and Aphareus and Dēïpyros, and Kreiōn's son, the illustrious Lykomēdēs.
 These seven commanded the sentries, and with each 85
 a hundred youths sallied forth, all clutching their long spears.
 They went and sat themselves down between ditch and ramparts, and lit their fires there, and each man prepared his meal.

But Atreus's son led all the Achaian elders together to his hut, and set before them a feast to warm their hearts. 90
 So they reached out their hands to the good things ready for them;
 but when they'd satisfied their desire for food and drink the first to set about weaving a web of counsel for them was old Nestōr, whose past advice too had proven the best.
 He with friendly intent now spoke before the assembly: 95
 "Most glorious son of Atreus, Agamemnōn, lord of men, with you I'll begin, with you end, since over many men is your royal rule, and Zeus to you has entrusted both scepter and precedent, to make good judgments for them.
 So you must, above all others, both speak and listen, 100 and implement for another whatever his spirit may bid him declare for our good: yours to finish whatever he begins.
 Now I shall speak out as it seems to me to be best.
 No other man will conceive a better idea than the one that I've long had in mind—and which I still hold now— 105 ever since you, Zeus's scion, went and took that girl, Briseïs, away from the hut of the furious Achilles—not something I approved of: for my part I tried hard to dissuade you; but you were swayed by your proud spirit, and on a most noble man, whom the very immortals honored, 110 you heaped dishonor by taking, and keeping, that prize of his.

Yet even now let's consider how we still might make amends, persuade him with winning gifts and conciliatory words."

To him the lord of men, Agamemnōn, then replied:

"Old sir, there was nothing amiss in your telling of my blindness. 115

Deluded I was: I admit it. Worth a whole crowd of common folk is the man whom Zeus cherishes in his heart, as now he's honored that man and routs the Achaian forces.

But since I was blinded, a slave to my wretched passions,
I'm willing to make amends, to pay boundless compensation. 120

Let me, before you all, name my splendid gifts:
seven tripods untouched by fire, ten talents of gold,
twenty shining cauldrons, and a dozen horses—
sturdy race winners, whose speed has brought them prizes.

Not landless would be that man, nor lacking in possession 125 of precious gold, to whom there accrued the amount of wealth brought to me by my whole-hoofed racehorses' prizes.

I'll give him, too, seven women, skilled in fine handiwork, from Lesbos, whom—when he took that well-built island himself—I picked out: they surpassed all women in beauty. 130

These will I give him, including her whom I took away, Briseus's daughter; and, further, I'll swear a great oath that I never went up to her bed nor lay with her, as is the custom of humankind, between men and women.

All these things will be given him now; and if hereafter 135
the gods grant that we take down Priam's great city, let him go in and load up his ship with gold and bronze

when we, the Achaians, are dividing up the spoils, and choose for himself a score of Trojan women—the most beautiful, after Argive Helen herself! And if 140
we get back to Achaian Argos, rich mother of plowland, my son-in-law he can be, I'll honor him like my own son, Orestēs, late-born, reared in the midst of plenty.

Three daughters of mine there are in my fine-built hall— 145 Chrysothemis, Laodikē, and Iphianassa: of these let him take whichever he pleases, no bride-price paid, to Pēleus's house; and I'll offer him richer bride-gifts than any man ever yet provided with his daughter.

Seven well-established townships I will give him: 150
Kardamylē, Enopē, and Hirē with its grasslands,

sacred Phērai, together with deep-meadowed Antheia, lovely Aipeia and Pēdasos of the vineyards—
 all of them near the sea, and bordering sandy Pylos, their inhabitants men who are rich in sheep and cattle, who'll honor him like a god, shower him with gifts, 155 and under his sway will fulfill his beneficent ordinances.
 All this will I do for him if he'll only give up his wrath!
 Let him yield! Look at Hādēs: unbending, implacable—why of all gods he's the one that mortals hate the worst—and acknowledge himself as lower than me, who am 160 of far superior ancestry, so much more royal.”

To him then answered Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman:
 “Most glorious son of Atreus, Agamemnōn, lord of men, these gifts cannot be faulted that you now offer Lord Achilles.
 Come then, let us choose delegates, send them quickly 165 to the hut of Achilles, Pēleus's son—no, rather let those on whom my eye falls undertake this mission:
 First and foremost, Phoinix, Zeus's favorite, should be leader, and next I'd choose great Aias and noble Odysseus, and of the heralds let Odios and Eurybatēs go with them. 170 Bring water now for our hands, and order holy silence, so we can pray to Zeus, son of Kronos, for his compassion.”

So he spoke, and they all were pleased with what he said.
 At once the heralds poured water over their hands, and young men filled mixing bowls to the brim with wine, 175 dripped libations into the cups, then served it to all, and when they had poured libations, and drunk all they wanted, then they set out from the hut of Atreus's son Agamemnōn; and Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman, kept giving them instructions—eyeing each one of them, but Odysseus most of all— 180 as to how they should try persuasion on Pēleus's blameless son.

So the two¹ set off down the shoreline with its thunderous surf, making many a heartfelt prayer to the earth-holding Earth-Shaker

1. The use of the dual rather than the plural here and elsewhere in this scene indicates two characters only. These are clearly Odysseus and Aias. But there is also Phoinix to be considered, as well as a couple of heralds. Several explanations have been offered, of which the most plausible is that we have here the incomplete reshaping (perhaps by Homer himself: West 2011, 13–14) of an earlier version in which only the two acknowledged leaders of the embassy took part.

to easily sway the great mind of Aiakos's grandson.²
 They made their way to the Myrmidons' huts and ships, 185 and found him delighting his heart with a clear-toned lyre, fine and inlaid, with a silver bridge set on it, that he'd got from the spoils when he laid waste Ēetiōn's city.³
 With this he was cheering his heart, and he sang of men's great deeds:
 only Patroklos was there, sitting opposite him, silent, 190 waiting till Aiakos's grandson should finish his singing.
 Now the two came forward, led by noble Odysseus, and stood there before him. Surprised, Achilles sprang up still clutching the lyre, from the seat on which he'd been sitting, and so too Patroklos, when he saw these men, stood up. 195
 Then swift-footed Achilles greeted them with these words:
 "Welcome! As good friends you've come—surely some urgent need brings you? Despite my wrath, you're still to me the dearest of all the Achaians."

 So saying, noble Achilles led them in, and sat them down on purple-draped chairs, 200 and quickly told Patroklos, still standing at hand there:
 "Son of Menoitios, fetch out a larger bowl now, mix the wine stronger, fill a cup for each one of them, for these men under my roof are my dearest friends."

 So he spoke,
 and Patroklos did as his dear companion told him. 205
 He set down a great chopping block in the light of the fire, and on it laid the backs of a sheep and a fat goat, and the chine of a grown hog, glistening with lard:

-
2. In Homer, Aiakos, the father of Pēleus, seems to be associated with the latter's kingdom of Phthiē in Thessaly; but a parallel early tradition makes him a native of the island of Aigina, indeed its first human inhabitant. The Myrmidons ("ant people") were allegedly created for Aiakos by Zeus there, but were later relocated to Phthiē.
3. Ēetiōn was the father of Hektōr's wife, Andromachē: he and his sons were killed by Achilles at the sacking of his city, Cilician Thēbē, and Achilles honored him with a proper funeral (6.417–19). In addition to the lyre, Achilles also had from him a horse, Pēdasos (16.152–54), and the mass of iron that was one of the prizes offered at Patroklos's funeral games (23.826–27). Achilles is the only hero in the Iliad who is seen singing or playing an instrument.

Automedōn held them for him, and noble Achilles carved.
 He chopped the meat skillfully, spitted it on skewers, 210 while Menoitios's godlike son stoked the fire to a blaze.
 Then, when the fire burned down and the flames died out, he spread the embers and laid the spits over them, resting on firedogs, then sprinkled sacred salt on the meat.
 When the roasting was done, and the bits set out on platters, 215 Patroklos brought bread and put it on the table in handsome baskets, while Achilles shared out the meat.
 He himself chose to sit down facing noble Odysseus against the opposite wall, told his comrade to offer the gods sacrifice, and Patroklos threw the firstlings in the fire. 220 So they reached out their hands to the good things ready for
 them;
 but when they'd satisfied their desire for food and drink, Aias nodded to Phoinix. Noble Odysseus saw this, and filling his cup with wine he thus toasted Achilles:
 "Greetings, Achilles! We've not lacked our fair share of feasting, 225 both in the hut of Atreus's son Agamemnon and now here: there's rich plenty, all that our hearts could want to dine on. Still, tasty food is not our business now.
 It's over-great trouble we're looking at, Zeus's nursing—we're terrified, it's a toss-up whether we'll save or lose 230 our well-benched ships—unless you array yourself in your might!
 For it's close by our ships and the wall that their camp is now pitched
 by the high-spirited Trojans and their far-famed allies; they've lit a great number of fires there, claim they'll no longer be held back, but are going to descend upon our black ships, 235 and Zeus, son of Kronos, shows them good omens—lightning sent on their right—while Hektōr, exulting in his power, rampages fearsomely, trusting in Zeus, respecting neither men nor gods: a strong battle lust has possessed him.
 He prays that the bright dawn may come up with all speed, 240 for he's threatening to lop off the tops of our ships' sternposts and to burn the ships themselves with devouring fire and slay the Achaians, panic-stricken because of the smoke, beside them.
 This is my deep private dread, that the gods may bring his threats to pass, and our destiny may be to perish 245 here, far away in Troy, remote from horse-pasturing Argos.

 Up, then, if you're now minded, though late, to rescue the sons of the Achaians, worn out by the Trojans' noisy onslaught!
 Grief will be yours, too, hereafter: there's no cure to be found for this evil once it's inflicted. Rather, long before that 250 think how to save the Danaäns from this day of evil!
 My friend, your father Pēleus surely laid this charge upon you,
 that day he sent you out from Phthiē to Agamemnōn:
 'My son, strength is something that Hērē and Athēnē will give you if they're so minded. You must hold back 255 the pride in your breast: a friendly approach is better.
 Steer clear of strife that breeds trouble: that way the Argives both young and old will accord you the greater honor.' That's what he advised: you're forgetful. But even now stop, let go of your heart-aching wrath! Agamemnōn 260 offers you worthy gifts if you'll only cease your wrath.
 Just hear me out, and I'll catalogue all the gifts that back in his hut Agamemnōn promised he'd give you:
 seven tripods untouched by fire, ten talents of gold,
 twenty shining cauldrons, and a dozen horses— 265
 sturdy race winners, whose speed has brought them prizes.
 That man would not be landless, not indeed unpossessed of precious gold, to whom there accrued all the wealth that Agamemnōn's prize horses have brought him by their speed.
 He'll give you, too, seven women, skilled in fine handiwork, 270
 from Lesbos, whom—when he took that well-built island himself—he picked out: they surpassed all women in beauty.
 These he will give you, including her whom he took from you, Briseus's daughter; and, further, he'll swear a great oath that he never went up to her bed or lay with her in love, 275
 as is the custom, my lord, between men and women.
 All these things will be given you now; and if hereafter the gods grant that we lay low Priam's great city, then you can go in and fill your ship's holds with gold and bronze
 when we, the Achaians, are dividing up the spoils, 280 and yourself choose twenty Trojan women—those who are the most lovely, save only for Argive Helen! And if we get back to Achaian Argos, rich mother of plowland, his son-in-law you can be, he'll honor you like his own son, Orestēs, late-born, reared in the midst of plenty. 285

Three daughters of his there are in his fine-built hall—Chrysothemis, Laodikē, and Iphianassa;⁴ of these you can take whichever you please, paying no bride-price, to Pēleus's house; and he'll offer you richer bride-gifts
 than any man ever yet provided with his daughter. 290
 Seven well-established townships he will give you:
 Kardamylē, Enopē, and Hirē with its grasslands,
 sacred Phērai, together with deep-meadowed Antheia,
 lovely Aipeia and Pēdasos of the vineyards—
 all of them near the sea, and bordering sandy Pylos, 295
 their inhabitants men who are rich in sheep and cattle, who'll honor you like a god, shower you with gifts, and under your sway will fulfill your beneficent ordinances.
 All this he will do for you if you'll only cease your wrath!
 But if Atreus's son still leaves too much hatred in your heart, 300 both himself and his gifts, yet pity the rest of the Achaians, hard pressed throughout their ranks, men who'll hold you in honor like a god, for you could win great glory in their eyes, since you might now take down Hektōr, who'd surely make for you in his murderous fury: he claims no man is his match 305 among all the Danaāns who came here in their ships.”

In answer to him swift-footed Achilles then said:
 “Scion of Zeus, Laertēs's son, resourceful Odysseus, I must choose my words bluntly, say straight out, regardless, what's on my mind, the way things are going to be, 310 so you don't all sit coaxing me, in your different ways:
 for hateful to me as the gates of Hādēs is that man who hides one thought in his mind, but speaks another.
 So I shall say exactly what I believe to be right.
 I'll not, I think, yield to Atreus's son Agamemnōn, 315 nor to the other Danaāns, since gratitude there was none for my battling against the enemy without any respite.
 Equal the lot of the skulker and the bravest fighter;
 courage and cowardice rank the same in honor;

4. The number of Agamemnōn's daughters was disputed in antiquity (no mention here of Electra). If, as seems likely, Iphianassa is a variant form of Iphigeneia (or Iphimēdē), then Homer, here as elsewhere, characteristically makes no mention of that daughter's human sacrifice at Aulis in order to obtain a favorable sailing wind to Troy for the Greek fleet: she is safe at home, and available for marriage (one tradition has Agamemnōn send for her at Aulis ostensibly to marry Achilles).

death comes alike to the idler and to the hardest worker. 320
 No profit to me that I suffered agonies at heart, constantly risking my life in warfare. Just as a bird brings back to her unfledged chicks whatever morsel she can find, yet herself will suffer a heap of troubles, so I too have kept vigil many a sleepless night, 325 and spent bloodstained days engaged in battle, fighting warriors for their women. Twelve cities of men have I laid waste with my ships; on land as well I claim eleven more, throughout Troy's rich territory, and from all I took many splendid items of treasure, 330 and carried them back, turned them over to Atreus's son, Agamemnōn: he, waiting back there, beside his swift ships, took them, shared out a little, kept the bulk for himself.
 Some he bestowed as prizes upon leaders and princes: these gifts still hold good. From me, alone of the Achaians, 335 he took, and keeps, a heart-warming wife. Let him lie with her and take his pleasure! But why must the Argives wage war against the Trojans? Why did Atreus's son gather an army and bring it here, if not on account of fair-haired Helen?
 Do they, then, alone of mankind, have love for their wives, 340 these sons of Atreus? Don't all decent and sensible men love their own wives and care for them, just as I loved mine with all my heart, my spear-captive though she was?
 But since he's cheated me, snatched my prize from my hands, let him not tempt me: too well I know him, he'll not 345 persuade me! Rather, Odysseus, with you and the other princes let him figure how to ward off consuming fire from the ships!
 Indeed he's done much hard work here during my absence—even built a wall, and dug out a ditch beside it, wide and deep, and bristling with stakes—yet not 350 even so can he hold back the might of Hektōr, killer of men!
 So long as I was out there, battling among the Achaians, Hektōr had no stomach for fighting far out from the wall, would advance no further than the Skaian Gates and the oak tree—he met me alone there once, only just survived my attack. 355
 But now, since I have no wish to fight against noble Hektōr, tomorrow I'll offer sacrifice to Zeus and all other gods, then haul my ships down to the sea and load them up, and you'll see—if you want to, if it concerns you at all—

at first light, sailing over the teeming Hellespont, 360 my flotilla, its rowers all eagerly plying their oars;
 and if the renowned Earth-Shaker gives me good sailing, on the third day I should arrive at rich-soiled Phthië. I own much that I left behind when, to my cost, I came here, and more that I'll take back home with me: gold, red bronze, 365 women with their fine sashes, grey iron, everything I got by lot; but my prize—that, he who gave it me has outrageously taken back, he, the lord Agamemnōn, the son of Atreus! To him declare all, just as I charge you, openly, so that other Achaians may be incensed 370 if perhaps, ever clad in shamelessness, he's hoping to cheat one more Danaän yet! But he wouldn't dare, shameless dog though he is, to look me straight in the face.
 I will have no part in his counsels or his actions, so much has he cheated and failed me. Never again 375 let him beguile me with words: once is enough! Let him coast at his ease to perdition: Zeus the counsellor's stolen his wits.
 Hateful to me are his gifts, him I rate at a split chip's worth!
 Not if he offered me ten, no, twenty times as much as his total possessions, and from somewhere threw in more, 380 or all the wealth that comes in to Orchomenos, or Egyptian Thēbē, where private houses are chockablock with treasure, that has a hundred gates, from each of which go forth two hundred warriors with their horses and chariots—not even were his gifts as countless as sand or dust, 385 no, not even then would Agamemnōn change my heart, until he'd paid the full price for all my bitter shaming!
 Nor would I marry a daughter of Atreus's son Agamemnōn, not even if her beauty outshone golden Aphroditē's and her handiwork was a match for grey-eyed Athēnē's. No, 390 not even so would I wed her! Let him choose another Achaian, one who suits him better, who's more kingly! For if the gods indeed preserve me, and I get home safely, then Pēleus himself will seek out a wife for me.
 There are many Achaian women in Hellas and Phthië, 395 daughters of leading men, their citadels' guardians, and of these whichever I want I shall make my own dear wife.
 Often enough back home my manly heart would urge me to take on a wedded wife, a suitable bedmate, get the joy of those treasures old Pēleus had made his own. 400 For me, to be alive has nothing to match it, not all the fabled wealth of Ilion—once a flourishing city in peacetime, before the coming of the Achaians' sons; not even all that's stored beyond the marble threshold of the archer, Phoibos Apollo, in rocky Pythō!⁵ 405 Cattle and fat sheep can be lifted by raiders; tripods and chestnut bloodstock are winnable; but to bring a man's life back neither raiding nor victories suffice once it has fled beyond the barrier of his teeth.

 My mother, silver-footed Thetis the goddess, tells me 410 that two contrary spirits go with me until the end that's death.
 If I stay here, and fight around the Trojans' city I'll lose my homecoming, but gain imperishable renown.
 On the other hand, if I return to my own dear country my fine renown will have perished, but my life will long endure, 415 and the end of death will not find me any time soon.
 To the rest of you I would offer this piece of advice: Hoist sail, return home. You will never attain your goal of taking steep Ilion. Wide-thundering Zeus has strongly reached out his hand to protect it: its people are made bold. 420 Go back now, and report to the leaders of the Achaians my message in full—free speech is the privilege of you elders—to make them think up in their minds some better plan:
 one that may save both their ships and the troops of the Achaians beside their hollow ships, since their present purpose cannot 425 be implemented because of my implacable anger.
 But let Phoinix remain behind, and sleep here with us, so he can come with me by ship to our own dear country tomorrow—if he so wishes: I won't force him to go.”
 So he spoke, and they all became quiet and silent, amazed 430 by what he had said, so forcibly did he refuse them.
 But at last there spoke up among them Phoinix, the old horseman, in a flood of tears, much concerned for the Achaians' ships:

5. Pythō was the ancient name for Delphi, the site of the Delphic Oracle, where fabulous votive offerings were amassed over the centuries. Homer has one explicit reference only to the Oracle itself (at Od. 8.79–82). But the allusion here implies success and wealth; and since the oracle got going no earlier than the eighth century B.C.E., we have a putative date for at least this passage, and text, of the Iliad (unless we assume a mere interpolation) of c. 750 B.C.E., which fits well with other calculations.

“If you truly mean to go home, bright-famed Achilles, and you’re not minded at all to keep off consuming fire 435 from the swift ships, since rage has possessed your spirit, how then, dear child, could I stay here alone, without you?
 He had me go with you, did the old horseman Pēleus, the day that he sent you from Phthiē to Agamemnōn, just a child, with no knowledge yet of warfare’s common business, 440 or of the assemblies where men achieve distinction.
 That was why he sent me, to teach you all these matters, to be both a speaker of words and a man of action.
 So I would never choose, dear child, to be left behind without you, not even should a god himself undertake 445 to scrape off my years and make me a vigorous youth again, as I was when I first left Hellas, that land of fair women, running from strife with my father, Ormenos’s son Amyntōr, who was angry with me because of his fair-haired concubine, whom he was in love with, disregarding his wife, 450 my mother—who kept imploring me, clutching my knees, to sleep with his concubine first, make her loathe the old man.
 I obeyed her and did it. But my father soon found out, heaped curses on me, invoked the dread Furies to ensure that he never held on his knees any son sired by me; 455 and the gods indeed in due course fulfilled his curses—Zeus of the underworld and fearsome Persephonē.
 [I conceived a plan to kill him with the keen-edged bronze, but then an immortal curbed my fury with the reminder of how people would talk, of how much men would censure me, 460 so I shouldn’t be labeled a patricide among the Achaians.]⁶
 But the heart in my breast could no longer bear the thought of daily life in a house where my father was thus angered—though indeed my fellows and cousins rallied round me, pleading with me to stay on there in his halls, 465 and many fat sheep and sleek and shambling cattle they slaughtered, and many a hog, bulked up with lard,

6. Lines 458–61 are not in the MS tradition or the scholia. Plutarch (Mor. 26) guessed, wrongly, that they were expunged by Aristarchos out of shock at Phoinix having considered killing his father. Were they, as some believe, interpolated in a post-Aristarchan branch of the MS tradition? Or are they an improvisation by “Homer” to help motivate Phoinix’s flight (see Hainsworth 123)? The lines are convincingly Homeric, not only in language but also in style.

was stretched out by them to be singed in Hēphaistos's flame, and wine in plenty was swilled from the old man's jars.
 For nine whole nights they kept vigilant watch around me, 470 relieving each other in relays. The fires were never let die—there was one by the portico of the well-walled courtyard, and one at the entrance, outside the door of my room.
 But when the tenth dark night arrived for me, then I burst through my room's close-fitted door, got out, 475 vaulted easily over the courtyard wall, unnoticed by the men on guard and the household's women servants.
 Then I fled far away, through the broad realm of Hellas, and came to rich-soiled Phthiē, mother of flocks, to the lord Pēleus, and he most readily welcomed me, 480 and loved me just as a father would love his only son, his last-born child, the heir to rich possessions.
 He made me wealthy, too, gave me rule over many,
 and I lived in Phthiē's borderland, the Dolōpians' lord.
 And what you are, I made you, godlike Achilles, 485 loving you from my heart, for you'd go with no one else either to a feast, or to meals in your hall at home until I'd picked you up and settled you on my knees, and fed you the first cut of meat, put the wine to your lips.
 There were many times that you'd wet the front of my tunic, 490 sputtering out the wine in your bothersome childishness.
 I've put up with plenty for you, had a lot of hard work, never forgetting the gods would not grant me a son of my own.
 So, godlike Achilles, it was you that I treated as my son so that one day you could ward off unseemly ruin from me. 495 Achilles, please master this great passion of yours! Don't nurse a pitiless heart. Why, the gods themselves can be moved, whose dignity, honor, and power are far greater than ours, and whom, with sacrifices and propitiatory prayers, libations and piquant aromas, humankind wins over, 500 imploring them, when anyone steps out of line, does wrong.
 There are, too, Prayers of Repentance, great Zeus's daughters, lame and wrinkled, these—eyes furtive, sidelong glances—their task to keep close on the heels of Blind Delusion; but Blind Delusion is strong and swift-footed, so she by far 505 outstrips them all, goes ahead of them over the whole earth, harming mortals; the healing Prayers follow on behind her.

One who reveres these daughters of Zeus when they approach him they unstintingly help, pay attention to his prayers; but should a man deny and persistently reject them 510 then they go and petition Zeus, the son of Kronos, for Blind Delusion to hunt him, so he's hurt, suffers retribution.
 Achilles, you too must ensure that the daughters of Zeus are met with such honor as bends other good men's minds.
 If you hadn't been offered gifts now, with more to come later, 515 by Atreus's son, if he were still in a furious temper with you, I wouldn't be telling you now to cast aside your wrath and come to the aid of the Argives, great though their need is.
 But he offers you much at once, and has promised more later, and the men he's sent to plead with you he picked from the best 520 of all the Achaians: men whom you hold as dearest among the Argives! Don't make a futility of their words, their visit! Earlier, true, your anger could not be questioned.
 Such tales from old times we've heard, famous deeds of heroic fighters, of how then too such furious rage would come upon them; 525 but they could be turned by gifts, talked round with words.
 There's this affair I recall—from long ago, not recent—the way it was, and I'll tell you: we're all friends here.
 The Kourêtes and the Aitôlians, tough warriors, were fighting over the city of Kalydôn, and killing one another, 530 the Aitôlians in defense of beautiful Kalydôn, the Kourêtes eager to storm and ravage it in battle.
 For golden-throned Artemis had sent them bad trouble, piqued that she hadn't been offered first-fruits by Oineus from his fertile orchard. The other gods savored rich offerings, 535 but for great Zeus's daughter alone he did nothing, whether he'd forgotten, or hadn't thought to: a most grave omission.
 Irate, she, Zeus's offspring, the archer goddess, sent a wild boar out against him, savage, white-tusked, that did plenty of damage, trampling Oineus's orchard, 540 uprooting and tossing about a whole lot of big fruit trees, roots, apple blossom, and all. This boar was killed by Oineus's son, Meleagros, only after he'd assembled, from many cities, a number of huntsmen, along with their hounds: it called for more than a few men to overcome 545 such a huge brute, that already had been the death of many.
 The goddess whipped up a great outcry, angry shouting over the dead boar's head and bristling hide, between Kourêtes and prickly Aitōlians. Now so long as Meleagros, that keen warrior, was in the battle, 550 all that time the Kourêtes got nowhere, could not even hold firm ground outside the wall, despite their numbers.

 But when wrath possessed Meleagros—wrath that distorts the good sense in the breasts of even careful thinkers—he then, irate at heart with Althaiē, his own mother, 555 was lying with his wedded wife, the lovely Kleopatra—child of neat-ankled Marpessa, Evēnos's daughter, and Idas, mightiest then among warriors on this earth, who took up his bow to fight against lord Phoibos Apollo, all for the sake of the neat-ankled maiden. So 560 Kleopatra was known at home by her father and lady mother as Halcyonē, because Marpessa had suffered the fate of the sorrowful halcyon bird, ever weeping because Phoibos Apollo the archer had snatched her child away.
 —By her Meleagros lay now, brooding over his bitter rage, 565 rage induced by his mother's curses. She to the gods made endless prayers, aggrieved by her brother's killing, kept beating the nurturing earth with her hands as she now called upon Hādēs, along with fearsome Persephonē—sitting crouched forward, breast soaked with tears—to bring 570 death to her son. The Fury that walks in darkness, with the implacable heart, heard her from Erebos:
 soon from around the gates there came an uproar, the sound of men battering at the ramparts. The Aitōlian elders besought him—sending the best of the gods' priests— 575 to come out and help them, promised a great reward:
 at the richest point on the plain of beautiful Kalydōn, they told him, he could make his own splendid estate, fifty acres, the half of it land for vines, the rest cleared plowland, all to be marked off from the plain. 580 Urgently did the old horseman Oineus entreat him, standing there at his high-roofed chamber's threshold, shaking its bolted doors, while supplicating his son; urgently, too, did his sisters and his lady mother implore him to act—he refused them the more—as did his comrades, 585 those who were closest and dearest to him of all, yet not even so could they move the heart in his breast, till his room was being fiercely battered, while the Kourētes were mounting the ramparts and setting fire to the great city.

 It was only now that his fine-sashed bedfellow, weeping, 590 pleaded with Meleagros, reminding him of all the griefs that befall a people when their city is captured—the menfolk slaughtered, the city destroyed by fire, their children and deep-sashed wives led captive by strangers.
 His heart was stirred then, hearing about these horrors: 595
 he got up to go, put on his bright body-armor.
 Thus he saved the Aitōlians from their day of evil, after yielding to his own heart. They never paid him the many fine gifts he'd been promised; he rescued them anyhow.
 So please, don't harbor such thoughts, don't let some maleficent 600 spirit turn you that way! Indeed, it would be too hard to save ships already on fire. Come now, while gifts are still there to be had—the Achaians will honor you like a god.
 But if giftless you enter this murderous war, you will not enjoy the same honor, ward off war's perils though you may.” 605

In answer to him then spoke swift-footed Achilles:
 “Phoinix, old sir, Zeus's nursling, of this honor I have no need.
 Enough that I have been honored by Zeus's ordinance, that will still guard me here among the curved ships, for so long as there's breath in my body, and my knees have power. 610
 And another thing I'll tell you, and you take it to heart:
 Don't confuse my mind with lamentation and sorrow trying to please Atreus's son, that hero. Support him in nothing, lest my love for you be turned to hatred. Much better if you take my side in vexing the man who vexes me! 615
 So share my kingdom, enjoy the half of my honor!
 These men will take back my message: do you remain, take your rest on a soft bed; and tomorrow at daybreak we'll make our decision: whether to go back home or stay.”

With that he silently nodded an eyebrow to Patroklos, 620 to spread a thick bed for Phoinix, a hint to the others to leave the hut soon, go back; and among them Aias, Telamōn's godlike son, now spoke up, saying:
 “Son of Laertēs, scion of Zeus, resourceful Odysseus, let us be off: as I see it, the object of our coming 625 won't be achieved on this visit. We must quickly report his reply—though by no means a welcome one—to the Danaäns, who may well now be sitting awaiting it. But Achilles has turned his breast's great-hearted spirit to savage fury, stubborn man, nor does he in his ruthlessness show regard 630 for the affection that we, his comrades, here by the ships have shown him above all others. A man accepts recompense even from his brother's or his own son's murderer—while the killer pays a steep price, and then stays in his home town, and the kinsman's emotional passion is duly tempered 635 by the blood-price he has received. But obdurate and malign is the spirit the gods have put in your breast, and all because of just one girl! Yet now we're ready to give you seven, the best there are, and much else besides! Be gracious, respect your own house—we're guests under your roof 640 representing the Danaän people, and we want to remain your closest and dearest friends, of all the Achaïans."

In answer to him swift-footed Achilles then said:
 "Aias, scion of Zeus, son of Telamōn, lord of your people, all that you say seems in line with my own thinking; 645 but my heart swells with rage whenever I remember this one fact: the vile treatment I got among the Argives from Atreus's son, as though I were some unhonored refugee.
 So you can go now, and announce my message: I shall not consider taking part in the bloody business of battle 650 till the son of Priam the prudent, noble Hektōr, reaches the huts and ships of the Myrmidons, as he slaughters the Argives, and burns their vessels with fire!
 But around my own hut and my black ship I rather think Hektōr, though eager for battle, will find himself held up." 655

So he spoke. They each took a two-handled cup and poured a libation; Odysseus then led them back down the line of ships.
 Patroklos instructed his companions and the handmaids to make a thick bed for Phoinix as quickly as might be,
 and they obeyed, spread the bed just as he ordered, 660 with fleeces, a rug, and sheets of the softest linen.
 There the old man lay down, and awaited the bright dawn.
 But Achilles slept in his well-built hut's back room, and with him a woman whom he had brought from Lesbos, the daughter of Phorbas, fair-cheeked Diomēdē. 665

Patroklos lay down on the other side, and likewise with him was Iphis of the fine sashes, whom noble Achilles gave him after he took steep Skyros, Enyeus's citadel.

Now when the others arrived at the huts of Atreus's son they were pledged in golden cups by the sons of the Achaians, 670 who stood up, on this side and that, to greet and question them, and the lord of men, Agamemnōn, was the first to ask:
"Come, tell me, storied Odysseus, great glory of the Achaians, is he willing to fight off consuming fire from the ships, or did he refuse, does wrath still own his great-hearted spirit?" 675

In answer to him much-enduring noble Odysseus declared:
"Most glorious son of Atreus, Agamemnōn lord of men, that man will not quench his wrath, is rather filled yet further with fury, rejects both you and your gifts:
you personally he tells to take counsel among the Argives 680 as to how you might save the ships and the Achaian army;
he himself now threatens he will, at daybreak tomorrow, haul down to the sea his trim and well-benched vessels.
He would, he said, also advise all those remaining to sail back home, since they would never attain the goal 685
of taking steep Ilion: wide-thundering Zeus has strongly reached out his hand to protect it, its people are made bold.
That's what he said: these men who came with us can confirm it—Aias and the two heralds, both men of good sense. But Phoinix, the old man, is bedded down there, on Achilles' invitation, 690 so he can go with the ships to his own dear country tomorrow, if he so wishes: Achilles won't force him to go."

So he spoke. They all became quiet and silent, amazed by what he had said: very forcibly had he addressed them.
Long were they kept silent by their grief, these Achaians' sons, 695 but at last there spoke among them Diomēdēs, of the great war cry:
"Most glorious son of Atreus, Agamemnōn, lord of men,
I wish you had not gone begging to Pēleus's blameless son, with that offer of countless gifts. The man's arrogant anyhow, and now you've spurred him on to acts of yet greater arrogance. 700 For sure, we can let him be now: he's free to take off or stay here; hereafter he'll join the fight whenever the heart in his breast's so minded, or some god so stirs him.

So come now, let's all agree to do as I tell you!
You should go off to bed now, when you've pleased your hearts 705 with food and wine, our courage and our strength; but at the first appearance of fair rosy-fingered Dawn, quickly in front of the ships array both troops and horses, and urge them on, and yourself join the battle amongst the foremost."

So he spoke, and all the princes assented, marveling 710 at these words of Diomēdēs, the horse breaker. Then they poured a libation, after which each man went off to his hut and lay down to rest there and got the good gift of sleep.

Book 10

Hard by their ships all the other Achaian leaders slept the night through, overcome by gentle slumber;
but on Atreus's son Agamemnōn, the shepherd of his people, sweet sleep got no hold, as he thrashed over much in his heart.
Just as fair-haired Hērē's husband flashes his lightning 5 when preparing a fearful rainstorm, or ungodly hail, or driving snow, when snowflakes blanket the plowland—or somewhere yawns the great mouth of piercing war, so often, within his breast, Agamemnōn would groan aloud, from the depths of his heart, and his inner reason trembled. 10 Indeed, when he gazed out towards the Trojan plain, he marveled at all the fires that now burned before Ilion, at the sound of flutes and pipes, at the clamor of men;
but when he looked at the ships, and the Achaian forces, many hairs he tore from his head by the very roots 15 while appealing to Zeus on high; loud groaned his mighty heart.
And this, to his mind, now seemed to be the best plan:
to go first of all to Nestōr, the son of Nēleus, to see if with him he might fashion some sure device that would serve to ward off disaster from all the Danaāns. 20
So up he got, shrugged a tunic on over his chest, strapped on a pair of fine sandals under his shining feet, wrapped himself round in the tawny hide of a lion—huge, swarthy—that reached his ankles, and picked out a spear.
Tremors likewise beset Menelaōs, nor on his eyelids 25 had sleep settled either, out of fear that some harm might befall
the Argives, who for his sake had crossed the wide waters, and had made their way to Troy, minds set on daring warfare.
First he draped his broad shoulders with the skin of a spotted leopard; next he picked out and set on his head 30 a helmet of bronze, grasped a spear in his brawny fist, then set off to rouse his brother (who held great sway over the Argives, was honored by his people like a god), and found him, setting his fine armor about his shoulders, by his ship's stern. His brother's arrival pleased him. 35 Menelaös, of the good war cry, was the first to speak:

 "Why are you arming thus, brother? To urge some comrade to go and spy on the Trojans? I very much fear that no one will undertake this duty on your behalf: setting off out there alone to keep watch on the enemy 40 through the ambrosial night—that calls for special courage."

 Then in answer to him lord Agamemnōn declared:
 "Both you and I need a plan, Menelaös, Zeus's nursing—a cunning plan, one that will rescue and protect the Argives and their ships, now Zeus has abandoned us, 45 his mind rather favoring Hektōr's sacrifices: for I myself never saw—nor heard from another—how one man in one day could create such fearful havoc as Hektōr, Zeus's favorite, wrought on the Achaians' sons alone, though himself the son of neither god nor goddess. 50 Long, long will the Argives be troubled, I tell you, by the deeds he's already achieved, such damage they did the Achaians!
 But off with you now, bring here Idomeneus and Aias—run quickly by the ships—while I'll go to noble Nestōr, and urge him to rouse himself up, find out if he's willing 55 to inspect the guards on duty, issue them orders.
 He's the man they'd obey most readily, since his son's the guard commander—he, and Idomeneus's comrade Mēriōnēs: to them we especially gave this duty."

 To him then Menelaös, good at the war cry, replied: 60
 "What do you mean by this order? Are you telling me I should stay there with them and wait until you arrive, or hurry back here, once I've told them your requirements?"

 To him then Agamemnōn, lord of men, replied:
 "Stay there, in case we fail to meet each other 65 as we go: there are many paths running right through the camp.
 And wherever you go, call out, tell the troops to stay awake;
 address each man, cite his lineage and his father's name, treating all with respect. And don't put on airs, but rather let's join the hard work ourselves, for this, it would seem, 70 is the burden of evil that Zeus laid on us at our birth."

So saying, he sent off his brother, having briefed him well, and himself went in search of Nestōr, his people's shepherd.
 Him he found by his hut and his black ship, lying on his soft bed, and beside him, laid out, his well-wrought gear: 75 his shield, his two spears, his gleaming helmet, and at his side the bright-polished belt with which the old man would gird himself when arming for murderous battle at the head of his troops, since he never deferred to grim old age.
 He raised himself on one elbow, lifted up his head, 80 and addressing the son of Atreus, questioned him thus:
 "Who is this, walking alone by the ships, through the camp, in the dark of the night, when other mortals are sleeping?
 Is it one of your mules you're looking for? Or some comrade? Speak!
 Don't sneak up on me silently! What are you after?" 85

To him then answered the lord of men, Agamemnōn:
 "Ah, Nestōr, son of Nēleus, great glory of the Achaians, you should know Atreus's son Agamemnōn, whom beyond all others
 Zeus has set amid endless troubles, as long as the breath still remains in my body, while my knees can still respond! 90
 I am driven to wander thus, since on my eyes sweet sleep will not settle: the war, and the Achaians' woes, obsess me.
 I fear terribly for the Danaāns, my mind refuses to stay quiet, I'm distraught, my heart leaps pounding out of my breast, my bright limbs tremble beneath me. 95
 But if you too want action—since sleep won't visit you either—we could both go check on the sentries, make an inspection, just in case, worn out by toil, exhausted and drowsy, they've fallen asleep, their guard duties all forgotten.
 Enemy troops are encamped close by, and for all 100
 we know they may well mean to fight us, even at night.'

To him then answered Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman:
 "Most glorious son of Atreus, Agamemnōn, lord of men, surely not all his plans for Hektōr will Zeus of the counsels fulfill: not all, I'd guess, he now hopes for. No, I think 105 he'll have troubles redoubled to cope with, should Achilles chance to turn his spirit away from destructive wrath!
 I'll gladly come with you—but let's also rouse some others:
 that famed spearman, the son of Tydeus, and Odysseus, together with swift Aias, and Phyleus's valiant son— 110 and someone should also go summon, as well as these, Aias the godlike and lordly Idomeneus, since their ships lie furthest off, not close at hand.

 But—dear man though he is, and well-liked—I have to reproach Menelaös: it may make you angry, but I can't hide my feelings! 115 He's sleeping, has left the difficult work to you alone, when he should have been working hard on all our leaders, imploring them, now unbearable need is upon us."

To him then answered the lord of men, Agamemnōn:
 "Old sir, at another time I'd agree you should blame him, 120 since he does leave much undone, is unwilling to shoulder work—not because of inertness or indifference of mind, but since he's always looking to me, awaiting my lead.
 But this time he woke before I did, and came to find me, and I sent him off to summon those about whom you ask. 125 Now let's be going: we'll find them in front of the gates, with the guards. That's where I told them to assemble."

To him responded Nestōr, the Gerēnian horseman:
 "Then not one man of the Argives will either contradict or ignore him, whenever he exhorts them or gives them orders." 130

This said, he shrugged on a tunic over his chest, strapped a pair of fine sandals under his shining feet, flung round him a purple cloak, held fast with a buckle, of double-weave broadcloth, the napped wool thick upon it, picked up a mighty spear, tipped with sharp bronze, and then 135 set out down the line of the bronze-clad Achaians' ships.
 Odysseus it was, Zeus's equal in counsel, whom the Gerēnian horseman Nestōr first aroused from his sleep, calling to him. At once the shout rippled round his senses, and out he came from his hut, and spoke to them, saying: 140
 "Why are you wandering round the camp, alone, by the ships, in the ambrosial night? What's your great urgency?"

To him responded Nestōr, the Gerēnian horseman:
 "Son of Laertēs, scion of Zeus, resourceful Odysseus, do not be angry! Great grief has overwhelmed the Achaians: 145 so come, there's one more to wake, a man well suited to offer advice on whether to run for it or fight."

So he spoke, and resourceful Odysseus went back to his hut, shouldered an inlaid shield, and accompanied them. They now went looking for Tydeus's son Diomēdēs, and came upon him 150 outside his hut with his battle gear. Round him his comrades were sleeping, shields under their heads. Their spears stood upright, rammed in on their butt-spikes, bronze gleaming bright and far like Zeus the Father's lightning. The hero himself was asleep too: spread beneath him was the hide of a field ox, 155 and under his head a rolled-up bright-colored blanket.
 So Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman, went over and woke him with a kick of his foot, aroused him, chided him to his face:
 "Wake up, son of Tydeus! Will you slumber all night through?
 Don't you see that the Trojans are now encamped on the rise 160 of the plain, right by the ships, hardly any distance from us?"

So he spoke. Diomēdēs suddenly started up from sleep, found utterance, addressed him then with winged words:
 "What a tough old bird you are! Do you never stop working?
 Are there no other, younger, sons of the Achaians 165 who could rouse up each one of the princes, bustling around throughout the camp? Old man, you're impossible!"

To him responded Nestōr, the Gerēnian horseman:
 "Ah yes, friend, all that you say is fairly spoken:
 well-mannered sons I have, I have men under me, 170 many men, any of whom could be sent to summon people;
 but a very great need has overwhelmed the Achaians, and now, indeed, matters stand on the razor's edge:
 vile destruction for the Achaians, all of them—or survival.
 So go now, wake up swift Aias, and Phyleus's son, 175 if you feel sorry for me—you being the younger man."

So he spoke. Diomēdēs flung a lion-skin about his shoulders—huge, tawny, reaching his ankles—grasped his spear, went off, got these two men up, brought them back with him.

When they met with the sentries at their assembly point, 180 the guard commanders, they found, were far from asleep:
 rather sitting awake and vigilant, their arms beside them.
 Just as dogs keep stressful watch on the flocks in a steading when they hear some fierce wild beast come down from the hills through the timber, and there's a loud clamor of men and dogs 185 going after it, and their sleep is all lost: so too for these sweet sleep from their eyelids perished, as they kept vigilant through this bad night, eyes fixed on the plain to catch any sound of a Trojan advance. At the sight of them the old man rejoiced, and gave them encouragement: 190 [and spoke out then, addressed them with winged words.]¹ “Keep watch as you’re doing, dear children; don’t let sleep overtake any one of you, make a sport of us to our foes.”

That said, he hurried across the ditch, and was followed by those Argive princes who’d been summoned to the council, 195 and Mērionēs and Nestōr’s fine son went with them, since the princes themselves had asked them to contribute.
 So they crossed the dug ditch and settled themselves down in an open space where the ground was seen to be clear of the corpses of the fallen, the point at which mighty Hektōr 200 had turned back from killing Argives, when night embraced him.
 There they sat down, and debated one with another, and the first to speak was Nestōr, the Gerēnian horseman: “My friends, is there really no man who’d trust his own daring spirit enough to venture among the great-hearted 205 Trojans, in case he might catch some enemy straggler, or perhaps overhear some rumor among the Trojans, or what they’re planning between themselves—do they mean to remain out here by the ships, or will they withdraw back to the city, now they’ve defeated the Achaians? 210 All this he might learn, and make his way back to us unscathed—and great, under high heaven, would be his renown among all men, with a noble gift besides;
 for of all our leaders, who lord it over their ships, every one will make him a gift of a black ewe 215 with a suckling lamb—there’s no comparable possession, and he’ll always have a place at our feasts and banquets.”

So he spoke, and they all became quiet and silent. Then amongst them there spoke Diomēdēs of the great war cry: “Nestōr, my own heart and proud spirit urge me on 220 to enter the camp of these hostile men close by,

1. A number of MSS omit this verse as an interpolation inserted merely to provide a specific verb of speaking.

these Trojans: but if some other man were to follow with me, there'd be greater comfort and greater confidence.
When two go together, one reasons ahead of the other what's for the best; alone, he may figure the odds, but his mind has a shorter range, his judgment is slighter.” 225

So he spoke, and many were eager to join Diomedēs: Eager were both Aiases, henchmen of Arēs; eager was Mērionēs; very eager was Nestōr's son; eager too Menelaös the son of Atreus, the far-famed spearman; eager was steadfast Odysseus to enter among the throng of the Trojans, since ever daring was the spirit in his breast.
Then there spoke among them the lord of men, Agamemnōn: “Diomēdēs son of Tydeus, delight of my heart, choose whichever man you prefer as your companion, the best one of those here present, since many are eager. 235
And don't, through unspoken respect, leave the better man unchosen, and take the worse, with an eye to his ancestry—however much more kingly he may happen to be.”

So he spoke, alarmed on behalf of fair-haired Menelaös. 240
But Diomēdēs of the great war cry once more responded:
‘If you honestly want me to choose my own companion, how then could I fail to call on godlike Odysseus, whose heart and gallant spirit are ready and willing for all manner of ventures—and Pallas Athēnē loves him!
If this man goes with me, we two might come back unscathed from a blazing fire, such his unmatched quick-wittedness!’ 245

To him then replied much-enduring noble Odysseus: “Son of Tydeus, don't over-praise me—or fault me, either:
you're telling the Argives what they know well already. 250 Let's be off now: night's nearly over, dawn is near, the stars have advanced in their courses, more than two-thirds of the night is gone; the third watch is all that's left us.”

So they both spoke, and put on their fearsome gear.
To Tydeus's son that staunch fighter Thrasymēdēs 255 gave a two-edged sword—his own had been left by his ship—and a shield; on his head he settled a helmet of bull's hide, lacking both boss and crest, the kind that's known as a skullcap: the favored guard for the heads of lusty youths.

Mērionēs gave Odysseus a bow and a quiver, 260 a sword too; and on his head he settled a helmet made out of leather: inside it many laces were tightly stretched, while on the outside a boar's white gleaming tusks were patterned this way and that, packed close together with consummate skill; it was lined with felt inside. This cap, 265 long ago, from Ormenos's son Amyntōr in Eleōn Autolykos stole, breaking into his solid house, and gave it to Kytheran Amphidamas to take to Skandeia, but Amphidamas gave it to Molos as a guest-gift, and he gave it to Mērionēs, his own son, to wear; and now 270 it was set on Odysseus's head and fitted it closely.²

So when the two had put on their fearsome gear, they set out, leaving all the leading men there behind them; and for them, on the right, a heron was sent, close beside their path, by Pallas Athēnē. Though they could not see it 275 through the dark of the night, they still heard its sharp cry, and Odysseus, glad at the omen, now prayed to Athēnē:
 "Hear me, child of Zeus of the aegis, you who always stand by me in all my ventures—nor am I forgotten when I move into action—now above all, Athēnē, 280 favor me, let us enjoy a heroic return to the ships after carrying out some great feat to trouble the Trojans."

Then Diomēdēs of the great war cry prayed in his turn:
 "Hear me now too, child of Zeus, unwearying one!
 Accompany me as you once did my father, noble Tydeus, 285 to Thēbē, when he went there as the Achaians' envoy: them—the bronze-corseleted Achaians—he left beside the Asōpos while he carried a friendly message to the Kadmeians in Thēbē; but while returning he did some fearsome deeds with you, bright goddess: you were ready to stand at his side. 290
 So now stand willingly by me too, and protect me, and to you I'll sacrifice in return a yearling heifer,

2. It was "common epic practice to identify an object by its history," Hainsworth observes (180–81); cf. Agamemnon's scepter (2.101–8) and Megēs' corselet (15.529–34). The convention of the guest-gift tended to keep valuable objects circulating in the heroic world. The boar's tusk helmet (one example survives) was a genuine early Bronze Age item, which later fell out of use.

broad-browed, unbroken, that no man's yet brought under the yoke: I'll offer her up to you, horns sheathed in gold."

Such were their prayers, and Pallas Athênē heard them; 295 and when they'd finished praying to great Zeus's daughter, they set off like two lions through the black night, amidst the carnage and corpses, through the war gear, the black blood.

Nor were the proud Trojans left to sleep undisturbed by Hektōr; he summoned the best of them in a body, 300 all those that were leaders and overlords of the Trojans, and when he had them assembled he outlined a smart plan:
"Who'll take on a task for me, and carry it out for a big reward, his recompense guaranteed?
I'll present a chariot and a pair of high-necked horses— 305
the best there are around the ships of the Achaians—to anyone who'll dare—and win himself glory, too—to steal up to those swift-sailing ships, and find out for us if said swift ships are still being guarded as in the past, or if, after taking a drubbing from us, these people 310 are planning amongst themselves to pull out, and don't now care to keep watch all night, worn out by all their toil."

So he spoke, and they all became quiet and silent. Now among the Trojans there was one Dolōn, a son of Eumēdēs the sacred herald, a man of much gold, much bronze, 315 and ugly to look at, but nevertheless a swift runner, the only son of the family, among five sisters.

He it was who now addressed the Trojans and Hektōr:
"Hektōr, my heart and my proud spirit urge me to steal up to those swift-sailing ships, find out about them. 320 But come, raise your scepter before me, swear me an oath that you'll truly give me these horses, this bronze-inlaid chariot, that now carry Pēleus's peerless son!
And for you I'll be no idle scout, nor fail your expectations, since I'll make straight for the camp, until I reach 325 Agamemnōn's ship, where I guess the leaders will be deciding in council whether to pull out, or fight."

So he spoke: Hektōr held up the scepter and swore to him:
"Let Zeus himself, Hērē's loud-thundering spouse, bear witness that no other Trojan man shall mount behind those horses, but you, I declare, will have the joy of them for ever.” 330

So he spoke, and swore: a vain oath, but it heartened Dolōn.
At once he slung over his shoulders his back-bent bow, and above that draped the skin of a grey wolf, donned a marten-skin cap, and took a sharp javelin, 335 and moved off towards the ships from the camp, but was never to return from the ships, or bring back word to Hektōr.
So when he left behind him the throng of men and horses he pressed eagerly on his way, but was noticed approaching by Odysseus, scion of Zeus, who then spoke to Diomēdēs: 340 “Here’s some man, Diomēdēs, coming out from the camp—
I don’t know whether he’s planning to spy on our ships, or means to rob one of these battlefield corpses. We should first let him get a little ahead of us on the plain, and then we can make a quick rush and pounce upon him; 345 but if he’s quick on his feet, and outruns us both, then keep herding him with your spear towards the ships, well away from the camp—don’t let him somehow escape to the city!”

That said, they both left the path, lay down among the cadavers, and in his folly Dolōn ran quickly past them. 350
When he’d gone as far beyond them as the range of a mule plowing—and they’re far preferable to oxen for drawing the jointed plow through deep and fallow ground—then they both went after him. He, on hearing their footsteps, stopped, hoping that they were comrades come from Troy 355 to turn him back, that Hektōr had ordered his withdrawal.
But when they were distant a spear’s throw, or even less, he knew them for enemy warriors, moved his swift limbs into precipitous flight. They at once set off after him.
As when two keen-fanged hounds, well-practiced hunters, 360 sprint close in on the heels of a doe or hare through some wooded tract, and it runs screaming from them, so now did Tydeus’s son and Odysseus the city-sacker in their close relentless pursuit cut him off from his people.
But when he was on the point of coming among the sentries 365 as he fled toward the ships, then Athēnē put force into Tydeus’s son, so that no bronze-corseleted Achaian might boast of being first to hit Dolōn, leaving Tydeus’s son behind.

Rushing on him with his spear strong Diomēdēs cried: “Stop, or my spear will nail you! Then, believe you me, you’d not long escape sheer destruction at my hands.” 370

With that he let fly his spear, but deliberately missed: above Dolōn’s right shoulder passed the polished spear’s keen point, and stuck fast in the ground. He froze, stood there terrified, stammering. In his mouth the teeth began to chatter, 375 he turned pale with fright. Panting, the two came up and caught hold of his arms. He burst into tears and cried: “Take me alive! I can ransom myself! Back home there’s stored bronze, gold, and iron worked with much toil: from these
my father would gladly pay you ransom past counting 380
should he learn I am still alive by the Achaians’ ships.”

Then in answer to him resourceful Odysseus said:
“Take heart, remove the idea of death from your mind!
Now come, tell me this, and give me a true account:
Where are you off to, alone, from your camp, towards the ships, 385 in the dark night, when other mortals are sleeping?
Would it be to strip the gear from one of these dead men?
Did Hektōr send you out to discover what was afoot by the hollow ships? Or was it some impulse of your own?”

To him then Dolōn replied, legs trembling beneath him: 390 “My mind was seduced by all Hektōr’s deceptive tricks—the whole-hoofed horses of Pēleus’s lordly son he promised me, along with his bronze-inlaid chariot, and told me to make my way through the swift dark night, steal up to the enemy troops, and find out whether 395
the swift ships are still being guarded as in the past, or if, after taking a drubbing from us, these people are planning amongst themselves to pull out, and don’t care to keep watch all night, worn down by all their toil.”

Then, smiling at him, resourceful Odysseus replied: 400 “To great rewards indeed did your heart aspire—the horses of the warrior grandson of Aiaikos! But they’re a hard challenge for mortals to master or drive, excepting only Achilles—and he was born of an immortal mother.
But come now, tell me this, and give me a true account: 405
Where, just before coming here, did you leave Hektōr, his people's shepherd? Where's his battle gear, where his horses?

 How are the Trojans' watches arranged? Where do they sleep?
 And what are they planning among themselves? Do they intend to remain out here by the ships, or will they withdraw 410 back to the city, now that they've defeated the Achaians?"

Then Dolōn son of Eumēdēs answered him thus:
 "Very well, I'll give you a true account of these things.
 Hektōr, together with all his advisers, is holding a council beside the tomb of Ilos the godlike, 415 well away from the din. But as for the sentries, hero, you ask about, no special guard watches over the camp.
 By every Trojan watch fire there are those who must stay awake themselves, and order one another to keep the watch; but the allies, fetched in from many countries, 420 are all asleep—they leave guard duty to the Trojans, seeing that their own wives and children are nowhere near."

In answer to him resourceful Odysseus now asked:
 "Where are they now? Do they sleep by the Trojan horse breakers, or somewhere apart? Tell me clearly, I need to know." 425

Then Dolōn son of Eumēdēs answered him thus:
 "Yes, I'll give you a true account of these things also.
 Down by the sea lie the Karians, the bent-bowed Païōnians, the Leleges, the Kaukōnes, and the noble Pelasgians; the Lycians and proud Mysians occupy a site towards Thymbrē, 430 with the Phrygian chariot fighters and Maiōnian horse marshals.
 But why do you question me about all these matters?
 If you're so hot to get in among the Trojan forces, here, off apart, just arrived, beyond the rest, are the Thracians, and with them Rhēsos, their king, son of Eioneus. 435

His horses are the finest and largest that ever I saw:
 They're whiter than snow, and run as fast as the winds.
 His chariot's skillfully inlaid with gold and silver, and gold's the huge battle gear he arrived in, a marvel to look at—such armor this as should never even be worn 440 by us mere mortals, but only by the immortal gods!
 And now either take me with you to the swift-travelling ships, or truss me up firmly and leave me here while you go and make trial of my information, find out whether or not what I've told you is accurate."

Then with a stern glance 445 Powerful Diomēdēs addressed him in these words: "Dolōn,
 "I tell you, nurse no thoughts of escape in your heart, though you've told us useful facts since you came into our hands.
 For if we release you for ransom, or let you go free now, you'll make your way back later to the Achaians' swift ships, 450 either, again, as a spy, or fight in the open against us; but if, overcome by my hands, you give up your life, never again will you make any trouble to the Argives."

At that, Dolōn tried to touch his chin with one stout hand and implore him, but Diomēdēs came at him with his sword 455 and hit his neck squarely, slashing through both sinews, and while he still spoke his head fell in the dust.
 Then they took the marten-skin cap from his head, along with the wolf's pelt, the back-bent bow, and the long spear, and these things to Athēnē the spoil-driver noble Odysseus 460 lifted high in his hand and prayed, addressing her thus:
 "Hail, goddess! These are for you. On you, first of all, we'll call, of all the immortals up on Olympos! Now help us once more, guide us towards the Thracians' horses and sleeping quarters."

So he spoke, and raised high the spoils, and hung them up 465 on a tamarisk bush, and made a conspicuous marker beside them, bundling up reeds and leafy tamarisk branches, so as not to miss the spot coming back through the swift black night.
 Then they both went on, through the war gear, the black blood, and quickly arrived at the Thracian warriors' post. 470 These they found sleeping, exhausted, with their fine battle gear neatly piled on the ground beside them, all in order, in three rows, and by each man was his yoke of horses.
 Rhēsos slept in their midst, and close to him his swift horses were hitched by their reins to the top of the chariot rail. 475 Odysseus saw him first, pointed him out to Diomēdēs:
 "That's the man, Diomēdēs, and those are his horses—as Dolōn described to us, he whom we just slew!
 Come on, then: use your great strength, don't stand around idly, not using your weapons! Untether the horses— 480 or else I'll see to the horses, you kill the men."

He spoke: into Diomēdēs grey-eyed Athēnē breathed force.
 To and fro he went killing, and hideous groans went up from those struck by his sword: the ground grew red with blood.
 Just as a lion comes upon unshepherded flocks, 485 sheep or goats, and with grim intent springs at them, so at these Thracian warriors went the son of Tydeus till he'd slain a dozen. But resourceful Odysseus, each time that Tydeus's son squared up and used his sword, came from behind and, catching the corpse by one foot, 490 dragged it aside, concerned that the fine-maned horses should have easy passage through, and not take fright from treading upon dead men, being as yet unused to them.
 When the son of Tydeus came to the Thracian king, this was the thirteenth man that he robbed of honey-sweet life, 495 gasping, because a bad dream stood over his head that night:
 the grandson of Oineus, brought there by Athēnē's wiles.³ Now steadfast Odysseus untethered the whole-hoofed horses, used their reins to tie them together, drove them out of the camp, whipping them with his bow, because he hadn't remembered 500 to grab himself the bright whip from the inlaid chariot.
 Now he whistled, giving a signal to noble Diomēdēs, who, still back there, was debating the most outrageous action he could perform: take the chariot, with its inlaid war gear?
 Haul it out by its pole? Or heft it and carry it? Or 505 should he rather take the lives of still more Thracians?
 While he was debating all this in his mind, Athēnē came up, stood close, and spoke thus to noble Diomēdēs:
 "Think about your return now, great-hearted son of Tydeus, to the hollow ships, lest maybe in headlong flight you come there, 510 if it chance that some other god should awaken the Trojans."

So she spoke, and he knew it for the voice of a goddess, and quickly mounted. Odysseus slashed the horses with his bow, and they flew on their way towards the Achaians' swift ships.

But no blind watch was that kept by silver-bowed Apollo: 515 he sighted Athēnē attending to Tydeus's son: enraged against her he went down into the great mass of the Trojans,

3. Oineus's grandson, of course, was Diomēdēs himself: thus the bad dream became a horrific reality.

and woke one of the Thracians' counselors, Hippokoön, a noble cousin of Rhēsos. He started up from sleep, and when he saw the bare space where their swift steeds had been, 520 and men gasping their last amid that bloody shambles, then he groaned aloud, and called his dear comrade by name, and the Trojans, clamoring loudly, in boundless confusion, came crowding round, to stare at all the horrific deeds done by those men before they returned to the hollow ships. 525

But when they got back to where they'd killed off Hektōr's spy, then Odysseus, dear to Zeus, reined in the swift horses, while Tydeus's son jumped down, seized the bloodstained spoils to place in Odysseus's hands, and then remounted.
 He whipped the horses, and they, nothing loath, sped on 530 [to the hollow ships, where their hearts desired to be.]⁴
 First to catch the sound of their hoofbeats was Nestōr. He exclaimed:
 "My friends, leaders and rulers of the Argives, am I mistaken, or right? My heart bids me speak!
 The hoofbeats of galloping horses beat on my ears! 535
 How I hope that this is Odysseus and powerful Diomēdēs back from among the Trojans, driving whole-hoofed steeds—yet I dreadfully fear in my heart that they've suffered some hurt, these valiant Argives, caught in turmoil with the Trojans."

The words were not out of his mouth when the two arrived, 540 and stepped down onto the ground, while the rest, rejoicing, greeted them with handshakes and words of welcome.
 Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman, was the first to question them:
 "Come, tell me, storied Odysseus, great glory of the Achaians, how you two took these horses—by confronting the mass 545 of the Trojan army? Or did you encounter some god who gave them you? They're amazing, like the rays of the sun!
 I've long been fighting Trojans—and I can assure you I don't hang back by the ships, old warrior though I am—but never yet have I seen, or imagined, such horses! So, 550
 I do think it must be a god that met you, gave you them, since both of you are loved by Zeus the cloud-gatherer, and the daughter of Zeus of the aegis, grey-eyed Athēnē."

4. Some MSS omit this formulaic line as being an interpolation here: why should Rhēsos's Thracian horses long to be among the Greek ships?

In answer to him resourceful Odysseus now declared: “Nestōr, Nēleus’s son, great glory of the Achaians, 555 easily could a god, if he wanted, have given us even better horses than these, since gods are far mightier than us.
 No, these horses, old sir, about which you’re enquiring, are Thracian, new arrivals; brave Diomēdēs slew their king, with his comrades—twelve in all, and those the best! 560
 The thirteenth man was a scout we caught near the ships, who’d been sent out as an observer to spy on our camp by Hektōr and the rest of the noble Trojans.”

That said,

across the ditch he then drove the whole-hoofed horses, laughing, and happily with him went the other Achaians. 565
 When they came to the strong-built hut of Tydeus’s son, the horses they tethered by their fine-cut leather reins at the same manger where Diomēdēs’ own swift-footed horses stood, munching away at honey-sweet grain; and on the stern of his ship Odysseus set Dolōn’s bloodstained spoils, 570 to be prepared as a sacred offering to Athēnē.
 Then they plunged in the sea, wiped off the abundant sweat that had gathered upon their shins and necks and thighs; and when the waves of the sea had washed away all that sweat from their skin, and their hearts were refreshed, then they went 575 and climbed into polished bathtubs and bathed themselves.
 Having bathed, they massaged their bodies with oil, and then sat down to a meal and from the full mixing bowl drew honey-sweet wine to make their offering to Athēnē.

Book 11

Now Dawn from her bed at the side of noble Tithōnos rose up, to bring light to immortals and humankind; and to the Achaians' swift ships Zeus now sent out Strife—that baneful spirit—cradling a portent of war in her hands.¹ She stopped by Odysseus's ship, black and deep-hulled, 5
that lay halfway along, so a shout could reach either end, could be heard at the huts both of Aias, Telamōn's son, and those of Achilles—the two who had drawn up their trim ships furthest away, relying on their prowess, their hands' strength.
The goddess stood there and uttered a loud and terrible cry, 10 shrilly, infusing great strength into every Achaian's heart, to engage in unceasing warfare and battle; so that to them, at once, war now became much sweeter than going back in their hollow ships to their own dear country.

Atreus's son roared his command to the Argives to gird themselves, 15 and himself amongst them now donned the gleaming bronze.
His greaves first he fastened on about his shins—finely made, and fitted with silver ankle-pieces.
Next, to cover his chest, he put on his corselet, the one he'd received as a guest-gift from Kinyras, who had 20 heard the great news on Cyprus, that the Achaians were about to make the voyage to Troy in their ships, and so sent him this present, to seek favor with the king.
On it were ten bands of darkest cobalt enamel, along with twelve of gold and twenty of tin, 25 and dark cobalt serpents writhing up towards the neck, three on each side, like the rainbows that Kronos's son sets in the clouds, as a portent for humankind.
Then about his shoulders he settled his sword, and on it the studs gleamed golden, while the scabbard that held it 30 was made of silver, and fitted with golden chains.

1. "[W]hat Eris [Strife] held in her hands it is impossible to say and perhaps was never precisely conceived. . . . Like her war-shout it is the more awesome for being vague," as Hainsworth says (214).

Next he hefted his fine shield—all-protective, richly inlaid, battle-hungry: around it ran ten bands of bronze, and on it were set twenty bosses fashioned of tin, gleaming white, and a single central one of dark cobalt, 35 encircling the Gorgon, with her menacing features, glaring horribly, flanked by Terror and Panic;
 from the shield hung a silvered baldric, and upon it writhed a dark cobalt serpent, that had three heads turned in different directions, yet growing from one neck. 40 Then he put on his leather helmet, double-bossed, quadruple-plated, with its horsehair crest nodding terribly above it,
 and picked out two strong spears, each tipped with bronze, and sharp: the gleam of the bronze shone from him to high heaven, and Athēnē and Hērē sent the thunder pealing 45 in salute to the king of great and golden Mykēnai.

And now to his own charioteer each man gave orders to hold his horses in place, in good order, there by the ditch, while they themselves, on foot, arrayed in their battle gear, charged. An unquenchable clamor filled the early morning 50 as they got in line by the ditch ahead of their charioteers, who advanced a little behind them. This fearsome uproar was stirred up amongst them by Kronos's son: from the heights of the airy sky he sent down raindrops dripping with blood, a sign of all the brave heads he'd soon dispatch to Hādēs. 55

The Trojans on their side, on the rise of the plain, were drawn up around great Hektōr and peerless Poulydamas, and Aineias, who was honored like a god by the Trojan people, and Antēnōr's three sons, Polybos and noble Agēnōr and youthful Akamas, in appearance like the immortals. 60 Hektōr among the foremost bore his well-balanced shield:
 like the baleful star that from among the clouds emerges, a bright point, soon lost again behind those shadowy clouds, so Hektōr kept appearing, now out among the foremost, now in the rear, giving orders. Clad all in bronze, 65 he shone like the lightnings of Zeus, the aegis-bearer.

So they, like rows of reapers confronting one another who drive their line ahead through a wealthy man's field of wheat or barley, and the swathes fall thick and fast, so Trojans and Achaians both came charging forward, 70 cutting down men: neither side gave a thought to fatal flight, but stayed head to head in the struggle, attacked like wolves, and Strife, that great misery-maker, watched in delight.

 Alone of the gods she was there among them as they struggled;
 the other gods were not present, but sitting apart, uninvolved, 75 in their own halls—where, for each one of them, along the folds of Olympos, a fine house had been set up—all blaming the lord of the storm clouds, Kronos's son, because he was minded now to give glory to the Trojans.
 But the Father paid them no heed: he'd moved away, 80 and was sitting apart from the others, exultant in his glory, staring out at the Trojans' city, the ships of the Achaians, the glinting of bronze, the killed and those killing them.

While it was morning still, with the sacred light brightening, both sides' shots struck home, and men dropped, hit; 85 but at the hour when a woodcutter gets out his meal, in some mountain glen, when hands and arms are weary from felling tall trees, and exhaustion quells his spirit, and a longing for tasty food invades his mind, then it was that the Danaäns by their valor broke through the battle line, 90 cheering their comrades along the ranks. Here Agamemnōn was first to charge: he took out Biēnōr, shepherd of men, and, next, his comrade Oileus, whipper of horses, who'd sprung down from his chariot to confront him, and, charging, was hit in the forehead by Agamemnōn's 95 sharp spear: his bronze-laden headpiece failed to block it, through metal and bone it drove, mashing up as it went all the brain inside. It stopped his charge stone-dead.
 Agamemnōn, king of men, left these two prostrate there, bare torsos white, when he'd stripped them, tunics and all, 100 and pressed on then to slaughter Isos and Antiphos two sons of Priam, one bastard, the other from wedlock, both in one chariot: of whom the bastard was driver, while famed Antiphos stood beside him. These two Achilles, among the foothills of Ida, once trussed up with pliant willow 105 after catching them herding their sheep, let them go for a ransom.
 But now the son of Atreus, wide-ruling Agamemnōn, speared Isos in the chest, up over the nipple, slashed Antiphos close by his ear, knocked him off the chariot;

then, hastening to strip both of their fine gear, recognized 110 who they were: he'd already seen them, by the swift ships, when fleet-footed Achilles brought them in from Ida.

As a lion that catches a speedy hind's young fawns easily crunches them up, when it gets its strong teeth on them, after breaking into their den, rips out their tender hearts, 115 and their mother, even though near, remains unable to protect them, since over her too come fearful tremors, and quickly she runs away through dense thickets and woodland, sweating in haste to avoid the mighty beast's attack—so not one of the Trojans was able to ward off death 120 from these two, being themselves in flight before the Argives.

Next for him were Peisandros and steadfast Hippolochos, the sons of shrewd Antimachos, who'd been the firmest—since he'd taken Paris's gold, splendid presents—in refusing to let them give Helen back to fair-haired Menelaös. 125

It was his two sons that the lord Agamemnōn now captured, in the same chariot, both trying to manage their swift horses, for the shining reins had slipped from their hands, and the team was bolting; but Atreus's son went against them like a lion, and they from the chariot now begged him: "Take us alive, 130 son of Atreus! You'll get a worthy ransom for us!

There are treasures in plenty stored up in Antimachos's house—bronze, gold, and iron worked with much toil: from these our father would gladly pay you ransom past counting should he learn we are still alive by the Achaians' ships." 135

So these two, weeping, addressed themselves to the king with honeyed words, but no honey was in the reply they heard:
"If you indeed are the sons of that same shrewd Antimachos, who, in the Trojans' assembly, recommended that Menelaös—who'd come there on an embassy with godlike Odysseus— 140 should be killed on the spot, not let go back to the Achaians, then you'll pay the price now for your father's vile behavior."

That said, he forced Peisandros out of his chariot with a spear-thrust to the chest: thrown, he lay prostrate.
Hippolochos sprang down, and him he killed on the ground, 145 severed both arms with his sword, slashed through his neck, sent his torso off through the ranks like a roller. These two he left now, and where the disorderly rout was thickest, there he charged in, and with him other well-greaved Achaians.

 Footmen were killing those footmen forced into flight 150 and horsemen horsemen: beneath them there rose from the plain the dust stirred up by their horses' thundering hooves as they dealt death with the bronze. And the lord Agamemnōn, ever killing, followed the rout, urging on the Argives:
 and as when devouring fire falls upon unthinned woodland, 155 and a roiling wind spreads it everywhere, and thickets are consumed down to their roots by its blazing onslaught, so before Atreus's son Agamemnōn went down the proud heads of fleeing Trojans, and many the proud-necked horses that rattled their empty chariots across the battlefield, 160 lacking their peerless drivers, who lay there on the ground, far more attractive by now to vultures than to their wives.

Zeus was drawing Hektōr away from the missiles, the dust, the blood, the confused uproar, and the slaughter of men;
 and Atreus's son followed, loudly urging the Danaāns on. 165 Past the burial mound of old Ilos, Dardanos's son, across the mid-plain, by the wild fig tree they panted, pressing on to the city, with Atreus's son at their heels, in full cry, his invincible hands besmeared with bloody filth.
 But when they reached the Skaian Gates and the oak tree, 170
 there the Trojans halted, stood waiting for one another.
 Some were out in the plain still, stampeding like cattle that a lion has routed, coming on them at dead of night—all except one cow, and for her sheer destruction is manifest:
 when she's caught, first he breaks her neck with his powerful 175 fangs, then gulps down her blood, along with all her innards.
 Just so did the lord Agamemnōn, Atreus's son, press hard on the routed Trojans, kept killing the hindmost as they fled.
 Many were thrust from their chariots, prone or supine, by Atreus's son's hands, as he raged all around him with his spear. 180
 But when he'd near got in beneath the city and its towering ramparts, then it was that the Father of men and gods seated himself on the peaks of spring-rich Ida, coming down from the heavens, a thunderbolt in his hands, and sent off golden-winged Iris to deliver a message: 185 “Go now, swift Iris, convey this charge to Hektōr: so long as he sees Agamemnōn, the people’s shepherd, ranging among the front-line fighters, cutting down the ranks of men, he’s to hold back himself, while urging the rest of his troops to battle the enemy in the grinding conflict. But when, 190 either spear-struck or shot with an arrow, Agamemnōn takes to his chariot, then I shall guarantee to Hektōr the strength to go on killing till he reaches the well-benched ships, and the sun goes down, and sacred darkness comes on.”

So he spoke: wind-footed swift Iris did not ignore him, 195 but went down from the heights of Ida to sacred Ilion, and found wise Priam’s son, illustrious Hektōr, standing behind his horses in his dovetailed chariot.
 Swift-footed Iris came up beside him and said:
 “Hektōr, son of Priam, Zeus’s equal in counsel, 200
 Zeus the Father has sent me to give you this message:
 So long as you see Agamemnōn, the people’s shepherd, ranging
 among the front-line fighters, cutting down the ranks of men, you’re to hold back yourself, but should urge the rest of your troops to battle the enemy in the grinding conflict. But when, 205 either spear-struck or shot with an arrow, Agamemnōn takes to his chariot, then Zeus will guarantee you the strength to go on killing till you reach the well-benched ships, and the sun goes down, and sacred darkness comes on.”

That said, swift-footed Iris went on her way, and Hektōr 210 leapt to the ground from the chariot in his battle-gear, brandishing two sharp spears, and ranged widely through the ranks, urging them on to fight, stirred up the clash of battle.
 So they rallied, stood firm, confronting the Achaians, and the Argives opposite them now strengthened their ranks, 215 and the battle was set. They stood face to face. Agamemnōn was the first to charge, mind set on fighting ahead of them all.

Tell me now, Muses, you who have your homes on Olympos, who was it first came forward to stand against Agamemnōn, of the Trojans themselves, or of their far-famed allies? 220 Iphidamas son of Antēnōr, a valiant man and tall, who was brought up in rich-soiled Thrace, the mother of flocks: Kissēs reared him at home while he was still a small child—his mother's father, who sired the fair-cheeked Theanō.

 But when he reached the milestone of glorious youth, 225 Kissēs, to keep him there, gave him his daughter; yet from the bridal chamber he went seeking glory from the Achaians, with twelve curved ships that accompanied him. Now these trim vessels he later abandoned at Perkōtē, and himself continued, on foot, his journey to Ilion. 230
 He now came out to face Agamemnōn son of Atreus.
 When they'd advanced to within close range of one another, Atreus's son threw and missed, his spear going wide, but Iphidamas hit on his baldric below the corselet, put all his weight into the thrust, trusting his strong hand, 235 yet failed to pierce the bright baldric: far short of that his spear-point struck against silver, was bent like lead.
 Then seizing it in one hand wide-ruling Agamemnōn dragged it toward him, mad as a lion, and wrenched it out of Iphidamas's grasp, slashed his neck with his sword, 240 unstrung his limbs. So he fell, and slept the sleep of bronze, wretched youth, helping his countrymen, far from his wife, the bride that he'd had no joy of, much though he'd paid for her:
 a hundred oxen he first gave, then promised a thousand goats and sheep from the countless flocks herded for him. 245
 But now Atreus's son Agamemnōn stripped his body and went back among the Achaians with his fine battle gear.

 When Koön—distinguished warrior, Antēnōr's eldest son—caught sight of him, huge overpowering grief blinded his eyes for the sake of his fallen brother. 250
 Up on one side he came, with his spear, unseen by noble Agamemnōn, and pierced his mid-arm below the elbow.
 The point of the bright spear went clean through his arm, and at that the lord of men, Agamemnōn, shuddered;
 yet not even so did he break off from battle and warfare, 255 but sprang upon Koön, wind-toughened spear² in hand.
 Now Koön had seized Iphidamas, his brother, his father's son, by one foot, was dragging him off, and appealing to all the bravest;
 but then, as he dragged him, right under his bossed shield

2. The epithet "wind-toughened" (ἀνεμοτρεφής, anemotrophēs) puzzled ancient scholars: the consensus was that trees buffeted by the winds yielded tougher timber, and irrespective of the truth of the assumption, this seems the likeliest explanation.

Agamemnōn thrust his bronze spear tip, unstrung his limbs, 260 stepped close, and cut off his head, right over Iphidamas.
 So there both Antēnōr's sons met their destined fate at the hands of the king, Atreus's son, and went down to the house of Hādēs.

Agamemnōn continued to range up and down the Trojan ranks with spear and sword and great stones,³ just as long as the blood 265 still flowed warm from his wound; but from the moment the wound started drying up, and the flow of blood ceased, sharp pains began to weaken the powers of Atreus's son;
 just as a keen dart targets any woman in labor—the piercing pains sent by the Eileithyai, spirits of hard childbirth, 270 Hērē's daughters, who have bitter birth-pangs in their keeping—so sharp pains began to weaken the powers of Atreus's son.
 Now he climbed up into his chariot, ordered his driver to make for the hollow ships, since his heart was heavy-laden;
 and in a carrying voice he called out to the Danaāns: 275
 “My friends, leaders and rulers of the Argives, it's up to you now to keep far from our seagoing vessels the grievous business of fighting, since Zeus the counselor will not allow me to war all day long against the Trojans.”

So he spoke, and his driver whipped the fine-maned horses 280 towards the hollow ships, and they, nothing loath, sped off:
 foam splattered their chests, dust coated their underbellies as they bore the afflicted king away from the fighting.

When Hektōr became aware of Agamemnōn's withdrawal he called out in a carrying voice to the Trojans and Lycians: 285 “Trojans! Lycians! You Dardanian front-line fighters!
 Be men now, my friends! Remember your fighting spirit!
 Their best man has gone, and to me great glory is granted by Zeus, son of Kronos: now drive your whole-hoofed horses straight for these Danaān battlers, win yourselves still greater glory!” 290

By his words he stirred up each man's force and spirit.
 The way that a hunter sets his white-fanged bloodhounds

3. Lines 265–89 are found in a late third-century B.C.E. papyrus (see Hainsworth 254ff.). Comparison with the standard text shows at least nine extra lines (mostly undecipherable) and some very dubious readings, which, as Hainsworth says, offer “striking testimony to the deterioration of Homer's text in the hands of Hellenistic booksellers” and “show the difficulty, and the necessity, of the work of the Alexandrian scholars.”

in pursuit of a wild boar or lion, just so against the Achaians did Priam's son Hektôr, a match for Arês, killer of mortals, urge on the great-spirited Trojans, and himself advanced, 295 with high resolve, amongst the very foremost fighters, and flung himself into the conflict like some high-gusting storm that swoops down to roil the deep sea's violet waters.

Who then was the first, and who the last, to be slaughtered by Priam's son Hektôr, when Zeus now granted him glory? 300 Asaios first, and then Autonoös and Opitês, and Dolops, Klytios's son, Opheltios, Agelaös, Aisymnos, and Ôros, and steadfast Hipponoös—these were the Danaän leaders he took down, and then he assailed the mass of troops. As when the west wind rolls back the clouds 305 brought by the cleansing south wind, hits them with a deep squall, wave rolls upon swollen wave, and aloft the spindrift is dispersed by the force of the veering wind, so high was the head-count of soldiers now laid low by Hektôr.

Then there would have been havoc, and actions irreparable, 310 and the fleeing Achaians would have fallen, aboard their ships, had not Odysseus called out to Tydeus's son Diomêdês:
 "Tydeus's son, what's made us forget our fighting spirit?
 Come here, stand by me! Shame indeed it will be if bright-helmeted Hektôr gets to capture our vessels." 315

Answering him, strong Diomêdês declared:
 "Indeed I'll remain and stand firm, but all too brief our satisfaction will be, since Zeus the cloud-gatherer surely wants a win for the Trojans rather than for us."

With that he thrust Thymbraios clean out of his chariot, 320 spearing him through his left nipple, while Odysseus took down Molíon, the prince's godlike henchman.
 These then they left, after finishing them as fighters, and both went creating havoc among the ranks: as when two fierce wild boars turn against a pack of hunting dogs, 325 so they turned, attacked, killed Trojans; and the Achaians were glad of a breathing space in their flight from noble Hektôr.

A chariot they caught next, with two warriors in it—the sons of Merôps of Perkôtê, who outstripped all other men in seercraft, and tried to prevent his sons from going off to murderous warfare.⁴ But they flatly refused 330 to obey him: black death's spirits were driving them on.

So now Tydeus's son, the famed spearman Diomēdēs, deprived them of breath and life, took away their fine battle gear, while Hippiodamos and Hypeirochos fell to Odysseus. 335

Then for them Kronos's son stretched the battle taut and even⁵ as he looked down from Ida; and they kept killing one another.
The son of Tydeus wounded Agastrophos with his spear, Paiōn's warrior son, on the hip joint: his horses weren't at hand for him to escape—he, blindly deluded, had left them 340 to be held, some way off, by his henchman, while he on foot charged through the front-line fighters till he lost his life.
But Hektōr soon glimpsed them across the lines, ran at them, whooping aloud, and the ranks of the Trojans followed.
At the sight of him Diomēdēs of the great war cry shuddered, 345
but at once exclaimed to Odysseus, standing beside him: “Here's calamity rolling in on us, it's mighty Hektōr!
Come on, let's make a stand, hang firm here, drive him back!”

With that he poised and let fly his far-shadowing spear, and his cast did not miss, struck home high on Hektōr's head, 350 caught the top of his helmet; but the bronze was stood off by bronze, failed to reach his fine flesh, was stopped by the triple layers of the eyeholed helmet that Phoibos Apollo gave him.
Hektōr backed off a great distance, merged with the throng, fell to his knees and stayed so, one strong hand propped 355 on the ground, and dark night now enveloped his eyes.
But while Tydeus's son was going after the cast of his spear, far beyond the front-line fighters, where it had hit the ground, Hektōr came to again, and reboarded his chariot, drove into the mass of troops, escaped the black death-spirit. 360

-
4. “Seers and priests are popular as fathers of the slain, their disregarded warnings . . . being a ready source of pathos,” Hainsworth says (262). See, e.g., 5.148–51, 13.663–72.
5. There is a clear echo here of the image of Zeus's heavenly scales, used to favor one side or the other: see 8.69–75 and 22.209–14. The weighing was most commonly connected with wool (cf. 12.433–35), regularly checked in households by the housekeeper (tamiē); Zeus in this connection is referred to as the male equivalent (tamias), generally translated as “steward”. The metaphor borrows the most popular social practice for fair adjudication to express an act of completely arbitrary divine authoritarianism. See Onians 408–10.

But strong Diomēdēs with his spear pursued him, shouting: “Once more, dog, you’ve dodged death, though close indeed that evil came to you! But once more Phoibos Apollo saved you, to whom it must be you pray before entering the clash of spears—and for sure, when I meet you later, if there’s any god who’s my helper, I’ll finish you off!
 Meanwhile I’ll go after the others, see whom I can catch.” 365

With that he started to strip the famed spearman, Paion’s son.
 But Aléxandros, the husband of fair-haired Helen, drew his bow upon Tydeus’s son, the shepherd of the people—leaning against the column set up on the mound men raised 370 for Ilos, Dardanos’s son, a folk-elder in former times—as he was pulling off the shining corselet from sturdy Agastrophos’s chest, and the shield from off his shoulders, and his weighty helmet. Paris drew back his arm from the bow 375 and shot. Not in vain did the arrow fly from his hand, but hit Diomēdēs’ right foot, on the flat part: the shaft went through, stuck fast in the ground. Then, with loud laughter, Paris sprang out from his hiding place and shouted boastfully: “You’re hit! Not in vain did my shaft fly! Oh, how I wish 380 I’d caught your nether belly, and taken your life away!
 Then would the Trojans have had some relief from their troubles, who now tremble before you like bleating sheep with a lion.”

To him, quite unafraid, strong Diomēdēs replied: “Bowman, foul-mouthed curser, pretty-locks, ogler of virgins!— 385
 If you’d only make trial of me face to face, wearing armor, then your bow and your showers of arrows would not protect you;
 and even now your boast is just to have scratched my foot!
 I don’t care—it could well have been a daft child or a woman that shot me, so blunt the shafts of a weakling, a nobody! 390 Very different indeed, if it only grazes its target, is the sharp spear sped by my hand: it brings a man instant death, and the cheeks of his widow are torn in grief and mourning, and his children are orphaned, while he reddens the earth with his blood, and rots, more vultures than women round him.” 395

So he spoke, and Odysseus, famous spearman, came up and stood over him while he sat there and pulled out the sharp shaft from his foot, and a flash of agony lanced his flesh.

Diomēdēs then boarded his chariot, ordered his driver to make for the hollow ships, since his heart was heavy-laden. 400

Odysseus, famous spearman, was now alone: not one of the Argives remained with him, since fear had gripped them all,
and deeply stirred he addressed his own proud spirit:
“Ah, what’s to become of me? A black mark if I run for it, scared off by their numbers—and yet much worse if I’m taken, 405 alone, now the rest of the Danaāns have been put to flight by Kronos’s son. Yet why does my heart debate these things?
For this I know well: a coward may walk away from battle, but a first-class fighter is under an obligation to hold his ground, whether striking another, or stricken.” 410

While he pondered these matters in his mind and spirit, the ranks of shield-bearing Trojans advanced, surrounding him on all sides—yet setting up disaster for themselves.
And just as round a boar, dogs and strapping young hunters close eagerly in as he bursts from some deep thicket, 415 sharpening the white tusks set in his curving jaws,⁶ and come at him from all around, and the sound of grinding fangs is heard, but they stand firm, alarming though he is—so now around Odysseus, beloved of Zeus, the Trojans pressed close. But he first wounded peerless Deīopeitēs 420 from above, in the shoulder, springing at him with sharp spear, then cut down Thoōn and Ennomos; after them Chersidas, who’d just jumped down from his chariot, he speared in the navel, striking under his embossed shield, and he fell in the dust, one bent hand clawing the ground. 425
These he left, and then speared Charōps, Hippiasos’s son, full brother of wealthy Sōkos; and Sōkos now, a godlike man, came up to protect him, and stood close in front of Odysseus, and addressed him, saying: “Ah, storied Odysseus, ever hungry for tricks and trouble! 430 Today you’ll either boast over both sons of Hippiasos, having slain two such men, and stripped off their battle gear, or else, struck by my spear, you’ll lose your life.”
So saying,

6. See Leaf, 1: 366–67: “The ancient legend was that the boar prepared for battle by whetting his teeth upon smooth rocks.”

he thrust with piercing force at Odysseus's well-balanced shield:
 through the bright shield his heavy spear went, and through 435
 the richly wrought corselet it drove its path, and severed all the flesh from the ribs; yet Pallas Athēnē did not let it tear in as far as the vitals. Odysseus sensed that the shaft had failed to get through to a fatal spot, so he backed off, and then had this to say to Sōkos: 440
 "Ah, wretch, surely now sheer destruction's on your heels!
 You may have stopped me fighting against the Trojans, but I tell you, death and the black death-spirit will find you, here and today: laid low by my spear you'll give glory to me, and your soul to horse-proud Hādēs." 445

At that Sōkos turned away, preparing to run for it, but as he was in mid-turn Odysseus planted his spear squarely between his shoulders, drove it through to his chest.
 He fell with a thud, and over him noble Odysseus exulted:
 "Ah, Sōkos, son of shrewd Hippiasos, breaker of horses, 450
 the end of death overtook you, you couldn't escape it!
 Wretched man, your father and lady mother will never close your eyes in death now: the flesh-eating birds of prey will tear them out raw, wings beating madly around you—but I, should I die, will get burial from the noble Achaians." 455

So saying, he pulled fierce Sōkos's heavy spear from his flesh and his embossed shield; and when it was out the blood came spurting, sickened him to his heart.
 But when the great-hearted Trojans saw Odysseus's blood, they called through the crush to each other, and all went at him. 460
 So he now drew back, and cried out to his comrades:
 thrice he shouted, as loud as any man's head could compass, and thrice Menelaös the war-lover heard him shout, and at once said to Aias, who was standing near him:
 "Aias, Zeus's scion, son of Telamōn, lord of men, 465 the cry that came to my ears was from steadfast Odysseus—sounding as though he was being overpowered, alone, cut off by the Trojans in the raging conflict!
 Let's get to him through the turmoil: relief's our best answer.
 I fear he may come to harm, left alone among the Trojans, 470 tough though he is, and the Danaäns may suffer a great loss."

That said, he led on: Aias, mortal but godlike, followed.
 They found Odysseus, beloved of Zeus, surrounded by Trojan attackers, like tawny mountain jackals round an antlered stag that's wounded, that some man has hit 475 with a shot off his bowstring. The stag has escaped from him, running swiftly, so long as it has warm blood, responsive knees;
 but when in the end the swift arrow overcomes it, then the flesh-eating jackals rend it, high in the mountains, in a shadowy glen. But some spirit directs against them 480 a ravening lion: the jackals scatter, it scoffs their prey.
 So now round shrewd Odysseus, that man of many wiles, pressed a crowd of valiant Trojans; but the hero, charging out with his spear, fended off the pitiless day.
 Then Aias moved in, hefting up his tower-like shield, 485 and stood at his side. The Trojans scattered, this way and that, and Menelaös the war-lover led Odysseus out of the crush, held by one hand, till his henchman drove up with their chariot.
 But Aias charged the Trojans, taking down Doryklos, a bastard son of Priam, then wounded Pandokos, 490 and went on to wound Lysandros, Pylartēs, and Pyrasos.
 As when a flooded river pours down into the plain in winter spate from the mountains, lashed on by the rains of Zeus, and masses of dried-out driftwood, both oak and pine, come with it, and it discharges much silt into the sea— 495 so now, in disruptive pursuit across the plain, illustrious Aias charged, slaying both horses and men. But Hektör knew nothing of this, was fighting on the battle's far left flank, by the banks of the river Skamandros, where men's heads were dropping thickest, and an unquenchable clamor 500 was going up around great Nestör and warlike Idomeneus.
 Among these Hektör joined battle, was doing grim work with spear and skilled horsemanship, breaking young fighters' ranks.
 Yet no way would the noble Achaians have faltered in their course had not Aléxandros, the husband of fair-haired Helen, 505 cut short the great deeds of Machaön, his people's shepherd, shooting him in the right shoulder with a three-barbed arrow.
 Then, breathing rage, the Achaians were alarmed on his behalf, lest the tide of battle should turn, and he be captured, and at once Idomeneus spoke to noble Nestör, saying: 510
 "Ah, Nestör, son of Nēleus, great glory of the Achaians, be quick, get aboard your chariot, have Machaōn mount beside you, and drive your whole-hoofed steeds to the ships, with all speed, for a healer's worth many ordinary men, being skilled at cutting out arrows and applying soothing herbs." 515

So he spoke, and Nestōr, Gerēnian horsemen, did not ignore him, but quickly boarded his chariot, with Machaōn beside him, the son of Asklēpios, peerless healer.
He whipped the horses, and they, nothing loath, flew on to the hollow ships, where their own hearts yearned to be. 520

Now Kebrionēs saw the Trojans being routed in disorder as he stood at Hektōr's side, and spoke to him, saying:
"Hektōr, while you and I are engaged with the Danaāns here, at the furthest edge of this wretched battle, the rest of the Trojans are fleeing in disorder, themselves and their horses, 525 driven by Aias, Telamōn's son—I know him well by that wide shield slung from his shoulders! We too should take our horses and chariot there, where the conflict is worst, where foot and horse both, competing in dread strife, are killing each other, and raising an unquenchable clamor." 530

So saying, he lashed the fine-maned horses with his whistling whip, and they, in reaction to the stroke, speedily bore the swift chariot among Trojans and Achaians, trampling corpses and shields: all the axle beneath was spattered with blood, and the rails round the chariot, 535 flecked with the flying drops from the horses' hooves and the rims of the wheels. Now Hektōr was straining to leap in and shatter the mass of troops; appalling the turmoil he wrought on the Danaāns, little rest did he give his spear, but ranged to and fro down the ranks of the other fighters 540 with spear and sword and great stones, yet always avoided engaging in combat with Aias, the son of Telamōn [since Zeus was indignant with him when he battled a better man].⁷

Zeus the Father, seated aloft, now stirred terror in Aias:
dazed, his seven-layered oxhide shield slung behind him, 545

7. Line 543 (referred to by both Aristotle and Plutarch) is absent from all medieval MSS and would seem to have been inserted very early in order to satisfy those who were curious as to why the leading attacker, Hektōr, avoided the leading defender, Aias, in defiance of traditional epic etiquette (Hainsworth 282).

he stared nervously at the crowd, like a wild beast, and backed off, often turning around, moving step by slow step. Just as a tawny lion's driven off from their oxen's steading by country folk with their dogs, who won't allow him to get in and seize the fattest steer, who are vigilant 550
 the whole night through—yet he, so desperate for meat, keeps coming, but gets nowhere, has to face a shower of hunting spears flung by strong hands, and blazing firebrands before which, for all his eagerness, he shrinks back, and at dawn goes on his way, his spirit sorry: 555 so Aias, before the Trojans, sorry at heart, gave ground against his will, much afraid for the ships of the Achaians.
 As an ass, passing a wheat field, breaks loose from boys—a stubborn beast, on which many cudgels have been broken—and goes in, and scoffs the ripe grain, and the boys flail at him 560 with cudgels, but their strength's only that of children, and they can barely remove him, even when he's stuffed himself—so now was great Aias, the son of Telamōn, dogged by the arrogant Trojans and their allies from many countries, all thrusting with spears at the center of that great shield of his. 565 Now Aias would be mindful once more of his fighting valor, wheel round and face them, and stand off the advance of the horse-breaking Trojans; and now he would turn and retreat.
 But he halted them all in their march against the swift ships, one man embattled, alone, between Trojans and Achaians, 570 making his stand. Spears came at him from powerful arms:
 some in their forward flight stuck fast in his great shield, and many fell short, never reached his white flesh, yet still yearned, though fixed in the ground, to glut themselves on flesh.

When Euaimōn's splendid son Eurypylos observed him 575 being hard-pressed by showers of missiles, he came up and stood at his side, and cast his own gleaming spear, and hit Phausios's son Apisaōn, shepherd of the people, in the liver, under his midriff, and at once unstrung his knees.
 Eurypylos sprang on him, to strip the gear from his shoulders, 580 but the moment godlike Aléxandros perceived him stripping the gear from Apisaōn, straightway he drew his bow at Eurypylos, hit his right thigh with an arrow, and the arrow's shaft broke off, and his thigh went heavy.

He withdrew to his comrades' company, dodging fate, and in a carrying voice called out to the Danaäns:
 "Friends! Argive leaders and rulers! Stop! Turn back!
 Make a stand! Fight off the pitiless day of doom from Aias, a target for spears now! I hardly think he can survive this rough conflict alone—so stand firm, face the enemy, gather around great Aias, Telamōn's son!"

585

590

So spoke the wounded Eurypylos: they came and stood close beside him, shields lined up against their shoulders, spears couched; and Aias came on, facing them, and turned, and stood, when he reached his comrades' ranks.

595

These, then, were battling on in the likeness of blazing fire; but the mares of Nēleus, sweating, bore Nestōr from the battle, taking with him Machaōn, the shepherd of the people.
 Now he was observed by noble swift-footed Achilles as he stood on the afterdeck of his deep-hulled vessel, watching the burdensome struggle and unhappy rout;
 and at once he spoke to Patroklos, his companion, calling to him from the ship; and he heard, and came out as battle-minded as Arēs: so began his undoing.
 He it was, Menoitios's noble son, who spoke first:
 "Why did you call me, Achilles? What is it you need?"

600

605

In answer to him swift-footed Achilles then said:
 "Noble son of Menoitios, delight of my heart, now, I think, the Achaians will come crowding round my knees, entreating me, now that need past bearing's come upon them!
 But go now, Patroklos, dear to Zeus, and ask Nestōr who this wounded man is that he's bringing from the battle?
 Certainly from behind he looked much like Machaōn, Asklēpios's son, but I didn't see the man's eyes—the horses sped too fast by me, galloping onward."

610

615

So he spoke, and Patroklos obeyed his dear companion, and ran off down the line of the Achaians' huts and ships.

When those others arrived at the hut of Nēleus's son, they themselves dismounted onto the bounteous earth, while old Nestōr's henchman Eurymedōn unyoked his horses from the chariot. They dried off the sweat on their tunics standing to face the breeze from the seashore, then they went into the hut, and sat down on chairs, and for them lovely-tressed Hekamēdē mixed a posset—old Nestōr had taken her from Tenedos when Achilles sacked it, 625 great-hearted Arsinoös's daughter, whom the Achaians chose for him, since he always gave them the best advice.

620

 First she brought out a table and set it before them, a fine one, well polished, its feet enameled in cobalt, and set on it a bronze basket, with an onion as relish 630 for their drink, and pale honey, and sacred barley-meal, with an exquisite cup, that old Nestōr had brought from home, studded with golden rivets. Its handles were ears, four in number; round each a pair of golden doves were feeding: it rested upon a double base. 635 Others needed to strain to hoist this cup from the table when full, yet Nestōr, the old man, raised it without effort.
 In it, for them, this woman resembling the immortals now mixed a posset, grating goat's cheese on Pramnian wine with a bronze grater, and sprinkled white barley meal over it, 640 and when she'd prepared this brew, desired them to try it.
 So when both had drunk, and allayed their parching thirst, they then began chatting, took pleasure in conversation.
 Patroklos, godlike mortal, appeared now, stood at the door, and the old man, seeing him, sprang up from his polished chair, 645 took his hand, led him in, invited him to be seated.
 But Patroklos, for his part, demurred, and thus addressed him:
 "I can't stay, old sir, Zeus's nursling: you won't persuade me.
 Demanding respect, quick to censure is he who sent me to learn who this man is you've brought back wounded. But I 650 know him myself, can see he's Machaōn, the people's shepherd.
 So I'll go back as messenger, bring this word to Achilles.
 Well do you know, old sir, Zeus's nursling, just what kind of fearsome fellow he is—quick to blame even the blameless."

 In answer to him then Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman, said: 655
 "Why is Achilles so sorry for the sons of the Achaians, all those wounded by missiles? He knows nothing at all of the grief that's arisen in camp, now our best warriors are laid up aboard their ships, either shot or speared:
 shot is the son of Tydeus, mighty Diomēdēs, 660
 speared are Odysseus, famed spearman, and Agamemnōn, shot, too, is Eurypylos, with an arrow through his thigh, as well as this man whom I just brought back from the fighting, struck by a shaft from the bowstring. Yet Achilles, brave though he is, neither pities nor cares for the Danaäns— 665 Is he waiting until our swift ships there by the sea, in despite of the Argives, are ablaze with devouring fire, and we ourselves, one by one, are killed? For my strength is not what it once was, when my limbs were supple.

 I wish I were that young now, with all my strength 670 as unimpaired as when we and the Eleans quarreled about cattle-rustling, that time I killed Itymoneus—Hypeirochos's excellent son, who had his home in Ēlis—when driving off beasts in reprisal. While defending his oxen among the foremost, he was hit by a spear from my hand, 675 and fell, and the country folk round him fled in terror.
 So a vast amount of booty we herded out of the plain:
 fifty droves of oxen, as many flocks of sheep, no fewer herds of swine and wide-ranging goats, while of chestnut horses we took one hundred and fifty, 680 all mares, and many with suckling foals. All these we drove at night to Pylos, city of Nēleus, brought them inside the walls, and Nēleus rejoiced at heart that so much had come my way while going to war for the first time.
 And at daybreak heralds made their loud-voiced proclamation 685 that all who were owed a debt in noble Ēlis should now come forward, and the Pylians' leaders gathered together and divided the spoil: the Epeians had debts to many, since we in Pylos were few, and weakened by violence, after Hēraklēs' mighty force had done us outrage 690 in the years before, and all our best men had been killed.
 We sons of peerless Nēleus were twelve in number, of whom I alone was left: all the rest had perished:
 Made arrogant by this, the bronze-corseleted Epeians devised in contempt outrageous acts against us. 695 Now old Nēleus had chosen of oxen a drove, and of sheep a great flock, three hundred in all, and their shepherds too, he being owed a sizable debt in noble Ēlis—four racehorses, prizewinners, along with their chariot.
 They had gone to the games, were due to enter a race 700 for a tripod, but Augeias, king of men, kept them there, and sent back their driver lamenting for his lost horses.

 The old man, infuriated by things both said and done, helped himself to a huge amount, gave the people the rest to divide, so that none should miss out on a fair share. 705

“So we were settling all this, and around the city making sacrifice to the gods; on the third day the Epeians came, in great numbers, they and their whole-hoofed horses all together, and with them, armed, Molos’s two descendants,⁸ still youths, with as yet no knowledge of fighting valor. 710

There’s a city, Thryoessa, a steep site on a hilltop, remote, by the Alpheios, on the marches of sandy Pylos, and this they laid under siege, mad keen to destroy it.

But when they’d scoured all the countryside, Athēnē came to us, by night, rushing down from Olympos, with the message 715 to arm ourselves. Nothing loath was the force she raised in Pylos, but zealously eager to fight. However, Nēleus refused to let me arm myself, and hid away my horses, because, he said, as yet I knew nothing about war’s business.

But even so I stood out among our horsemen, 720 on foot though I was, since thus Athēnē shaped the conflict.

There’s a river, the Minyēios, that flows out into the sea near Arēnē, where we waited for bright Dawn—we, the horsemen of the Pylians—while the foot soldiers’ companies came flowing in. From there, quickly arming ourselves, 725 we made our way at noon to Alpheios’s sacred stream.

There we made fine offerings to all-powerful Zeus, and a bull to Alpheios, a bull also to Poseidōn, but to grey-eyed Athēnē a cow from the herd; and then we took our supper by companies throughout the camp, 730 and lay down to sleep, each man in his battle gear, by the flowing river. Meanwhile the great-spirited Epeians had the city under siege, were mad keen to destroy it; but before that could be, they were faced with war’s mighty action, for when the sun rose radiant over the earth, then we 735 joined battle, making our prayers to Zeus and Athēnē.

At the outset of combat between the Pylians and Achaians

8. The Epeian twins Kteatos and Eurytos were officially sons of Aktōr, in fact of Poseidōn (751); here and at 750 they are, unusually, identified by descent from their maternal grandfather Molos, a member of the Aiōlian royal house.

I was the first to kill my man, get his whole-hoofed horses—Moulios the spearman, Augeias's son-in-law, wed to his eldest daughter, the fair-haired Agamēdē, 740 who knew every medical herb that the wide earth nourishes.
 Him, as he charged me, I stopped with my bronze-tipped spear, and he fell in the dust. I boarded his chariot, took my place with the foremost fighters. The bold Epeians scattered and fled when they saw that the man had fallen 745 who was their horsemen's leader and a first-class warrior.
 I descended upon them then like a dark whirlwind:
 fifty chariots I took, in each of which a couple of warriors bit the dust, laid low by my spear.
 And I'd have killed Aktōr's sons, Molos's two descendants, 750 had not their true father, the wide-ruling Earth-Shaker, wrapped them in heavy mist, and saved them from the battle.
 So there Zeus granted great power to the men of Pylos, for we kept up our pursuit across the far-flung plain, killing the men and collecting their splendid armor, 755 driving our horses as far as Bouprasion's rich wheat fields and the Olēnian rock and the district where stands the hill of Alēsion: there Athēnē turned back our troops, and I slew my last man, and left him, and the Achaians brought their swift horses from Bouprasion back to Pylos, 760 and all extolled Zeus among gods, and, among men, Nestōr.

"Such was I—if truly I ever was—among men. But Achilles alone will have joy of his valor: and I suspect he'll weep bitterly when it's too late, when our men have perished!
 Dear boy, thus indeed it was that Menoitios charged you 765
 that day he sent you out from Phthiē to Agamemnōn—
 we were both in the house there, I and noble Odysseus, and heard it all, just as he told you, every word of it.
 We'd made our way to the well-built home of Pēleus while recruiting an army through richly fertile Achaia, 770 and there in the house we found the hero Menoitios, and you, and Achilles with you. Old Pēleus, the horse-driver, was burning a bull's fat thighs for Zeus the thunderer in his enclosed courtyard, and holding a golden cup to pour the fire-bright wine on the flaming sacrifice. 775 You two were watching the ox meat. We came and stood in the doorway. Achilles leapt to his feet, amazed, clasped our hands, led us in, invited us to be seated, set rich fare before us, a fitting welcome for strangers.

 But when we'd assuaged our desire for food and drink, 780
 I was the first to speak, urged you to follow with us:
 you both agreed, and your fathers both offered much advice.
 Old Pēleus gave this instruction to his son Achilles,
 always to be the best, preeminent over others;
 but you got this exhortation from Menoitios, Aktōr's son: 785
 'My child, in birth Achilles is higher than you are,
 but you are the older, though in strength he far outstrips you.
 It's your job to speak wisely to him, to give him shrewd advice, to guide him; and he'll obey you, to his profit.' Thus did the old man instruct you, but you're forgetful. Yet even 790 now you could talk this way to warlike Achilles, perhaps get his consent. Who knows? With some god's aid you might touch his heart, bring him round: a comrade's persuasion's useful.
 But if in his mind there's some prophecy he's evading—some word from Zeus that his lady mother told him— 795 at least let him send you out, and the rest of the Myrmidon force with you: maybe you'll prove a light to the Danaäns!
 He should give you his splendid armor to wear into battle:
 then the Trojans may take you for him, back off from the fighting, and thus the Achaians' warlike sons, 800 worn out now, may relax: too brief is battle's respite.
 You—fresh, not tired—should easily drive men exhausted by battle back to the city, away from the ships and huts.”

 So speaking, he stirred the spirit in the breast of Patroklos, who now ran back past the ships to Achilles, Aiakos's grandson. 805 But when in his running Patroklos reached the ships of godlike Odysseus—site of assemblies and the tribunal, where they'd also built their altars to serve the gods—there it was he encountered Eurypylos, scion of Zeus, Euaimōn's son, with the arrow-wound in his thigh, 810 limping away from the fighting. The sweat was running down from his shoulders and head, and out of his grievous wound the black blood oozed, yet his mind was still unimpaired.
 At the sight of him Menoitios's valiant son felt pity, groaned aloud, and addressed him with winged words: 815

“Ah, wretched men, you Danaän leaders and rulers, thus it was, then, you were destined, far from friends and homeland,
 with your white fat to glut the scurrying dogs of Troy!
 But tell me this, Eurypylos, you hero, Zeus’s nursling—is there some way for the Achaians to hold back great Hektör, or must they now perish, vanquished by his spear?” 820

Then the wounded Eurypylos made him this answer: “Patroklos, Zeus’s scion, no longer will the Achaians have any defense: they’ll die beside their black ships.
 For indeed all those who before were the best fighters 825 are laid up aboard their vessels, spear-struck or shot with arrows at the hands of the Trojans, whose strength grows ever greater.
 But take care of me now, lead me back to my black ship, cut the arrow out of my thigh, wash the black blood from the wound with water that’s warm, spread it with soothing herbals, 830 those good ones that, they say, you learnt from Achilles, whom Cheirōn taught, the most just of the Centaurs.
 For of the healers we have, Podaleirios and Machaōn, the one, I think, lies wounded here in the huts, himself in need of a peerless healer; the other 835 is out on the plain, awaiting the Trojans’ sharp assault.”

Then the valiant son of Menoitios made him this answer:
 “How can such things be? Lord Eurypylos, what shall we do?
 I’m on my way with a message to warlike Achilles from Gerēnian Nestōr, protector of the Achaians. 840
 But I’ll not, even so, abandon you in your distress.”

With that, one arm round the waist of the people’s shepherd, he led him off to his hut. His henchman saw them, spread oxhides.
 Patroklos made him lie down, with a knife cut out of his thigh the sharp arrow,⁹ washed the black blood from the wound 845 with water that was warm, then applied a bitter root after crushing it up in his hands, a painkiller, that allayed all his pang: the wound began drying, the blood ceased to flow.

9. Thus partially avoiding the agony that Diomēdēs had suffered (396–98) by simply pulling an arrow out of his wound against the barbs.

Book 12

So there, back at the huts, Menoitios's valiant son was tending the wounded Eurypylos; but meanwhile Argives and Trojans were in a massed battle, nor was the Danaäns' trench to save them much longer, or the broad wall above it: the wall they'd made for their ships, and dug the encircling ditch 5
—but without any proper grand sacrifices to the gods—to keep their swift ships and a mass of plunder safe inside its circuit. But since it was built without the approval of the immortal gods, not long did it stay unbreached.
While Hektör still lived and Achilles nursed his wrath 10 and King Priam's city remained unsacked, so long did the great wall of the Achaians also hold firm; but when all the best of the Trojans had lost their lives, many Argives too, some dead, some still surviving, and Priam's city was sacked in the tenth year, and the Argives 15 had gone back in their ships to their own dear fatherland, then it was that Poseidon and Apollo hatched their scheme to level the wall, threw at it the force of all the rivers flowing out from the mountains of Ida to the sea:
Rhēsos and Heptaporos, Karēsos and Rhodios, 20 Granikos, Aisēpos, bright Skamandros, and Simoeis—where there fell in the dust many helmets and oxhide shields, along with a whole generation of half-divine warriors—
the mouths of all these streams Apollo brought together, and for nine days sent this torrent against the wall, while Zeus 25 brought rain without cease, to more quickly plunge the wall in the sea.
The Earth-Shaker meanwhile, trident in hand, himself was the leader: he used the waves to trash all those foundations of logs and stones the Achaians had labored to set in place, made smooth the shore beside the Hellespont's strong current, 30 and, the wall once leveled, decked the great beach once more with sand; then turned the rivers all back to flow in the channels where earlier they'd poured their rapid streams.

Thus were Poseidon and Apollo to act in time to come; but at the moment battle and war's din blazed all about 35 the well-built wall, and the beams of its towers resounded as they took hits, while the Argives, beaten down by Zeus's lash, and held back by their hollow ships, were kept from action through their terror of Hektōr, the mighty deviser of rout, and he, as before, was battling like a whirlwind. 40
 As when, surrounded by dogs and hunters, a wild boar or lion turns at bay, exulting in his strength, while the men form a solid line, and make their stand against him, and they assail him with hunting-spears thick and fast, yet even so his indomitable spirit 45 neither quails nor panics, although his courage can kill him;
 he keeps turning from side to side, making trial of the men's line, and wherever he charges, there the ranks give way—so Hektōr went through the mass exhorting his comrades, urged them on to get over the ditch. But his own horses, 50 fleet though they were, did not dare, stopped dead at the edge neighing loudly: the ditch terrified them by its width, easy neither to jump at one bound nor to drive across, for round its whole circuit the banks on both sides stood overhanging, and up at the top it was planted with sharpened 55 stakes all its length, driven in there by the Achaians' sons—large stakes, set close together, a defense against enemy fighters.
 No horse drawing even a well-wheeled chariot could surmount it with ease, but foot soldiers were hot to try it.
 It was now that Poulydamas came to bold Hektōr, saying: 60
 "Hektōr, and you other leaders of the Trojans and allies, trying to drive our horses over the ditch is senseless—crossing it's really hard, what with those sharp stakes set upright in it, so close to the wall of the Achaians!
 Nor is there any way that charioteers can dismount 65 and fight there: space is cramped, I think we'd get hurt.
 If in his fury against the Achaians high-thundering Zeus intends to wipe them out utterly, really means to aid the Trojans, then for sure, I'd want this to happen immediately—the Achaians perishing here, far from Argos, forgotten. 70
 But if they turn and attack us, drive us back from the ships, and we get tangled up in the ditch they've dug, I think not one of us then would get back to the city, even to bring the news, once the Achaïans had rallied their forces.

Let's all go with my proposal: we should have our henchmen 75 hold the horses in check, by the ditch, while we ourselves, on foot, armed in our battle gear, all in one mass, advance behind Hektôr. Then the Achaïans will not face us, if it's true that death's noose is already fastened on them."

So spoke Poulydamas: his shrewd words gave Hektôr comfort. 80
At once he sprang, armed, from his chariot to the ground, nor did the other Trojans stay gathered behind their horses, but all, when they saw noble Hektôr, themselves dismounted, and each man instructed his personal charioteer to rein back his horses, hold the line there by the ditch, 85 while they regrouped, drew themselves up, and, formed into five companies, followed behind their leaders.

Some went along with Hektôr and peerless Poulydamas—
the biggest group and the best, those most determined to break through the wall and fight by the hollow ships. 90 With these two went Kebrionēs as a third, for by his chariot Hektôr had posted a less-seasoned replacement.
The second group Paris led, with Alkathoös and Agēnōr, and the third was commanded by Helenos and godlike Deïphobos, both Priam's sons: third with them went heroic Asios— 95 Asios, Hyrtakos's son, brought to Troy from Arisbē by his team of big chestnut horses, from the Sellēis river.
Of the fourth group the leader was Anchīsēs' valiant son, Aineias, and with him went the two sons of Antēnōr, Akamas and Archelochos, well trained in all fighting skills. 100
The far-famed allies were led by Sarpēdōn, who had chosen as his fellow commanders Glaukos and warlike Asteropaios, since they seemed to him clearly the best, beyond all others, after himself: but he was first over all. So they lined up, protecting each other with their oxhide shields, 105 and made straight for the Danaäns, eagerly, sure they would not be stood off longer, that now they'd assail them at their black ships.

Then the rest of the Trojans and their far-famed allies acted on the advice of sagacious Poulydamas; but Asios, Hyrtakos's son, that leader of men, refused 110 to abandon his horses along with their driver, his henchman, and set out to drive with them against the swift ships—fool that he was, not destined to escape the foul death-spirits, or, exulting in horses and chariot, to ever return from the ships, ever get back safely to windy Ilion, 115 since too soon his accursed fate was to enfold him through the spear of Idomeneus, Deukaliön's noble son:

 for he charged at the ships' left wing, which was where the Achaians were coming back from the plain with their horses and chariots.
 There it was he drove his own chariot and team: at the entrance 120 he found that the gates weren't shut or the crossbar in place, but men were keeping them open, hoping to rescue any comrades of theirs in flight to the ships from the fighting.
 Straight for this point he drove, and after him followed his troops, yelling loudly, convinced the Achaians would not 125 hold them back any longer, but would fall by their black ships—fools that they were: they found at the gates two first-class fighters, both high-spirited sons of Lapith spearmen, one the son of Peirithoös, powerful Polypoitēs, the other Leonteus, a match for Arēs the killer. 130
 These two stood there in front of the lofty gateway like high-crested oaks in the mountains, that day by day stand up to wind and rainstorms, solidly set on their thick and lengthy roots: this was how they both, trusting the mighty strength of their hands, stood up 135 to great Asios's onslaught, did not flee in panic as the Trojans made straight for the well-built wall, their oxhide shields held high, with loud war cries, gathered around Lord Asios, and Iamenos, Orestēs and Adamas son of Asios, and Thoön and Oinomäos. For a while 140 the Lapiths, from inside the wall, had been urging on the well-greaved Achaians to fight in defense of the ships;
 but when they perceived these Trojans charging the wall, and the noisy confusion and flight of the Danaäns, then they both rushed out and fought in front of the gates, 145 like a pair of wild boars that up in the mountains face the rabble of men and dogs closing in, make sorties from the flank, tearing through the undergrowth around them, ripping it up by the roots, and the sound of their gnashing tusks is loud, till a spear strikes home and robs them of life: 150 such was the clash of bright bronze on the chests of these two taking hits man to man: most valiantly they fought, trusting the troops above them, and their own might.

 Those high up were showering stones from the well-built towers in defense of themselves, and their huts, and their swift ships: 155 thick as snowflakes the stones came plummeting earthward, flakes that a strong gale, driving the shadowy clouds, pours down thick and fast on the richly nurturing earth.
 Like them flew the missiles from these men's hands, both Achaians and Trojans alike, and helmets and bossed shields rang 160 jarringly, when battered by great quern-like stones.
 Then Asios, Hyrtakos's son, groaned, slapping both his thighs in frustrated fury, and cried aloud: "Zeus, Father, it seems you too are a wholehearted lover of lies!
 I never really imagined that these Achaian heroes 165 would be able to hold off our strength, our powerful hands—but like a swarm of fine-waisted wasps or bees that build a nest on some rocky track and refuse to abandon their hollow home and stay in place and fight off, for their offspring's sake, the men on their trail, 170 so these men will not, though there's only the two of them, fall back from the gates while they're killing, or until they are killed."

So he spoke, but his words did not move the mind of Zeus:
 for to Hektôr it was his heart longed to give the glory.

But others were battling it out around the other gates, 175 and hard it would be for me, like a god, to tell the whole tale, for all around the stone wall there arose devouring fire, since the Argives, though distressed, were forced to defend their ships; and the gods, too, were cast down in spirit—all those who were the supporters of the embattled Danaäns. 180
 Now the Lapiths launched themselves into warfare's combat, and the son of Peirithoös, powerful Polypoitēs, speared Damasos through his helmet's cheekpiece of bronze:
 the bronze helmet failed to deflect the spear point: it drove clean through metal and bone, mashing up as it went 185 all the brains inside. It stopped his charge stone-dead.
 Polypoitēs next dispatched both Pylôn and Ormenos, while Leonteus, the son of Antimachos, scion of Arēs, spearèd Hippomachos, striking him through his baldric;

 then, drawing from its scabbard his keen-edged sword 190 he charged through the press and cut down, hand to hand, Antiphatēs first, who slumped to the ground, on his back, then Menōn, Orestēs, Iamenos—all of them he brought down, in quick succession, onto the richly nurturing earth.

While they were stripping these of their shining armor, 195 Poulydamas and Hektōr and the young men following them—
 the biggest group and the best, those most determined to break through the wall and set the ships on fire—were still hesitant, stood uncertain beside the ditch.

They'd been eager to cross it—but then there was this omen, 200
 a high-flying eagle, skirting the army on the left, clutching a huge blood-red serpent in its talons, alive still and struggling: no way had it given up the fight, but reared back and struck at its captor, on the breast, close to the neck, and the eagle dropped it to the ground, 205 agonized by the pain, in the midst of the troops, and then itself, with a scream, winged off on the wind's blast, while the Trojans shuddered at seeing the writhing serpent lying there in their midst, a portent from Zeus of the aegis.

Poulydamas now came up and addressed bold Hektōr: 210
 "Hektōr, you always manage to chide me in assembly, however good my advice. It would not, of course, be proper for a commoner to gainsay you, either in council or in war, but rather always to enhance your authority—despite that, I'll now tell you what seems to me our best course. 215

Let's not go on to fight the Danaäns for their ships, since here is the end I foresee, if it's true that this omen came for the Trojans, so eager to cross the ditch—
 a high-flying eagle, skirting the army on the left, a huge blood-red serpent clutched in his talons, still 220 alive: yet he let it drop before he reached his dear home, and never managed to get it there, or let his young have it—so we, even if we break through the Achaians' gates and wall by our great strength, and the Achaians yield the ground, shall come back from the ships by the same path in disarray, 225 leaving many a Trojan behind, slain by the Achaians with the bronze, in defense of their ships. This is the way a seer would interpret this matter, one with clear knowledge of omens at heart, a man to whom the people listened.”

Scowling darkly, bright-helmeted Hektōr then said: 230 “Poulydamas, what you’re proposing no longer pleases me—you know how to think up a better speech than that!
But if you’re really making this suggestion in earnest, then indeed the gods themselves must have killed your common sense!

You’re telling me to forget loud-thundering Zeus’s 235 own plan, that he promised me, sealed with his assenting nod?
Yet you want me to pay attention to long-winged birds of prey, creatures I neither bother with nor have regard for,
whether they’re flying right, towards dawn and the rising sun, or left, in the direction of night and darkness! Rather 240 let us submit ourselves to the purposes of great Zeus, the ruler over all, both mortals and immortals.

One omen is best, to fight in defense of your country!
Why should you be afraid of warfare and conflict? Even were the rest of us to be slain, to the very last man, 245 at the ships of the Argives, there’s no fear of your dying, since your heart is not a staunch fighter’s, is not battle-minded.
Even so, if you yourself shrink from combat, or persuade some other man with your arguments, turn him against the war, you’ll lose your life at that moment, felled by my spear.” 250

This said, he led the way, and the rest came after him, with a deafening clamor, and Zeus the thunderer whipped up from the mountains of Ida a gale-force wind that blew dust straight at the ships, confused the Achaians’ minds while granting great glory to the Trojans and to Hektōr. 255
So, trusting in his portents and their own strength, they went about breaching the great wall of the Achaians.
They wrenched out the towers’ footings, tore down the breastwork, pried loose the jutting timbers that the Achaians had first embedded in the ground as the towers’ buttresses, 260 and hoped, by dragging these out from the Achaians’ wall to breach it. Yet not even so would the Danaäns give ground, but stuffed the gaps in the breastwork with their oxhide shields, hurling missiles from there at the foemen now nearing the wall.

Both Aiases kept ranging to and fro between the towers, 265 barking out orders, arousing the Achaians' strength and fury.
 One man they'd upbraid gently, another with harsh words—anyone they perceived giving up the fight altogether:
 "Friends, Argives, fighters prominent, middling, or of lesser account—in no way are all men equal 270 in warfare—there's work here for all of you: this I reckon you know yourselves. Let no one turn back to the ships now he's heard these words of encouragement, but press forward, give heart to each other—it may yet be that Olympian Zeus, lord of the lightning, will grant us 275 to stand off this assault, drive our enemies back to the city."

So the two cheered them on, roused the Achaians to battle.
 Just as snowflakes fall thickly on a winter day when Zeus the counselor stirs himself to produce a snowstorm, displaying these arrows of his to mankind, 280 and, stilling the winds, will strew flakes until he's covered the lofty mountain peaks and the headlands' summits, the clovered plains and the fertile plowlands of men, and over the grey sea's harbors and beaches the snow descends, but the waves beat against it, repel it: everything else 285 wears its mantle, when Zeus's snowstorm comes thickly down—just so from both sides the stones flew thick and fast, some at the Trojans, some from the Trojans at the Achaians, hurled back and forth: the whole wall thudded and clattered.

Yet not even then would illustrious Hektōr and the Trojans 290 have breached the wall's gates and long door bolt, had not Zeus the counselor stirred up Sarpēdōn, his own son, against the Argives, like a lion against sleek cattle.
 Straightway he held out before him his well-balanced shield, a fine one, of hammered bronze, that the bronze smith had 295 beaten out, and inside it had stitched oxhides, thickly layered, with golden hasps deployed all round its circumference.
 This he held before him, and brandished his two spears, and set out like some mountain-bred lion that for a long while has been without meat, and his bold spirit drives him on 300 to attack the flocks, even to enter the close-built farmstead: for though there he encounters the herdsmen, who with dogs and spears are setting a guard around the sheep, yet he won't be forced from the steading till he's made his attempt, but either he then springs in and snatches his prey, 305 or is hit, while attacking, by a spear from some quick hand.

 In such wise did his spirit urge godlike Sarpēdōn on to make a rush at the wall, and break down its breastwork.
 At once he spoke to Glaukos, the son of Hippolochos:
 "Glaukos, why is it that we two are honored so highly, 310 get the best places at table, choice meat, cups always full, back in Lycia? Why do all men there look on us like gods?
 We have that vast estate too, by the banks of the Xanthos—fine acres of orchard and good wheat-bearing plowland.
 "That's why we must take our stand among the front-line Lycians, 315 and face up with them to the searing heat of battle, so that Lycia's corseleted soldiers may say this of us:
 "Not short of renown, then, are Lycia's overlords, these kings of ours: they may banquet on fattened sheep, and drink the best honey-sweet wine, but there's also great 320 valor in them—they're out there with Lycia's foremost fighters."
 Ah, my friend, if the two of us could escape from this war, and be both immortal and ageless for all eternity, then neither would I myself be among the foremost fighters nor would I send you out into battle that wins men honor; 325 but now—since come what may the death-spirits around us are myriad, something no mortal can flee or avoid—let's go on, to win ourselves glory, or yield it to others."
 So he spoke. Glaukos neither ignored nor disobeyed him, and both marched straight forward, leading the Lycian horde. 330
 At sight of them Menestheus, son of Peteos, shivered:
 it was his tower they were making for, bringing destruction.
 He looked out down the line of Achaian battlements, in the hope he'd find one of the leaders, to fend off disaster from him and his comrades, and saw the two Aiases, both 335 gluttons for war, standing there, with Teukros beside them, just come from his hut. Yet no way could he make himself heard by shouting, so great was the din: the sound rose up to heaven of blows struck on shields and horsehair-crested helmets, or battering at the gates, all now shut, with the enemy outside 340 up against them, striving to breach them, force their way in.

At once he dispatched to Aias the herald Thoôtēs: “Go, noble Thoôtēs, run, summon Aias back here—both of them, rather: that would be by far the best, for very soon here sheer destruction will be wrought, 345 so hard do the Lycian leaders assail us, who’ve for long been fearsome opponents in these fierce engagements!
 But if for them there too hard fighting has arisen, then at least let one of the Aiases, Telamōn’s valiant son, come over here, and bring Teukros, that skilled archer, with him.” 350
 So he spoke. The herald heard, and did not ignore him, but ran off along the wall of the bronze-corseleted Achaians, and went up to the two Aiases, and quickly said:
 “You Aiases, leaders of the bronze-corseleted Achaians, the dear son of Peteōs, Zeus’s nursling, is insistent 355 that you go to him, if only briefly, to face war’s toil—both of you, for choice, since that would be far the best, since very soon there sheer destruction will be wrought, so hard’s the attack by the Lycian leaders, who’ve long been our fearsome opponents in the raging conflicts! 360
 But if here for you too a crisis in the fighting has arisen, then at least let one Aias, Telamōn’s valiant son, come, and bring Teukros, that skilled archer, with him.”
 So he spoke. Great Aias, Telamōn’s son, took notice, and promptly addressed winged words to the son of Oileus: 365 “Aias, you stay here, with powerful Lykomēdēs, and urge on the Danaāns to fight with all their strength, but I shall go over there, meet the enemy head-on,
 and quickly come back, after I’ve rescued the defenders.”
 So saying, Aias the son of Telamōn departed, 370 and with him Teukros, his brother, son of the same father, and Pandiōn, who was carrying Teukros’s curved bow.
 When they arrived at the tower of great-hearted Menestheus, moving inside the wall, they found men sorely pressed, for all the mighty leaders and rulers of the Lycians 375 were assailing the breastworks like a black tornado, and they clashed head-on in battle, and loud clamor arose.
 Aias the son of Telamōn was the first to kill his man, Sarpēdōn’s comrade, great-spirited Epiklēs—with a great jagged rock he hit him, that was lying inside 380 the wall, by the breastwork, at the top of a heap. No man—such as mortals today are, even those in the prime of youth—could shift it using both hands; but Aias hefted it high and flung it, smashing the plated helmet, crushing in the whole mass of his skull. Like a diver Epiklēs plunged 385 off the high tower: the breath of life fled from his bones.

 Now Teukros hit Glaukos, Hippolochos’s mighty son, as he charged, with an arrow shot from the high wall—caught sight of his bared arm, put him out of the fight.
 Glaukos sprang down from the wall, but discreetly, so no Achaian 390 would see he’d been hit, and boast loudly over him.
 Grief possessed Sarpēdōn over Glaukos’s departure the moment he noticed it; yet he did not neglect the fighting, but with a thrust of his spear pierced Alkmaiōn, Thestōr’s son, and pulled the spear out again. Alkmaiōn followed the spear, 395 fell headlong, his bronze-inlaid armor rattling about him.
 Sarpēdōn seized the breastwork in his powerful hands and pulled. The whole length of it came free, and the wall was laid bare from above: he opened a path for many.

But Aias and Teukros now assailed him at once: the latter 400 with an arrow to the bright baldric that held his protective shield in place over his torso; but Zeus warding off from his son the death-spirits, to stop him being killed at the ships’ sterns.
 Aias sprang at him, thrust at his shield: the spear point failed to go through, but nevertheless stopped his charge. 405 He backed off a bit from the breastwork, yet did not withdraw completely, for his heart was still set on winning glory.
 So, turning around, he called out to the godlike Lycians: “Hey, Lycians, why thus abandon your fighting valor?
 It’s hard for me, strong though I am, to breach this wall 410 single-handed, and open up a path to the ships—so come, join in the attack! The more men, the better the work gets done!”

So he spoke, and they, abashed by the king’s rebuke, pressed on harder around their lord and counselor, while the Argives against them now reinforced their ranks 415 inside the wall. A huge task confronted them both.
 Neither were the strong Lycians able to breach the Danaäns’ wall, and open up a path to the ships, nor yet could the Danaän spearmen ever thrust the Lycians back from the wall, once they'd got up close to it; 420 like two men in a dispute over boundary stones, who hold measuring rods in their hands, on some common plowland, each contending for his fair share of a narrow patch, so did the breastworks keep these men apart, while above them they hacked at the oxhide shields protecting each others' chests, 425 the round shields and the fringed leather bucklers. Many now suffered flesh wounds from thrusts of the pitiless bronze, both when any one of the fighters turned round, exposing his back, while others were speared clean through the shield itself, and all down the line breastworks and towers were splashed 430 with men's blood from both sides, Achaian and Trojan alike.

 Not even so could they bring about panic among the Achaians, who held out—just as an honest woman, a wool-worker, holds her scales, raises the weight and the wool in either pan, till they balance, to earn a paltry sum for her children: 435 so these men's embattled conflict was stretched out, taut and equal, until Zeus granted the greater glory to Hektör, Priam's son, the first to leap down inside the Achaians' wall.
 Now, in a carrying voice, he called out to the Trojans:
 "Up with you, horse-breaker Trojans! Breach the Argives' wall!
 440 Fling your devouring fire in among their vessels!"

So he spoke, urging them on: they all gave ear, charged straight at the wall in a mass, then clambered up on the footings, sharp spears in their hands, while Hektör snatched up and carried a rock that he found lying 445 before the gates: broad-based, but at its top sharp-pointed.
 Not without effort could two ordinary men have heaved it from ground to wagon—the best there were, such as mortals today are—yet he easily lifted it on his own, since the son of Kronos, that devious schemer, 450 lightened it for him. As when a shepherd easily carries a ram's fleece in one hand, its weight a small burden for him, so Hektör hefted the rock and made straight for the beams that framed the close-set and strongly jointed gates—tall double gates, backed inside with a pair of cross-bars 455 made fast with a single bolt. Up he came, stood close, put his whole weight into his throw, hit the gates in the middle—legs spread well apart, so the shot would not lack force—and smashed them out of their sockets. The rock fell inside by its own weight. The gates groaned on either side: 460 the cross-bars failed to hold, the doors were cracked wide open by the rock's force. Illustrious Hektōr leapt through, his face like swift nightfall. He shone in the terrible bronze that he wore on his body, he carried a couple of spears in his hands. None meeting him could have stopped him, 465 none but the gods, once he'd leapt past the gates, and his eyes were ablaze with fire as he whirled about in the crowd and called on the Trojans to climb the wall. They responded to his appeal: at once some scaled the wall, while others streamed in by the well-made gates. The Danaäns fled in panic 470 among their hollow ships, and a ceaseless clamor arose.

Book 13

Zeus, when he'd brought the Trojans and Hektōr to the ships, abandoned them there, to endure toil and suffering without respite, but himself turned his bright eyes away, gazing far off at the lands of the Thracian horsemen, of the Mysian close-quarter fighters, of the noble milk-drinking 5 Hippomolgoi, and of the Abioi, the most righteous of mankind;
but to Troy he longer turned his bright eyes at all, never expecting that any of the immortals would go to the help of either the Danaäns or the Trojans.

But it was no blind watch that the lordly Earth-Shaker kept: 10 no indeed, for he sat marveling at the war and its conflicts, high on the topmost peak of wooded Samothrakē.
From there he had a clear view of the whole of Ida; clear too were Priam's city and the Achaians' ships.
Fresh up from the sea he sat there, full of pity for the Achaians' 15 rout by the Trojans, and in a furious temper with Zeus.

Down he now started at once from the rocky mountain, striding on with brisk footsteps: the high range and the woodlands shook under the tread of Poseidōn's immortal feet.
Three strides he took; with the fourth he reached his goal, 20 Aigai, where lies his famed palace, built in the depths of the water, golden and gleaming, forever imperishable.
Arrived there, he yoked to the chariot his bronze-hoofed horses, his swift-flying pair, with their flowing manes of gold, and clad himself in gold, and flourished his whip— 25 of gold too, finely made—and, mounting his chariot, drove out over the waves. Beneath him sea-beasts gamboled all around, up from the deep—well they knew their lord—and in joy the sea parted before him. His steeds flew on so lightly, the axle of bronze beneath was never wetted, 30 and nimbly bore him across to the ships of the Achaians.

There's a certain wide cavern out there, down in deep water, midway between Tenedos and rugged Imbros. Here

Poseidōn, the Earth-Shaker, reined in his horses, unyoked them from the chariot, tossed them ambrosial fodder 35 to eat, and around their hooves fastened golden hobbles they could neither break nor slip off, to make sure they waited till their lord returned: then he went to the Achaians' camp.

The Trojans, all in one mass, like a flame or a gale blast, were pressing hotly on behind Hektōr, the son of Priam, 40 shouting and yelling together, confident that they'd capture the Achaians' ships, and massacre all the best men there.
 But Poseidōn, the Earth-Shaker, the Earth-Encircler, came up from the salty deep to encourage the Argives, in Kalchas's bodily form, with his untiring voice. 45
 First he addressed the two Aiases, both eager for action:
 "You two now between you can save the Achaian forces, if your minds are set on your prowess, not on chilling rout!
 Nowhere else do I fear the invincible hands of those Trojans who, in a body, have swarmed up our great wall: 50 the well-greaved Achaians will hold them all at bay.
 No, it's here I'm really afraid we may meet disaster—here, where that madman, flame-like, is leading them on:
 yes, Hektōr, who boasts he's a son of almighty Zeus!
 May some god put the strong will in the hearts of you both 55 to make a firm stand yourselves, bid others do the same:
 that way, for all his onslaught, you still might force him back from the swift ships, even though the Olympian's backing him."

With that the Earth-Shaker and Earth-Encircler tapped both men with his staff, filled them with strength and courage, 60 and made their limbs light, both their legs and their arms above.
 Then, just as a swift-flying hawk will take to the air, lifting off from some sheer and inaccessible rock face, to hunt down another bird, in pursuit across the plain—such was the flight of Poseidōn the Earth-Shaker from them. 65
 It was Oileus's son, swift Aias, who recognized him first, and straightway declared to Aias, Telamōn's son:
 "Aias, that was one of the gods who dwell on Olympos, in the seer's likeness, urging us to fight by the ships!
 That was not really Kalchas the prophet, the diviner— 70 the form of his feet and legs from behind as he went I easily knew: though gods, they're still recognizable—and my heart in the breast of me is made that much more eager to plunge with zest into warfare and battle: my own feet under and hands above are impatient to go!"¹ 75

Aias, Telamōn's son, then made him this answer:
"So too with me: my invincible hands are urgent to grasp the spear, my power's aroused, I'm borne forward by both feet beneath me: I'm ready, even alone, to do battle with Priam's son Hektōr, hot to fight though he always is." 80 Such were their words to each other, while rejoicing over the lust for battle the god had put in their hearts.

Meanwhile the Earth-Encircler aroused those Achaians behind them, now refreshing their spirits beside the swift ships, their limbs undone by grievous fatigue, while anguish 85 swelled and possessed their spirits as they observed the Trojans in countless numbers swarm up the great wall:
looking at them they shed tears, never once supposing that they could escape calamity. But the Earth-Shaker, easily passing among them, strengthened their ranks 90 by his exhortations. He first approached Teukros and Lēitos, then Thoas, Dēipyros, the heroic Pēneleōs, Mērionēs and Antilochos, lords of the battle cry:
These he urged on now, addressed them with winged words:

"Shame on you, Argives, young warriors! It was in your prowess 95 as fighters I trusted to keep our ships in safety—but if you're about to shrink from warfare's grievous business, the day's indeed come for us to be beaten by the Trojans!
Alas, this is a great wonder that my eyes now behold, a terrible sight, something I never thought could happen: 100 the Trojans attacking our ships—the same men who before resembled timorous hinds, that in the woodlands become the prey of jackals, of wolves and leopards, wandering cravenly, no fighting spirit in them:
just so, until now the Trojans refused to stand and face 105
the Achaians' hands, their power, not even briefly.
But now, far from the city, they're engaged by the hollow ships

1. We're not told what was special, and recognizable, about gods' nether extremities, or how Aias knew them. This has seemingly not bothered commentators, ancient or modern, as much as it might.

because of our leader's weakness and our troops' lack of discipline—being at loggerheads with him, they have no will to fight for the swift-faring ships, but are getting killed among them. 110 Yet even if it's the truth that the person at fault is Atreus's heroic son, wide-ruling Agamemnōn, because he dishonored the swift-foot son of Pēleus, that's no reason for us to stay aloof from the fighting!
 Let's mend this rift quickly—good men's hearts can be healed— 115 but it's no good thing that you're still shy of warlike valor—you, the elite troops, the army's finest! I'd have no quarrel with any man that hung back from the fighting who was a worthless fellow, but with you lot I'm furious!
 Gentlemen, this abstention of yours will soon 120 make matters a good deal worse, and each one of you should take shame—and men's censure—to heart, for the struggle now unfolding is crucial. Strong Hektōr, of the great war cry, is fighting beside our ships, has smashed our gates and their bar!"

Thus the Earth-Encircler's commands urged on the Achaians, 125 and about the two Aiases the ranks assembled, in strength, such as Arēs himself would not fault if he came among them, or Athēnē, the host-rallier; for these were the pick of the best that now awaited the Trojans and noble Hektōr, spears in serried rows, bucklers pressed against bucklers, 130 shields overlapping, helmets by helmets, men packed so tight the horsehair crests on the gleaming boss of their helmets nudged as they bent their heads, so close were the ranks, and the spears, brandished in bold hands, intermingled, a woven lattice. Their minds were unswervingly set on battle. 135

The mass of the Trojans now charged, with Hektōr at their head, driving straight on, like a boulder that rolls down a rock face, when some winter torrent has shifted it off the hilltop, its huge flood undermining the ruthless stone's embedment, and up it bounces, in flight, and the woods echo beneath it 140 as it plunges straight on down, until it reaches the level plain, and there it stops rolling, for all its hurry—so, for a while, Hektōr threatened to break right through to the sea easily, by way of the Achaians' ships and huts, on his killing spree; but when he came to those close-packed ranks 145 he stopped, brought up short. The Achaians' sons stood against him, jabbing at him with their swords and double-edged spears, and drove him back: he gave ground, badly shaken, and in a carrying voice called out to the Trojans: “Trojans! Lycians! You Dardanian front-line fighters! 150 Stand by me! Not for long shall the Achaians hold me back, though they’ve closed their ranks like a wall. No, I rather think they’ll give ground before my spear, if indeed I was urged on by the highest of gods, Hērē’s own loud-thundering lord.”

 So saying Hektōr stirred up each warrior’s force and spirit. 155 Deīphobos, Priam’s son, strode out amongst them, set on greatness, holding his balanced shield before him, [advancing light-footedly, under cover of his shield],² and Mērionēs took aim at him with his gleaming spear, and threw, and did not miss, but struck the balanced shield 160 of oxhide, yet could not pierce it: far short of that, the long spear snapped at its head socket, and Deīphobos held his oxhide shield away from him, inwardly scared by the spear of Mērionēs, the skilled warrior. But that hero backed off to the mass of his comrades, deeply angered 165 both by missing a victory and at breaking his spear, and set out back to the huts and ships of the Achaians to fetch another long spear that he’d left in his hut.

But the rest fought on, and an unquenchable clamor went up, and Teukros, Telamōn’s son, was the first to slay his man: 170 Imbrios, spearman, the son of horse-rich Mentōr, who lived in Pēdaion before the Achaians’ sons appeared, and married Mēdesikastē, a bastard daughter of Priam.
 But when the Danaāns came, in their well-rounded ships, to Ilion he returned, won renown among the Trojans, 175 and lived with Priam, who honored him like one of his own sons.
 Him it was Telamōn’s son now struck beneath one ear with his long spear, then withdrew it: like an ash tree he fell that on the peak of a mountain in clear view all around is cut down by the bronze and scatters its tender leaves 180 abroad on the ground: so he fell, his bronze-inlaid armor rattling upon him, and Teukros, eager to strip his gear, rushed up. As he ran, Hektōr flung a gleaming spear at him

2. Probably—but not certainly—an interpolation or alternative line to 157.

but he, watching carefully, avoided the bronze missile—a near miss—and it hit Amphimachos in the chest, 185 Kteatos's son, Aktōr's grandson,³ returning to the battle.
 He fell with a thud, and his armor rattled upon him.
 Now Hektōr moved quickly to rip from Amphimachos's head—that great-hearted man—the helmet enclosing his temples; and Aias lunged out with his gleaming spear at Hektōr 190 as he came on, never reaching his flesh—his whole body was clad in fearsome bronze—just striking his shield's boss, and thrusting him back with huge force. So Hektōr gave ground, backwards, from the two corpses. The Achaians dragged them off.
 Amphimachos was taken by Stichios and noble Menestheus, 195 Athenian leaders, back to the mass of the Achaians, and Imbrios by the two Aiases, full of fighting valor.
 Like two lions that have snatched a goat from sharp-toothed hounds,
 and carry it off through thickly growing brushwood, high up off the ground, held tight in their jaws, so these 200 two commanders called Aias hefted Imbrios aloft, and stripped off his battle gear. Out of rage for Amphimachos Oileus's son cut Imbrios's head from his tender neck, swung his arm, and threw the head off into the crowd, like a ball, and it fell in the dust right at Hektōr's feet. 205

Poseidōn was now very deeply angered at heart since his own grandson had fallen in the ruthless struggle; and he made his way past the huts and ships of the Achaians urging the Danaäns on, but planning harm for the Trojans.
 There he encountered Idomeneus, famed spearman, 210 come from tending a comrade just in from the fighting, cut in the ham of his knee by the keen-edged bronze:
 his comrades had carried him back. Idomeneus, having left orders for the healers, was going to his hut, still eager to join in the battle. To him now spoke the lordly Earth-Shaker, 215 likening his voice to that of Thoas, Andraimōn's son, who in the whole of Pleurōn and rugged Kalydōn ruled the Aitōlians, being honored by his people like a god:

3. Aktōr was only nominally Kteatos's father: his real sire was Poseidōn, which is why the god is deeply angered at the death of Amphimachos, who thus was indeed his grandson (206–7).

“Idomeneus, Krêtan counselor, where now are the threats that the sons of the Achaians once made against the Trojans?” 220

To him then Idomeneus, leader of Krêtans, replied: “Ah, Thoas, so far as I know, there’s no one man to blame now—we’re all of us skilled, these days, in warfare’s business.
No man here’s been gripped by spiritless terror; none, yielding to hesitancy, has shirked grim war. This must, 225
I suppose, be what pleases the almighty son of Kronos: that here, far from Argos and nameless, the Achaians should perish.

But Thoas, you were one who always stood strong in battle, and prompt to urge on others you noticed hanging back—so don’t give up now, but call upon every man!” 230

In answer to him Poseidôn the Earth-Shaker then said: “Idomeneus, may that man never get back home from Troy, but stay here and become the sport of dogs, who on this day chooses to shirk the fighting! So then, fetch your battle gear, come with me: we have to work together 235 to advance our goal. Though two only, we might still help.
When the weakest men unite, their valor’s augmented—
But we two know how to fight even against the best.”

So saying, he went back, a god to the struggle of mortals, and Idomeneus, on reaching his well-built hut, 240 put on his fine battle gear, picked out two spears, and set forth, like branched lightning that the son of Kronos grasps in his hand and flourishes from bright Olympos, displaying a sign to mortals, and its clear rays dazzle:
so gleamed the bronze around his torso as he ran. 245

Mêrionês, his good henchman, met him a short distance from the hut, being on his way to collect another spear of bronze, and mighty Idomeneus now addressed him: “Mêrionês, Molos’s son, swift-footed, dearest of comrades—what brings you here, away from the war and the conflict? 250
Are you wounded, perhaps? Is an arrowhead giving you trouble?
Or have you brought me a message? Myself, I’m not minded to sit here, back in my hut; what I want now is to fight.”

Then sagacious Mêrionês made him this answer:
“Idomeneus, counselor to the bronze-corsleted Krêtans, 255

I'm on my way to get me a spear, if there's still one left in the hut, since the one I had before, I shattered when I let fly at the shield of haughty Deïphobos."

To him then Idomeneus, leader of Krêtans, replied:
"If it's spears you want, be it one or twenty, you'll find them 260 lined up there in my hut, against the bright inner wall—Trojan spears, that I take from men I've killed—I don't care to stand well away when I fight my opponents, and so I've a store of spears, and shields with bosses, and helmets, and bright-glinting corselets."

Then to him 265
sagacious Mērionēs declared in answer:
"In my hut too, and in my black ship, there are many spoils from the Trojans, but not handy for me to fetch.
Neither have I, I can tell you, forgotten my prowess:
among the foremost in battle, where glory is won, 270 is where I take my place when war's conflicts arise.
Though some other bronze-armored Achaians are perhaps unaware of my fighting record, you, I think, know it well."

To him then Idomeneus, leader of Krêtans, replied:
"I know how brave you are: what need to tell me? 275
If the best of us were being chosen beside the hollow ships for an ambush—a task where men's bravery shows most clearly, and one in which courage and cowardice both are revealed:
for the coward's complexion will always keep changing hue, his inner thoughts never are calm, won't let him sit still, 280 he shifts from ham to ham, puts his weight on either foot, and his heart goes thump thump in his breast as he thinks about the death-spirits, and his teeth begin to chatter; but the brave man's complexion's unchanging, nor is he overly scared when he first takes his place in a warriors' ambush, 285 but prays for a speedy entry to the grievous conflict—not even then would your power, your strong hands come in question!

For if you were shot, or struck, in the course of the struggle, not on the nape of your neck would the blow fall, or your back, but rather would make its mark on your chest or nether belly 290 as you pressed on among the foremost to grapple the foe like a lover! But come, let's not loiter here, chattering as though we were children: that's to invite a rebuke.

Off with you to the hut now, pick up that hefty spear."

So he spoke, and Mērionēs, swift Arēs' equal, 295 speedily fetched from the hut a new bronze spear, and followed Idomeneus, his mind firmly set on battle.

Just as Arēs the killer goes about looking for war, with his dear son Panic Rout, the mighty and fearless, who sends even the sturdiest warrior fleeing in terror, 300 and they arm themselves and go from Thrace to the Ephyroi or the great-hearted Phlegyes, yet never listen to both sides, but just hand out glory to one or the other—so Mērionēs and Idomeneus, leaders of men, went out to the war, both armored in gleaming bronze. 305

It was Mērionēs who first addressed his companion:
"Son of Deukaliōn, where do you want to join the main body?
At the far right wing of the army, or in the middle?
Or out on the left—since I figure there's nowhere else that the long-haired Achaians will fall so short in the struggle." 310

To him then Idomeneus, leader of Krētans, replied:
"At the ships in the center there are others to mount a defense:
the two Aiases, and Teukros, who's the best among the Achaians in bowmanship—no slouch, either, at hand-to-hand combat!
These will give Priam's son Hektōr his fill of warfare, 315 however avid he is for it, never mind his mighty strength!
A hard climb he'll have, with all his fighting passion, to vanquish the strength of their irresistible hands and set fire to the fleet—unless the son of Kronos himself should hurl a blazing torch there, in among the swift ships! 320 But great Aias, son of Telamōn, would yield to no mere man, any person who's mortal, who eats Dēmētēr's grain, who can be broken apart by the bronze or by great rocks:
not even to Achilles, the rank-breaker, would he submit in a stand-up fight—though at running Achilles has no rivals. 325
So, yes, on to the army's left, and we'll know soon enough whether we'll win ourselves glory or yield it to others."

So he spoke, and Mērionēs, the equal of swift Arēs, led on, until they reached the troops where he'd commanded.

When the Trojans saw Idomeneus, of flame-like prowess, 330 and with him his henchman in his fine-wrought armor, they passed the word down the line and all went at him, and a general struggle took place around the vessels' sterns.

The way that whining gales can generate wind-gusts galore on a day when the dust lies thickest along the roads, 335 and all together stir up an enormous dust cloud, just so their battle was joined, and they were urgent at heart in the throng to cut down each other with the keen-edged bronze.

The battle that's death to mortals bristled with lengthy spears, that they used to rip flesh with, and eyes were blinded 340 by the bronze radiance from those burnished helmets and newly buffed corselets and brightly shining shields as they clashed in their masses. Hardhearted would that man be who, seeing this scene, experienced joy, not grief.

Opposed in purpose, Kronos's two mighty sons 345 were fashioning miserable troubles for these warrior heroes: Zeus sought victory for Hektōr and the Trojans, to honor swift-footed Achilles; yet no way did he want the Achaian army wiped out before Ilion, wished only to honor Thetis and her stronghearted son. 350

But Poseidōn had joined the Argives, was urging them on—risen secretly from the grey sea—deeply distressed at their rout by the Trojans, and in a furious temper with Zeus.
Nevertheless, though they shared the same ancestry and father, Zeus was the elder brother, had more knowledge, 355 and so Poseidōn avoided providing open support, but kept stirring up Argive troops, while disguised as a man.
So these two drew tight the cords of strong strife and common war over both sides, to and fro, made a knot that could be neither untied nor broken, but would unstring the knees of many. 360

Now, despite his grey hairs, Idomeneus rallied the Danaāns, and charging among the Trojans, turned them to flight, for he cut down Othryoneus, from Kabēsos, a guest in Troy lately arrived, brought there by report of the war, who'd asked to marry the fairest of Priam's daughters, 365 Kassandrē: offered no bride-price, but made a grandiose promise, that he'd force the Achaians' sons, against their will, from Troy;

and the aged Priam assented, bent his head in agreement to give him the girl; he trusted the promise, went to war.
 But Idomeneus aimed at him with his gleaming spear 370 as he high-stepped forward: threw, and struck home. His bronze corselet failed to protect him, the spear lodged in his mid-belly.
 He fell with a thud, and Idomeneus boasted over him, saying: “Othryoneus, I must compliment you above all mankind, if it’s true that you’re going to accomplish all that you promised 375 to Dardanos’s scion Priam! He promised you his daughter, and we too would make the same promise, and fulfill it—would give you the son of Atreus’s loveliest daughter, bring her here from Argos for you to wed, if you’d join us in sacking the populous city of Ilion! So, come along, 380 here by the seafaring ships we’ll work out our agreement over the marriage—and no, we’re not fussy about the bride-price.”

So saying, the hero Idomeneus dragged Othryoneus out through the crush of battle, but Asios came to the rescue, on foot, ahead of his horses—their breath kept right on his shoulders 385 by the charioteer, his henchman—eager to take a shot at Idomeneus, but he threw first, hit Asios with his spear in the throat, under the chin, driving the bronze right through;
 and he fell as falls an oak or white poplar, or a lofty pine tree that up in the mountains shipwrights fell 390 with their newly sharpened axes to serve as a ship timber:
 so there in front of his horses and chariot Asios lay stretched out, screaming, hands clutching the bloody dust, while his charioteer, scared out of the wits that he had before, dared not wheel his team round, and so escape 395 the hands of the enemy. Steadfast Antilochos took aim, hit him squarely. The corselet of bronze that he wore failed to protect him, the spear lodged in his mid-belly, and gasping for breath he slumped from his well-built chariot, while his horses Antilochos, great-hearted Nestōr’s son, 400 drove off, away from the Trojans to the well-greaved Achaians.

Now Deïphobos came right up close to Idomeneus, grieving for Asios, took a shot with his gleaming spear, but Idomeneus, on the lookout, ducked the bronze-pointed shaft, took cover behind the well-balanced shield he bore, 405 fashioned from circles of oxhide and glinting bronze, and well-equipped with two cross-bars. Beneath this shield he crouched, and the bronze spear flew over and past him, harshly scraping the shield's rim. Yet not in vain had Deïphobos launched it from his brawny hand: 410 Hippiasos's son Hypsēnōr, shepherd of men, it struck in the liver below his midriff, and at once unstrung his knees; and Deïphobos shouted aloud, vaunted terribly over him:

 "Not unavenged does Asios lie now: no, I declare, though he's going to the house of Hādēs, mighty gate-guardian, 415 he'll rejoice at heart, since I've furnished him with an escort!"

So he spoke: and grief stirred the Argives at his boasting, but roused most passion in warlike Antilochos's heart:
 yet despite his sorrow he wasn't unmindful of his comrade, but ran up and stood over him, protecting him with his shield, 420 while two other trusty comrades—Echios's son Mēkisteus and noble Alastōr—stooped and lifted him up, and carried him, groaning deeply, back to the hollow ships.

Idomeneus never slackened his raging attack, kept up his drive either to shroud some Trojan in black night, 425 or to fall himself, while keeping disaster from the Achaians.
 Next, the dear son of Aisyētēs, Zeus's nursling, the hero Alkathōös—son-in-law to Anchīsēs, having married his eldest daughter, Hippodameia, whom her father and lady mother cherished in their house 430 since she excelled all other girls of her age in beauty and wit and fine handiwork, this being why the man she wed was the best in all broad Troy—him, by Idomeneus's hand, Poseidōn laid low, holding his bright eyes spellbound, shackled his glorious limbs, 435 so he could neither flee backwards nor dodge aside, but stood, like a pillar or some high leafy tree, motionless, while he was run through in mid-chest by the hero Idomeneus's spear. It tore clean through the bronze corselet, that hitherto had kept death from his flesh, 440 but now rasped harshly around the rending spear.
 He fell with a thud, the spear lodged firm in his heart, which, beating still, sent vibration out to the spear's butt-end; then at last mighty Arēs stopped its force.
 Idomeneus shouted aloud, vaunted terribly over him: 445

“Deïphobos, now perhaps we can call it fair recompense—the way you boast—three killed in exchange for one?
 Crazyed man, now stand up against me yourself, and learn how I’m descended from Zeus, I who have voyaged here:
 first Zeus begot Mīnōs to be Krētē’s guardian; then 450 Mīnōs in turn sired a son, the peerless Deukaliōn, and Deukaliōn fathered me, to be lord over many warriors in spacious Krētē; and now the ships have brought me to Troy to make trouble for you, and your father, and the Trojans generally.”

So he spoke. Deïphobos pondered, mind uncertain: 455 should he seek out a comrade from the great-hearted Trojans, withdrawing to do so, or make trial of Idomeneus on his own?
 And to him, on reflection, this seemed the better course:
 to go and look for Aineias. He found him standing idle on the far side of the action, still resentful of noble Priam, 460 who would accord him no honor, good warrior though he was.⁴ Deïphobos now came up and addressed him with winged words: “Aineias, the Trojans’ counselor, there is sore need for you to rescue your brother-in-law—if the loss of kin can move you!
 Come with me and rescue Alkathōōs, who, long years ago, 465 as your sister’s husband, kept you as a child in his house:
 he’s been killed by Idomeneus, the famous spearman.”⁵

So he spoke, and aroused the spirit in the breast of Aineias, who charged straight at Idomeneus, mind set on battle.
 Idomeneus was not seized by panic, like some youngster, 470 but waited, as when a boar in the mountains, trusting his strength, awaits the huge pack of men that’s coming against him at a lonely spot: he pricks up the bristles along his back, his eyes blaze with fire, he whets his tusks, makes ready to fight off, zestfully, attacks from both dogs and hunters— 475 so Idomeneus, famous spearman, awaiting Aineias’s charge, did not back off, but rather called out to his comrades, looking round at Askalaphos, Dēïpyros, and Aphareus, Mērionēs and Antilochos, lords of the battle cry,

4. There was a traditional rivalry between Priam’s and Anchīsēs’ branches of the royal house of Troy for the kingship: see also 20.178–86, 302–6; Janko 106; A. T. Murray 2: 37n1.

5. This may sound a rather odd appeal, until we recall that, both in Homer’s day and later, giving a corpse proper burial rites, at home, was essential to ensure that the dead man’s spirit was not condemned to wander in limbo. See Vermeule, 11–12.

to whom he addressed now winged words of exhortation: 480

“Come help me, friends! I’m alone, and terribly afraid of swift-footed Aineias, now advancing to attack me—very strong he is, very good at killing men in battle, and he’s in the flower of youth, when a man’s strength is greatest.
Were we in our present mood, but of a like age, 485 then straightway either he or I would win a great victory.”

So he spoke, and they all, with a single end in mind, came and stood round him, shields settled on their shoulders.
On the other side Aineias called out to his own comrades, looking round at Deïphobos, Paris, and the noble Agēnōr, 490 leaders with him of the Trojans. Arrayed in their rear there followed a mass of troops: as sheep will trail a ram to water from feeding place, and the shepherd’s glad at heart—so the heart in Aineias’s breast rejoiced at the sight of these massed troops that were following on behind him. 495

So over Alkathōös they went at it hand to hand with their long spears: the bronze girding their chests rang loudly with thrusts made to and fro in the turmoil one at another. Two men, fighters skilled above the rest, Idomeneus and Aineias, both equals of Arēs, hungered 500 to cut up each other’s flesh with the pitiless bronze: Aineias had the first shot, let fly at Idomeneus, who, watching carefully, avoided the bronze spear, and Aineias’s shaft ended quivering, stuck point first deep in the ground, flung in vain from his sturdy hand. 505

But Idomeneus hit Oinomāos square in the mid-belly, broke the plate of his corslet, so that his guts spilled out through the bronze: in the dust he fell, hand clawing the earth, and Idomeneus from his corpse pulled the far-shadowing spear, yet could not also strip the splendid battle gear 510 from off his shoulders, so hard-pressed he was by missiles; for his leg joints no longer were steady when he ran, wouldn’t let him retrieve his own spear, or dodge another’s.
So in close combat he stood off his pitiless death-day, but his feet could no longer hurry him out of the fighting, 515 and as, step by step, he backed off, Deïphobos—who’d long nursed an undying grudge against him—let fly his gleaming spear but missed him once more, and instead hit Askalaphos,

Enyalios's son: through his shoulder the mighty spear drove: in the dust he fell, hand clawing the earth. 520 (As yet mighty loud-voiced Arēs knew nothing about the fall of his son⁶ in the relentless grind of battle; he sat on the heights of Olympos, beneath the golden clouds, kept there by the will of Zeus, like all the other immortal gods, well away from the war and the fighting.) 525

Now over Askalaphos they battled hand to hand.
Deïphobos tore loose from the corpse his gleaming helmet, but Mērionēs, swift Arēs' equal, sprang at him, jabbed his arm with his spear. From his hand the visored headpiece fell, clanged as it hit the ground, 530 and Mērionēs, like a vulture, pounced once more, pulled out his mighty spear from Deïphobos's arm, then backed off to rejoin his companions, while Polītēs, Deïphobos's brother, one arm around his waist, led him out of warfare's grim clamor, till he reached 535
the swift horses awaiting him, out back behind the fighting, that stood there along with their driver and their inlaid chariot.
These bore him away to the city, groaning deeply, in great pain, the blood still dripping down from his newly wounded arm.

But the rest fought on, and a clamor unquenchable went up. 540 Aineias now went for Aphareus, Kalētōr's son, as he turned to face him, drove a sharp spear into his throat;
and his head lolled to one side, and his shield fell on him, his helmet too; death, the life-queller, was shed about him.
Then Antilochos, seizing his chance, as Thoön turned away 545 pounced and stabbed him, completely severed the vein that runs the length of the back till it reaches the neck:⁷ this he severed completely, and Thoön slumped down on his back in the dust, stretching out both hands to his comrades.
Antilochos crouched, started stripping the gear off his shoulders, 550 but kept an eye out, for the Trojans were all around him, taking shots at his broad bright shield; yet they could not get through

6. Though Arēs and Enyalios were originally different war gods, their identities tended, as here, to merge: the second becomes no more than a mere epithet attached to the first at 17.211 below.

7. There is in fact no such vein, but the idea of it was widespread in antiquity, supposedly either running close to the spine, or, sometimes, in the spinal column itself.

to mar with their pitiless bronze Antilochos's soft flesh, since Poseidōn, the Earth-Shaker, protected Nestōr's son 555 too closely, even amid a shower of missiles—for Antilochos never lacked enemies. He kept turning about amongst them, nor was his spear ever still, but always poised, brandished, while he debated in his mind whether to throw from a distance or close in hand to hand.
 His sighting for shots down the ranks was not lost on Adamas, 560 Asios's son, who struck his shield with the pitiless bronze, squarely, up close. But his spear point was robbed of its force by dark-maned Poseidōn, who grudged it his favorite's life:
 half the spear, like a charred stake, stayed stuck fast in Antilochos's shield; the other half lay on the ground, 565 and Adamas backed away to his comrades, avoiding fate.
 But Mērionēs followed after him, speared him midway between navel and genitals, the place where a battle-wound inflicts on wretched mortals the sharpest pain of all.
 Here he thrust in his spear, and Adamas, flung forward, 570 convulsed on the spike, like an ox that herdsmen in the mountains have bound with ropes and are dragging off against its will:
 so he, when hit, convulsed for a little, but not for long, till the hero Mērionēs came up and tore the spear out of his flesh, and darkness shrouded his eyes. 575

Then Helenos at close quarters hit Dēipyros on the temple with a great Thracian sword, and ripped off his helmet.
 Torn from his head it dropped groundwards, and an Achaian scooped it up as it rolled among the fighters' feet, and night's darkness fell on Dēipyros, shrouding his eyes. 580

This grieved Atreus's son Menelaös, of the fine war cry: out he strode, with loud threats for heroic prince Helenos, and waving his sharp spear. But Helenos drew his bow, and they both let fly together, the one with his sharp spear, the other with an arrow sped from the bowstring. 585 Priam's son hit Menelaös in the chest with his arrow, on the plate of his corselet, and off it the bitter arrow glanced.
 Just as off a broad shovel on a big threshing-floor the dark-hued beans or chickpeas fly through the air before the shrill storm blast and the sweep of the winnower, 590 in such wise from the corselet of glorious Menelaös

the bitter arrow glanced off, and flew wide of the mark.
 But Atreus's son Menelaös, of the fine war cry, threw and hit Helenos in the hand that held his well-polished bow.
 Through his hand into the bow the bronze spear was driven; 595
 he backed off to rejoin his comrades, avoiding fate, hand inert at his side, the ash spear dragging behind it, and great-hearted Agēnōr drew the spear from his hand, and closed the wound with a length of twisted wool, a sling, that his henchman, the people's shepherd, kept for him. 600

Next Peisandros went straight for glorious Menelaös;
 but an ill fate was leading him to the end that's death, to be brought down by you, Menelaös, in the grim conflict.
 When in their advance they'd drawn close, the one to the other, the son of Atreus missed, his spear flew wide, 605 and Peisandros hit on the shield of glorious Menelaös, yet could not manage to drive the bronze clean through,
 for the broad shield stopped it, his spear broke off at the socket.
 Even so he was cheerful at heart, looked for a victory, but Atreus's son drew his silver-studded sword, 610 and sprang at Peisandros, who, from behind his shield, brought out a fine bronze axe on a haft of olive wood, long and well-polished. Each attacked at the same moment: Peisandros caught Menelaös on his helmet's central strip, at the top, by the horsehair crest; but Menelaös hit him 615 as he came, in the forehead above the bridge of his nose.
 Bone crunched, both bloody eyeballs fell in the dust at his feet, he crumpled and fell. Menelaös set one foot on his breast, stripped off his armor, and boasted over him: "This is how you'll all leave the ships of the swift-colted Danaäns, 620 you arrogant Trojans, never sated with war's dread clamor, who have no lack of other shaming or wrongful acts that you've done against me, foul dogs, no fear in your hearts of the harsh wrath of thundering Zeus, guest-friendship's lord, who in time to come will lay your high city low: 625 for my wedded wife it was, and a load of my possessions, that you wantonly sailed away with, after being entertained in her home—and now, again, among our seafaring ships you're minded to fling fatal fire, to kill Achaian heroes!
 But you'll be stopped short, however hot you are for fighting! 630

Zeus, Father, they claim that in wisdom you beat all others, both men and gods—yet all these things happen through you, such as now, when you're favoring the arrogant wrongdoers, these Trojans, whose power's forever outrageous, who cannot ever glut their urge for the clamor of common warfare. 635
 All things attain their satiety: sleep and love, sweet song and the blameless dance—these are the things of which any man would, most happily, get his fill rather than war; but these Trojans are insatiate of battle.”

So saying, having stripped from its flesh the bloodied armor, 640 and given it to his comrades, Menelaös the blameless himself went back again, mixed with the front-line fighters.
 Then there sprang out against him king Pylaimenēs' son, Harpaliön: he'd come with his father to Troy to join the fighting, but never returned to the land of his birth. He now 645 came close, scored a clear hit on the son of Atreus's shield, yet could not manage to drive the bronze clean through,
 and backed off to rejoin his comrades, avoiding fate, glancing all round, lest someone should wound him with the bronze.
 But as he went, Mērionēs let fly a bronze-tipped arrow 650 that hit him on the right buttock. The shaft passed through along the line of the bladder, under the bone. He sank, sat where he was, and in the arms of his comrades breathed out his life, and like a worm lay stretched there on the ground: his dark blood ran, soaked the earth. 655
 The great-hearted Paphlagōnians attended to him, lifted him into a chariot, bore him to sacred Ilion, lamenting; and with them went his father, shedding tears—but no blood-price was ever paid for his dead son.

His killing left Paris incensed beyond measure, since he— 660 out of so many Paphlagōnians—had at one time been his host.
 Angered on his behalf, Paris flighted a bronze-tipped arrow.
 There was a man named Euchēnōr, the seer Polyidos's son, rich, a fine warrior, who made his home in Korinthos.
 He'd shipped out well aware of his baneful death-spirit, 665 since often told by his father, the virtuous Polyidos, that he'd either perish at home of some fatal disease, or else be slain by the Trojans among the Achaians' ships.

This way he avoided both a heavy Achaian fine⁸ and the loathsome disease, suffered no grief at heart. 670 Him Paris hit under the ear and jaw: swiftly the breath of life fled from his limbs, and hateful darkness claimed him.

So these fought on in the likeness of blazing fire:
 But Hektōr, so dear to Zeus, had not heard, was quite unaware that out to the left of the ships his men were being slaughtered 675 by the Argives: soon great glory would have been the Achaians' lot, such a force was the Earth-Shaker, Earth-Enfolder now urging the Argives on, and himself also aiding them.
 Where Hektōr had first made his charge at gates and wall, breaking the serried ranks of the Danaän shield men, 680 around the ships of Aias and Prōtesilaös, drawn up along the shore of the grey sea, where beyond them the wall was built lowest—it was here that those warriors fighting with chariots and horses now showed the strongest.
 Here troops from Boiōtia, robe-trailing Ionians, 685 men of Lokris and Phthiē, illustrious Epeians, strove hard to repel the attack on the ships, yet could not fend off from themselves noble Hektōr, so like a flame, not even the picked Athenians—whose leader was Peteōs's son Menestheus, accompanied by men 690 such as Stichios, Pheidias, strong Bias; while the Epeians were led by Phyleus's son Megēs, by Amphión, Drakios, and Medōn and staunch Podarkēs headed the Phthians—one of these, Medōn, a bastard of godlike Oileus and brother to Aias, nevertheless lived far away 695 from his native land, in Phylakē, after killing a man, a kinsman of his stepmother Eriōpis, wife to Oileus. The other, Podarkēs, was Iphiklos's son and grandson of Phylakos.
 These, in their armor, headed the great-hearted Phthians, who, with the Boiōtians, were fighting to save the ships. 700 Now Aias, Oileus's swift son, would no more stand apart from Aias the son of Telamōn, not for one instant,

8. Apparently a payment required to purchase exemption from military service: see 23.296–99, where Echēpōlos bribes Agamemnōn with a mare in order to continue the uninterrupted enjoyment of his wealth at home. Buying or bribing your way out of going to war has a long and widespread history: in neither case here, interestingly, does the narrator indicate overt disapproval.

but as in a fallow field two wine-hued oxen both strain with one accord at the jointed plow, while round the base of their horns sweat breaks, and trickles, 705 and only the polished yoke keeps the two apart as they force on down the furrow, plow to the field's edge:
 just so did both Aiasēs stand, together, side by side, and after Telamōn's son there followed a mass of valiant soldiers, his comrades, relieving him of his shield 710 whenever sweat and exhaustion took over his limbs.
 But the Lokrians did not follow with Oīleus's great-hearted son, for their hearts were not in close-quarter fighting, seeing they'd arrived with neither bronze horsehair-crested helmets, nor trimly rounded shields, nor ash-wood spears; 715 it was trusting their bows, their slings of braided sheep's wool that they'd followed him here, to Ilion, and using these, shooting thick and fast, that they'd tried to break the Trojans' ranks.
 So the ones with their fine-wrought war gear, out in front, fought against the Trojans and bronze-armored Hektōr, 720 while the others, behind, kept shooting from cover: the Trojans lost their taste for the fight, upset by this shower of arrows.

In sad disarray, then, thrust back from the ships and the huts, would the Trojans have retreated to windy Ilion, had not Poulydamas gone to bold Hektōr, and, standing beside him, said: 725
 "Hektōr, there's no way to persuade you through argument!
 In your god-given knowledge of warfare you have no rival, but that makes you also want to outshine others in counsel.
 Never will you be able to master all things yourself:
 on one man heaven bestows expertise in warfare, 730 on another in dancing, or in singing and playing the lyre, while in yet another man's breast far-seeing Zeus implants a clever mind, from which many people get benefit, and many he saves, but he knows it most clearly himself.
 Anyway I will declare what seems to me to be best: 735
 All round you now there blazes a ring of warfare, and the great-hearted Trojans, now they've surmounted the wall, are some of them standing by with their gear, while others fight on, few against many, scattered among the ships.
 I say pull back now, summon here all the leaders, 740 then let's debate every single suggestion—should we make our assault on the many-benched ships, if maybe some god is willing us victory, or rather retreat unscathed from those ships hereafter? For my own part, I fear the Achaians may pay back yesterday's debt, 745 since beside the ships there lingers a war-obsessed man who will not, I think, much longer hold off from battle."

So spoke Poulydamas: his shrewd advice pleased Hektōr, who at once sprang, fully armed, from his chariot to the ground, and then addressed him, speaking in winged words: 750
 "Poulydamas, while you're assembling all the leaders here I shall go up to the front, take a close look at the fighting, and come straight back, when I've given them my full orders."

So he spoke, and at once set off, like some snowclad mountain,⁹ shouting, and sped through the ranks of the Trojans and their allies, 755 who all rallied to Pánthoös's son, hospitable Poulydamas, when they heard the voice of Hektōr. But he meanwhile went in search of Deïphobos, and the mighty prince Helenos, and Adamas son of Asios, and Asios, Hyrtakos's son, ranging among the front-line fighters in his quest. 760
 But he found them no longer unscathed or disaster-free:
 some lay dead by the sterns of the Achaian ships, who'd lost their lives at the hands of the Argives; others were inside the wall, all wounded, either shot or cut up. However, there was one he soon found, to the left of the tearful battle: 765 the godlike Aléxandros, husband of fair-haired Helen, cheering his comrades on and urging them to fight, and he went and stood close and addressed him in shaming words:
 "Wretched Paris, so handsome, so mad for women, seducer, where is Deïphobos, tell me? or the mighty prince Helenos? 770 Or Adamas son of Asios, or Asios, Hyrtakos's son?
 Yes, and Othryoneus? Now the whole of steep Ilion's on the brink of disaster, now sheer destruction's certain—"

Then Aléxandros the godlike made him this response:
 "Hektōr, since your mind-set is to blame the blameless, 775

9. It is hard not to be brought up short by this image. We are here being asked to consider not only Hektōr's hugeness, but also his speed (and perhaps the dazzle of his armor). Despite scholarly support, the metaphor remains disconcerting. Mountains neither move (at any speed) nor do they shout. Yes, Homer sometimes nods.

at other times indeed I may have thought of withdrawing from battle, but not now: I wasn't born wholly a weakling.
 From the moment you roused your comrades to fight beside the ships,
 we've been engaged here nonstop against the Danaäns!
 As for the comrades you're asking after, they're dead— 780
 all but two: Deïphobos and the mighty prince Helenos, and they've both left the field, both with arm wounds inflicted by long spears, though Kronos's son saved them from death.
 So now lead on, wherever your heart and spirit tell you, and we'll follow you gladly, nor do I think you'll find us 785 in any way lacking in valor, while we still have strength:
 but beyond their strength none can fight, however eager."

With these words the hero persuaded his brother's mind, and they went where the uproar of battle was most intense, all around Kebrionēs and the peerless Poulydamas, 790 Phalkēs and Orthaios and godlike Polyphētēs, Palmys, Askanios, and Morys, Hippotiōn's son, who'd arrived from rich-soiled Askania as reliefs the morning before, and now Zeus stirred their fighting spirit.
 They came on as strong as the blast of threatening winds 795 that beneath the thunder of Zeus, the Father, scours the plain, its wondrous clamor confused with the sea's roar, and in the mix wave after boiling wave of the thunderous ocean, arching high, foam-flecked, some ahead, others behind—so the Trojans, in order, some ahead, others behind, 800 gleaming in bronze, now followed behind their leaders.
 Hektōr was their commander—a match for Arēs the killer, this son of Priam; before him he bore his balanced shield, with its close-packed hides, on which abundant bronze was layered, and, set round his temples, his shining helmet bobbed 805 as this way and that he strode, making trial of the ranks, finding out if they'd shrink before him as he came on under his shield;
 but no way could he daunt the spirit in the Achaians' breasts, and Aias challenged him first, advancing with long-legged strides:
 "Hey, crazy, come closer! Why are you uselessly trying 810 to scare the Argives? We're no beginners in warfare—it was through the vile scourge of Zeus that we Achaians were beaten!
 In your heart, at a guess, you're expecting to despoil our ships, but we too have strong hands to defend them!

Before that day, indeed, this populous city of yours 815 may well be taken, laid waste beneath our hands—and as for yourself, I declare that day near when you will pray, in flight, to Zeus the Father and other immortals to make your fine-maned horses swifter than falcons as they carry you citywards, raising dust-clouds over the plain!” 820

As he spoke thus, a bird flew across on the right, a high-soaring eagle: the Achaian troops raised a cheer, made bold by the omen. But illustrious Hektōr replied: “Aias, you bumbling speaker, you braggart, what mere stuff your words are! I wish I were the son of Zeus of the aegis 825 all my days, and it was the lady Hērē who bore me, and I was honored as are Athēnē and Apollo, as surely as this day is bringing disaster to the Argives, every last one, and amongst them you too will die, if you dare await my long spear, that will tear your lily-white skin, 830 and you’ll glut the Trojans’ dogs, and their birds of prey with your fat and flesh, after you fall beside the Achaians’ ships!”

So saying, he led on, and they followed on after him with a deafening clamor, and the troops behind them cheered.
The Argives facing them shouted in answer, did not forget 835 their valor, stood firm as the Trojan leaders advanced:
both sides’ clamor went up the high sky to Zeus’s glory.

Book 14

Nestōr was drinking, but still picked up the sounds of battle, and so addressed winged words to the son of Asklēpios: “Consider, noble Machaōn, how this business will turn out:
the clamor of lusty young fighters around the ships is louder!
Now you just sit where you are, and drink your fire-bright wine 5 till fair-tressed Hekamēdē heats you a warm bath and washes you clean of all that dried blood! I myself am off to a vantage point to see what’s going on.”

So saying, he took the well-made shield of his son, Thrasymēdēs the horse breaker, that was lying there in the hut, 10 all gleaming with bronze—his own shield his son had taken—and selected a solid spear, tipped with keen-edged bronze.
Standing outside the hut, he at once saw a wretched scene:
his own side in disarray, with the enemy, the high-hearted Trojans, in hot pursuit, and the Achaeans’ wall torn down. 15
As when the vast deep darkens up with a silent comber, vaguely foretelling the shrill winds’ rapid courses—the waves don’t roll forward towards one side or the other until some decisive gale comes down from Zeus—just so the old man meditated, pondering in his mind 20 this way and that: join the swift-colted Danaäns’ throng?
or seek Atreus’s son Agamemnōn, shepherd of the people?
and as he debated, this struck him as being the better way: to go after Atreus’s son. But meanwhile the rest fought on, killing each other; the tireless bronze sheathing their bodies 25 clanged as they thrust with their swords and twin-edged spears.

Now Nestōr encountered those kings, Zeus’s nurslings, who’d been maimed by the bronze, as they made their way back from the ships:
the son of Tydeus, Odysseus, and Atreus’s son Agamemnōn.
Far distant from the fighting the ships of these were drawn up 30 on the shore of the grey sea: they’d been the first to be dragged up to the plain, and the wall was built well beyond their sterns.
For wide though the beach was, there was no way that it could contain all the ships, and the army was short of camp space.

So they hauled up the ships row by row, and filled the entire shore the two headlands enclosed.¹ So these kings were going, together, to witness the uproar and the fighting, each leaning on his spear; and sorrow afflicted the spirit in the breasts of them all. It was thus that the old man, Nestōr, met them, alarming the hearts in the breasts of these Achaiaans, and the lord Agamemnōn now addressed him, saying:
 “Ah, Nestōr, son of Nēleus, great glory of the Achaiaans, why have you left the murderous conflict to come here? I fear mighty Hektōr’s fulfilling the promise he made me—those threats that he issued when speaking before the Trojans—that he wouldn’t go back to Ilion from our ships until he’d set fire to the ships and killed their defenders too: such were his words, and now all this is being accomplished! Curse it, it must be that the other well-greaved Achaiaans are storing a grudge against me, as is Achillēs, and don’t mean to make a fight of it by the sterns of our vessels!”

Then Nestōr, Gerēnian horseman, answered him as follows:
 “Yes, indeed, these things have happened, are on us: not even high-thundering Zeus himself could have ordered them differently. The wall indeed is down that we put our trust in to be an unbreakable bulwark for our vessels and ourselves, while those at the swift ships fight on ceaselessly, without end: you could no longer tell, even by watching closely, from which side the Achaiaans are being driven in flight, so mingled their deaths, as the battle cry rises to heaven. We need to consider how this business will turn out—Is there any plan can affect it? But I’m against our joining the battle: a wounded man is in no position to fight.”

Then once more spoke in response the king of men, Agamemnōn:
 “Nestōr, since they are fighting now by the sterns of the ships, and neither the wall we built, nor the ditch, has helped us at all—though the Danaäns labored hard at them, hoped in their hearts

1. This agrees well with the geography. The two headlands, of Rhoiteion in the east and Sigeion in the west, are “some two and a half miles apart as the crow flies” (Hainsworth 154). The beach was not large enough for the whole fleet, so the ships were drawn up “in rows in a curve round the entire shore”. A logistics expert might calculate how far the available space is compatible with the traditional number of Homeric galleys (Casson 43–48).

that they'd be an unbreakable bulwark for the ships and themselves—
 this, I think, must be the pleasure of all-powerful Zeus, 70 that we Achaians should perish here, namelessly, far from Argos.
 I knew it when he was prompt in support of the Danaäns, and I know it now, when he honors our foes as he would the blessed gods, and has shackled our strength and hands.
 So, let us now all agree to the action that I propose: all the vessels drawn up in the first line, close to the sea, 75 we should haul down into the bright brine, set them afloat, and moor them with anchor stones, until the coming of immortal night—if even then these Trojans take a break from the fighting! Later we could relaunch the whole fleet.
 There's no blame in fleeing disaster, even at night: 80 Escape by flight is better than getting caught.”

Angrily eyeing him, resourceful Odysseus responded: “Son of Atreus, what words have escaped the barrier of your teeth!
 Accursed man, you should be in command of some other miserable ragtag army, not lord over us, to whom Zeus 85 has given the task, from youth to old age, of winding the skein of grim war, till we perish, every last man!
 Are you really so eager to leave the Trojans' spacious city, for which we've endured so much hardship? Be silent, in case some other Achaian hears this statement 90 that you've just made, words no man should ever utter, let alone one who knows in his mind what's proper to say, who's a sceptered king, to whom as many owe their allegiance as the number of Argives over whom you have lordship!
 I wholly despise your thinking, in what you just said, 95 for telling us, when warfare and combat are in progress, to relaunch our well-benched vessels, so that the Trojans, with the upper hand already, may win yet more of their hopes, while we suffer sheer destruction! The Achaians won't pursue this war any further once our vessels are seaborne; 100 they'll be looking elsewhere, disengaging from the conflict, and it's then your advice will destroy us, commander in chief!”

To him then the king of men, Agamemnōn, made his answer:
 “Ah, Odysseus, you've pierced my heart with this reproof of yours, it's so harsh! I would never tell the sons of the Achaians 105 to haul our benched vessels seaward against their will!

 I wish there was someone to offer us better advice than mine, either young man or old: this is what I'd really welcome."

Among them now spoke Diomēdēs, good at the war cry:
 "Such a man is close by: we'll not need to seek him long— 110 that is, if you'll listen, if you're not, each one of you, angry because in years I'm the youngest among you. Even so, I too can boast of my lineage, have an excellent father, Tydeus, whom now in Thēbē the heaped earth covers.
 For to Portheus were born three peerless sons, who had 115 their home in Pleurōn and mountainous Kalydōn: Melas and Agrios, and, third, the horseman Oineus, my father's father, who in valor outshone them all.
 He stayed there; my father wandered, settled in Argos—such, I suppose, was the will of Zeus and the other gods.² 120
 He married one of Adrēstos's daughters, dwelt in a house rich in possessions, owned abundant wheat-bearing plowland, with numerous orchards round about, and plentiful flocks, besides excelling every Achaian as a spearman. All this you'll have heard, and know the truth of it. 125
 So you can't say that by descent I'm a coward or weakling, and therefore scorn any good advice I give you!
 Come then, let's to the battle, though wounded: go we must.
 Ourselves we'll hold back from the conflict, out of the range of missiles, lest one of us suffer a wound upon his wound; 130 but the others we'll urge into combat, those who till now, nursing their mood, have held back, stayed out of the fighting."

So he spoke. They willingly heard him out, and obeyed:
 set forth and went, Agamemnōn, the king of men, leading them.

No blind watch did the far-famed Earth-Shaker keep, 135 but accompanied them in the likeness of an old man, and grasped the right hand of Atreus's son Agamemnōn and spoke to him, uttering winged words: "Son of Atreus, now, I fancy, Achilles' baneful heart must be rejoicing

2. Diomēdēs here tactfully skates over a piece of murderous family feuding: his father Tydeus, traditionally not only short but short-tempered, in fact fled Aitōlia after killing a relative, probably an uncle. "[N]obody [in Homer] 'wanders' save perforce and 'by the gods' will," a euphemism for 'by necessity,'" Hainsworth remarks (164).

in his breast as he watches this slaughter and pursuit 140 of the Achaeans, since there's no sense in him, not a scrap—so may he perish, so may some god undo him!
 But with you the blessed gods are in no way angered:
 even yet the leaders and rulers of the Trojans may raise dust clouds on the wide plain, and you'll see them 145 fleeing back to the city from the ships and huts.”

So saying, he bellowed aloud as he charged across the plain:
 as loud was the shout that nine—no, ten—thousand men utter in wartime as they engage in Arēs' strife—so great was the cry that the lord, the Earth-Shaker, sent forth 150 from his chest, putting great strength in every last Achaian's heart to engage in warfare and battle without cease.

Hērē the golden-throned now observed him from where she stood on a peak of Olympos: she recognized him at once as he hustled about in the battle that wins men glory, 155 her own and her husband's brother; and she rejoiced at heart.
 Zeus too she observed, ensconced on the topmost peak of spring-rich Ida; and hateful he was to her heart.
 So the ox-eyed lady Hērē now took thought as to how she could best delude the mind of Zeus of the aegis, 160 and this to her way of thinking seemed the best plan:
 to beautify herself nicely, then make her way to Ida, and see if he might desire to embrace her body in love, and she might then shed a warm and peaceful sleep on his eyelids and his sharp and devious mind. 165
 So she went to the private chamber that her dear son Hēphaistos had built her, fitting strong doors to the door frame, with a secret key, to be opened by no other god.
 In there she went, and shut the shining doors.
 First with ambrosia she cleaned off the whole of her lovely 170 body; then she gave it a massage it with olive oil, specially perfumed for her ambrosial robe,³ and which, merely shaken in Zeus's bronze-built abode, would spread its aroma out to both earth and heaven.
 With this she anointed her sweet flesh, then combed out 175 her hair, and with her hands plaited the shining tresses,

3. Text uncertain: here I follow Hainsworth 174–75.

fine and ambrosial,⁴ from her immortal head;
 put on an ambrosial robe, that Athēnē had skilfully made for her, and adorned with many embroideries:
 this with golden brooches she pinned at the breast, 180 and round her waist tied a sash with a hundred tassels, and in her pierced ears put earrings, embellished with triple mulberry clusters, that shone in an alluring fashion.
 Over all this Hērē, bright among goddesses, spread a fine glistening veil, as white as the very sun, 185 and under her gleaming feet bound her beautiful sandals.
 Now, having decked out her body with every adornment, she emerged from her chamber, and called to her Aphroditē, away from the other gods, and had this to say to her:
 “Will you listen now, dear child, to what I shall ask you, 190 or refuse me, out of vexation at heart, because I give support to the Danaäns, you to the Trojans?”

 Then answered her Aphroditē, daughter of Zeus: “Hērē, elder goddess, daughter of mighty Kronos, tell me what you’ve in mind—my heart says I should do it 195 if do it I can and it’s something that can be done.”

 To her the lady Hērē, deception in mind, replied: “Give me now love and passion, those things with which you vanquish all men, both mortals and the immortal:
 for I’m going to visit the ends of the bounteous earth, 200 and Ocean, who gave gods their being, and Tethys my mother, who brought me up well and cared for me in their home after taking me over from Rhea when Zeus, the far-seeing, thrust Kronos down under the earth and the unharvested⁵ sea.
 Them I am going to visit, to resolve their unsettled quarrel: 205

-
4. The epithet “ambrosial” (ἀμβρόσιος, ambrosios) has been variously identified as meaning “immortal”, “beautiful”, and “fragrant” or “sweet-scented”, while “ambrosia” (ἀμβροσίη, ambrosiē), as a noun, can signify either the food of the gods (and divine horses, 5.777), an unguent (presumably scented), a cleaning agent (either as cosmetic, or for corpses), or even immortality. In the circumstances I have chosen to keep the original term, and let its original associations speak for themselves.
5. “Unharvested” (ἀτρύγετος, atrygetos, formed from a- privative and τρύγη, grain crop or vintage) was the scholiasts’ convincing interpretation of this formulaic epithet, accepted by scholars until comparatively recently, when linguists decided that it meant either “restless” or “murmuring”, thus (on highly speculative grounds) changing a striking and original epithet into a mere cliché. I have preferred to stick with the scholiasts.

for too long they've held aloof each from the other in love and the marriage bed, since anger's filled their hearts.
 If I could talk those two over, bring their hearts back to bed, to be reunited in love together, then I'd forever known be as their friend, one worth their respect." 210

To her then replied laughter-loving Aphrodītē:
 "It's not possible, nor is it seemly, that I should deny this request from you, who sleep in almighty Zeus's embrace."

With that she undid from her bosom the embroidered breast band, intricately worked, with all kinds of allurements set in it— 215 therein were love, and desire, and dalliance: beguilement that steals away the sharp wits of even sensible people.
 She put this in Hērē's hands, and addressed her, saying:
 "Here, take this breast band, lay it up in your bosom, intricately worked, and in it all kinds of things set: you'll not, 220
 I tell you, return with your heart's wish unaccomplished."

So she spoke, and Hērē, the ox-eyed lady, smiled, and with that smile laid the breast band up in her bosom.

The daughter of Zeus, Aphrodītē, now went to her house; but Hērē darted down, leaving the heights of Olympos,⁶ 225 traversed Pieria and lovely Emathia, flew over the snowclad mountains of the horse-herding Thracians—their topmost peaks, her feet never catching the ground; from Athos she moved on over the wave-swept deep, and came to Lēmnos, the city of godlike Thoas. 230 Here she encountered Sleep, the brother of Death, whom she took by the hand, and addressed in the following words:
 "Sleep, you lord over all gods and all mankind, if you ever listened to words of mine, so now once more obey me—I'll be in your debt for all my days! 235 Make drowsy for me Zeus's bright eyes beneath his brows the moment I'm through with lying beside him in love, and gifts I'll give you—a fine throne that'll last for ever,

6. The goddess's flight plan, followed on a map, looks somewhat roundabout until one realizes that, as Graziosi 2011 (432) points out, "she avoids open water, just as real-life sailors did." Greek sailors in particular steered from island to island, unlike the Phoenicians of the Eastern Mediterranean, who in that vast expanse had to learn true navigation the hard way, by the stars or dead reckoning.

of gold, too, skillfully made for me by my own son, Hēphaistos, lame of both legs, and he'll add a footstool to it, 240 on which you can rest your sleek feet while you sit and feast."

In answer to her soothing Sleep had this to say:
"Hērē, elder goddess, daughter of mighty Kronos, some other one of the gods that live on for ever
I might easily lull to sleep—yes, even the streams of the river 245 Ocean, that established genesis of them all;
but to Zeus, son of Kronos, I'd never come too close, nor would I lull him to sleep, unless he so ordered me;
for once in the past another such order of yours taught me a lesson, the day when that arrogant son of Zeus 250 sailed from Ilion, after he'd sacked the Trojans' city.⁷ Then indeed I beguiled the mind of Zeus of the aegis, swirling gently about him, while for his son you plotted trouble, stirred over the deep a gale of dangerous winds, and sent him out of his way to well-populated Kōs, 255 far from his kin. Zeus woke, was enraged, strong-armed the other gods in his palace, sought me especially, would have hurled me from heaven into the deep, to be lost for ever, had Night not saved me, who lays low both gods and men.
To her I came in my flight, and Zeus, though enraged, held off me, 260 to avoid displeasing swift Night, whom he revered. And now you're telling me to perform this other task! Out of the question."

Then the ox-eyed lady Hērē once more addressed him:
"Sleep, why are you brooding over all these things in your heart?
Do you think far-seeing Zeus would help the Trojans, 265 be enraged for them as he was for his own son Hēraklēs?
Look, I'll make you a present of one of the younger Graces to take in wedlock, and to be known as your wife—Pasithēē, whom you've yearned for your whole life."

So she spoke, 270
and Sleep, delighted, replied to her in these words:

7. Sleep is recalling another incident, when he got in trouble with Zeus for performing a very similar service for Hērē to that which she is now soliciting. This earlier request had to do with the aftermath of a previous sacking of Troy by 'that arrogant son of Zeus,' i.e. Hēraklēs (cf. 15.18–30 for Zeus's version of the same episode, and 19.106–34 for Hērē's rooted dislike of Hēraklēs), after which Zeus was lulled to sleep while Hērē disposed of Hēraklēs to the island of Kōs.

“Come, then, swear to me by Styx’s sacrosanct waters, with one hand laying hold of the nurturing earth, and the other the glistening main, that between us two they may all bear witness, all the gods that are below with Kronos, that you will make me a present of one of the younger Graces, 275 Pasithēē, whom I’ve longed for my whole life.”

So he spoke,

and the goddess, white-armed Hērē, did not ignore him, but swore as he wanted, invoked by name all the gods that dwell under Tartaros, and are known as Titans.
 When she’d sworn the oath, accomplished it fully, they both 280 went on their way, left the townships of Lēmnos and Imbros, shrouded in mist, and swiftly followed their chosen path.
 To spring-rich Ida they came, the mother of wild creatures, and Lekton, where first they left the sea, and together went on over land, and the treetops rippled beneath their feet. 285 There Sleep stopped, before the eyes of Zeus perceived him, and climbed a very tall fir tree, the highest then on Ida, reaching up through the mist to the clear air above.
 Here he sat, well hidden by the fir tree’s crowding branches, like that sharp-voiced bird in the mountains, called by the gods 290 Chalkis, but mortal men refer to it as Kymindis.⁸

But Hērē pressed on swiftly, came to Gargaros, the topmost peak of high Ida; and Zeus the cloud-gatherer saw her.
 The moment he did so, passion eclipsed his reasoned thinking, such as he’d felt the first time they went to bed 295 and made love together, unseen by their own dear parents.⁹
 Now he stood before her, and addressed her in these words:
 “Hērē, with what in mind are you come here, down from Olympos?
 Your horses are not here, nor your chariot to ride in.”

To him, with deception in mind, the lady Hērē replied: 300 “I’m going to visit the ends of the bounteous earth, and Ocean, who gave gods their being, and Tethys my mother,

8. The kymindis was in fact some kind of Ionian owl: most probably the eagle owl (Strix bubo), but possibly either the hawk owl (Strix uralensis) or the long-eared owl (Asio otus). See Janko 196–97.

9. A gentle indirect reminder by Homer that this was no ordinary teenage experiment. That they shared the same parents meant, of course, that they were brother and sister: the coupling was incestuous.

who brought me up well and cared for me in their halls.
 Them am I going to visit, to resolve their unsettled quarrel: for too long now they've held aloof each from the other 305 in love and the marriage bed, since anger has filled their hearts.
 As for my horses, they're waiting in spring-rich Ida's foothills, to carry me over dry land and the watery deep.
 But now it's because of you I've come here, down from Olympus, since you might be annoyed with me later, if I departed, 310 without saying a word, for the home of deep-flowing Ocean."

In answer to her then Zeus the cloud-gatherer said:
 "Hērē, you can go there at some later time: let us both now take our pleasure in bed, since never before has so strong a passion for goddess or mortal woman 315 encompassed my body and mastered the spirit in my breast—not when I was making love with the wife of Ixiōn, who bore me Peirithoös, the gods' own equal in counsel,¹⁰ nor when I had neat-ankled Danaë, Akrisios's daughter, who gave birth to Perseus, most prestigious of warriors, 320 nor when I loved the daughter of far-famed Phoinix, who bore me both Mīnōs and godlike Rhadamanthys, nor when it was Semelē, or Alkmēnē in Thēbē—she it was that bore Hēraklēs, my stouthearted son, while Semelē bore Dionysos, the delight of mortals— 325 nor when it was Dēmētēr, that fair-tressed queen, nor glorious Lētō, no, nor even yourself, as now I'm enamoured of you, and possessed by sweet desire."

To him, with deception in mind, the lady Hērē replied:
 'Most dread son of Kronos, what's this that you're telling me? 330
 Is what you want to go to bed now and make love here on the peaks of Ida, where everything's in plain view?
 How would it be if a god, one of those who live for ever, should see us in bed, and tell tales when he got back among

10. Aristophanes and Aristarchos both athetized 317–18; Plato (Rep. 390c) did not have these lines. I suspect prurience here. There is no reason to doubt their genuineness: the whole episode is full of such embarrassing oddities. Zeus sounds like an adulterer; and as a Homeric audience would well have known, not only did Ixion—in one tradition a son of Zeus—try to rape Hērē (? tit for tat?), but both he and Peirithoös, also Zeus's offspring, by Ixion's wife Dia (Gantz 278, 718), were (Janko 203, with a string of lurid examples) "notorious rapists" (like father, like son?).

all the other gods? Then, I tell you, I'd not be able to go 335 from bed here back to your house: I'd feel too ashamed.
 But if that's what you want, if it's your heart's desire, you have a bedchamber that your dear son Hēphaistos built for you, fitting solid doors into the door frame:
 let's go there and lie down, since bed is now your pleasure."¹¹ 340

In answer to her then Zeus the cloud-gatherer said:
 "Hērē, you need not fear that either god or mortal may see us, with such a cloud I shall wrap you about, of gold, through which not even Hēlios could discern us, whose vision is unsurpassed for keenness of perception." 345

With that the son of Kronos clasped his wife in his arms, and beneath them the noble earth made fresh grass spring up, and dewy trefoil and crocus and hyacinth, soft and thick, that cushioned them from the ground. On these they lay, and were wrapped about in a cloud, lovely and golden, 350 and from it drops of glistening dew rained down.

So the Father slumbered in peace, on the summit of Gargaros, by sleep and love-making vanquished, his wife in his embrace.
 But soothing Sleep ran off to the ships of the Achaians with a message for the Earth-Shaker and Earth-Enfolder, 355 and standing beside him addressed him in winged words:
 "Readily now, Poseidōn, you can succor the Danaäns and grant them glory, if but for a little, as long as Zeus remains asleep—since on him I've shed soft oblivion, when Hērē beguiled him, made him lie with her in love." 360

So saying, he went on his way to the famous tribes of men, but Poseidōn was stirred yet further to rescue the Danaäns.
 At once, dashing up to the front ranks, he called out loudly:
 "Argives! Must we again cede the victory to Hektōr, Priam's son, allow him to take the ships, to win glory? 365
 This he says, thus he boasts it will be, on account of Achilles staying back by the hollow ships, enraged at heart.

11. There is more than ladylike modesty involved here. As a scholiast points out (Hainsworth 205), had Zeus acceded to his sister-wife's request, he would not only have been lured well away from Troy, but would have also risked imprisonment in her private room, since (166–68) it had been fitted by Hēphaistos with a secret key, so that only she could open or shut its door.

But we'll not miss his presence too much so long as the rest of us rouse ourselves now and lend support to one another!
 Come then, let's all of us do what I suggest: 370
 Let's find the biggest and best shields in the army, cover our heads with gleaming helmets, and take in our hands the longest lances, and so arrayed go forth! I shall be the leader, nor do I anticipate that Priam's son Hektōr, however eager, will face us! 375 And any tough warrior, a small shield on his shoulder, should now exchange that for a lesser man's bigger one."¹²

So he spoke: they heard him out readily, and obeyed, and the kings themselves, though wounded, joined the array: Tydeus's son, and Odysseus, Agamemnōn, son of Atreus, 380 and going throughout the ranks they made an exchange of armor:
 good fighters donned the good gear, gave the less good to lesser men.
 Then, when they'd sheathed their bodies in gleaming bronze, they set out, under the leadership of Poseidōn the Earth-Shaker, in his strong hand a fearsome sword, long and keen-edged, 385 like the lightning, with which it's forbidden that men should meddle in grim war: sheer terror holds warriors back from it.
 On the other side illustrious Hektōr arrayed the Trojans:
 now indeed war's most terrible strife was stretched out taut by dark-maned Poseidōn and illustrious Hektōr, 390 bringing aid the one to the Trojans, the other to the Argives, and the sea surged up towards the huts and the ships of the Argives, and with a great shout the sides engaged.
 No wave rolling in on the shore, driven up from the deep by the North Wind's fierce blast, thunders so mightily, 395 no blazing fire in the mountains roars so loud when it leaps from a glen to burn up the forest, no wind howls so fiercely among the high crests of the oaks, even the gale that's the noisiest in its fury—as then was the roar of Achaians and Trojans, raising a fearsome 400 clamor in their assault, one side against the other.

12. Suspension of disbelief (as commentators on this passage have noted from antiquity to the present day) can go only so far. Presumably Poseidōn plans to drop his old-man disguise and lead the charge as himself. But not even Homeric military convention extends to everyone hurrying back to the huts during a Trojan attack to get a bigger shield, a bronze (rather than leather) helmet, or a longer lance.

At Aias illustrious Hektōr first let fly his spear, when Aias was turned full towards him; he did not miss, but hit him where the two baldrics crossed on his breast—the one of his shield, the other of his silver-studded sword— 405 and they guarded his delicate flesh. Now Hektōr was enraged at the swift shaft having been flighted in vain from his hand, and drew back to the ranks of his comrades, avoiding fate.
 But as he backed off, great Aias, Telamōn's son, picked up a large rock—of which there were many, props of the swift ships, 410 that rolled under the feet of the combatants as they fought—and flung it, hitting Hektōr high on his chest, near the neck, over his shield rim: the blow spun him round like a whipped top.
 As when an oak struck by Zeus, the Father, is laid low, uprooted, and from it there drifts the mephitic reek 415 of brimstone, and courage drains from the man who witnesses it standing nearby, so fearsome is great Zeus's thunderbolt—thus instantly fell mighty Hektōr to the ground in the dust, and the spear dropped from his hand, but his shield fell with him and his helmet, while round him his inlaid bronze gear rattled. 420 Then, shouting loudly, the Achaians' sons ran up, hoping to drag him off, and letting fly their spears thick and fast; yet none of them managed to stab or shoot the people's shepherd—before that, the best men surrounded him:
 Aineias, Poulydamas, and the noble Agēnōr, 425 the Lycians' leader Sarpēdōn, the peerless Glaukos; of the rest no man failed to heed him, they all held out their round shields before him. His comrades lifted him up and carried him out of the conflict, till he reached the swift horses that were waiting for him out back, at the rear of the fighting, 430 along with their driver and his richly wrought chariot.
 These bore him off to the city, heavily groaning.
 But when they came to the ford of the swift-flowing river, eddying Xanthos, whom immortal Zeus begot, they lifted him from his chariot to the ground, poured water 435 on him, and he revived, opened his eyes, looked up, and, kneeling, vomited up dark blood, but then sank back on the ground, and both his eyes were shrouded in black night: the missile still overwhelmed his spirit.

When the Argives saw that Hektōr had quit the field 440 they pressed the Trojans still harder, their minds on battle.
 Then, out and away the first, swift Aias, Oileus's son, sprang at Satnios, wounded him with his keen-edged spear—Satnios, sired on a blameless nymph, a Naiad, by Ēnōps while he was herding near the Satnioeis river. 445 Him Oileus's son, famed spearman, met at close quarters, and stabbed in the flank: he fell on his back, and around him Trojans and Danaäns contested the grind of battle.
 Poulydamas, son of Pánthoös, spear-wielder, now appeared to his rescue, and hit Prothoēnōr on the right shoulder— 450 Areilykos's son, and the heavy spear drove its way through his shoulder: he fell in the dust, clawed the earth with his hand, and Poulydamas shouted loudly, in vehement exultation:
 "Ah, once again, not in vain, I think, a spear's leapt from the strong hand of Pánthoös's doughty son! 455 Some Argive has got it stuck in his flesh, and I think he'll go down to the house of Hādēs leaning on it as a staff."

 So he spoke, and his exulting brought grief to the Argives, and most of all stirred the fiery heart of Aias, Telamōn's son, who was nearest the man when he fell. 460 Quickly he let fly at Poulydamas his bright spear as he backed off: Poulydamas escaped the black death-spirit, jumping aside; but the spear struck Antēnōr's son, Archelochos, since the gods intended that he should perish.
 It caught him where head and neck meet, at the highest 465 joint of the spine, and sheared clean through both tendons:
 head, mouth, and nose got to the ground much quicker than his thighs and knees as he fell. Then Aias in his turn called out in a loud voice to blameless Poulydamas:
 "Think about it, Poulydamas, and tell me truly: 470
 Isn't this man fit to die in return for Prothoēnōr?
 No mean fellow I find him, nor one of mean ancestry, but a brother perhaps of Antēnōr, breaker of horses, or a son: in appearance they're much alike."

 Thus he spoke,
 well aware of the truth; and grief struck the Trojans' hearts. 475
 Then Akamas, standing over his brother, speared Boiōtian

Promachos as he was dragging the body away by the feet, and shouted aloud at him, in vehement exultation:
“You Argive arrow-fanciers, with your never-ending threats!
There will be toil and sorrow, oh, yes, but it won’t be only 480 for us: a day will come when you too will be killed this way!
Just ponder on how your Promachos sleeps, laid low by my spear—to make sure that the blood-price for my brother does not go for long unpaid, which is why any man will pray that a kinsman be left in his halls, a protector against ruin.” 485

So he spoke, and his exulting brought grief to the Argives, and most of all touched Pēneleōs’s fiery heart:
at Akamas he charged, who did not await the attack of the lordly Pēneleōs, and instead he hit Ilioneus, the son of flock-rich Phorbas, he whom Hermēs loved 490 best of all the Trojans, and endowed with much wealth; and Ilioneus was the sole son his mother bore to Phorbas.
Him then he struck beneath the brow, at the eye’s base, drove the eyeball out of its socket: the spear went clean through his eye and the neck’s tendons. Arms outstretched, he sank, 495 and then Pēneleōs, drawing his keen-edged sword, slashed through his mid-neck, striking off to the ground helmet and head together; and still the heavy spear stuck firm in the eye-socket. He held it aloft, displayed it like a poppy head to the Trojans, and spoke exultingly: 500 “Trojans, tell the dear father and mother of the lordly Ilioneus, from me, to begin mourning in their halls; for the wife of Alegēnōr’s son Promachos will never welcome back her dear husband with joy when we youthful Achaians return with our ships out of the land of Troy.” 505

So he spoke: trembling seized the limbs of them all: each man glanced around, for some way that he might escape sheer ruin.

Tell me now, you Muses who have abodes on Olympos, who was the first Achaian to bear off the bloodstained spoils of a slain foe, once the battle was turned by the famed Earth-Shaker? 510 Aias, Telamōn’s son, was the first, who wounded Hyrtios, Gyrtios’s son, the leader of the stout-hearted Mysians; Antilochos stripped off the gear of Phalkēs and Mermeros, Hippotiōn and Morys were cut down by Mērionēs, and Teukros dispatched Prothoōn and Periphētēs; 515 Atreus's son stabbed Hyperēnōr, shepherd of the people, in the flank, and the bronze, shearing through, spilled out his innards, and his soul now burst through the open wound, fled away fast, and darkness shrouded his eyes.

But Aias, the swift son of Oileus, laid low the most men, 520 for there was no one to match him in the pursuit on foot of fugitive fighters when Zeus had stirred them to flight.

Book 15

But when the Trojans had recrossed both stakes and ditch in their retreat, and many had fallen by Danaän hands, they came to a halt by their chariots, and remained there, pale with fear, panic-stricken; and meanwhile Zeus awoke on that topmost peak of Ida, beside Hērē the golden-throned. 5 He sprang to his feet, and stood, and saw Trojans and Achaians—the first in rout, and behind them, driving them on, the Argives, and there among them the lord Poseidōn.
Hektōr too he saw, stretched out on the plain, his comrades sitting around him, his breathing painful, his mind dazed, 10 vomiting blood: it was no weakling Achaian who'd hit him.
At this sight the Father of gods and men felt pity, glared furiously at Hērē, and thus addressed her: “There's no stopping you, Hērē! It's your vile deceitful plotting that's put Hektōr out of the fighting and routed his troops! 15 Well, maybe once more you'll be the first to reap the rewards of your own dangerous scheming, and I'll give you a whipping!
Don't you remember that time when you were strung up aloft, and I weighted your feet with two anvils, and fastened about your wrists an unbreakable golden chain? In the upper air amid clouds 20 you hung, and the gods throughout high Olympos raged, but stood there, unable to free you: any I caught I'd toss down from the threshold, already half-dead by the time they reached the earth. Yet not even so was my heart relieved of incessant pain over godlike Hēraklēs, 25 whom you—along with the North Wind, whose gales you'd bought—sent on the unharvested deep, with evil intent, and then carried away to Kōs, that well-populated island.
Him I rescued from there, and brought back once more to horse-pasturing Argos, after his many travails. 30 Need I once more remind you of this to stop your deceptions, make you see if the bed love you had with me when you came from the gods, and deceived me with, gives you any protection?”

So he spoke, and the ox-eyed lady Hērē shivered, and, speaking in winged words, replied to him thus: 35 “To this let Earth now bear witness, and the broad skies above, and Styx’s cascading water—which is the greatest,
 most terrible oath for the blessed gods themselves—and your own sacred head, and the bed that we two share in wedded love—an oath that I’d never swear to falsely: 40 not by my wish is Poseidōn, the Earth-Shaker, bringing grief to the Trojans and Hektōr, and aiding their enemies.
 It’s his own heart dictates his actions, after seeing the Achaians in rout by their ships, and taking pity on them.
 But truly, even him I’d advise to go wherever 45 you, my lord of the dark cloud, might lead the way.”

So she spoke, and the Father of men and gods smiled, and in response with winged words now addressed her:
 “If ever hereafter, my ox-eyed lady Hērē, were our thoughts to agree, when sitting among the immortals, 50 then would Poseidōn, however contrary his own wishes, at once change direction, follow your heart and mine!
 But if you’re speaking honestly, and mean what you say, go now to the gods assembled, and summon hither both Iris and Apollo, the far-famed archer. She is 55 to visit the troops of the bronze-corseleted Achaians, and carry a message from me to the lord Poseidōn:
 that he must abandon warfare and go back home.
 Phoibos Apollo’s to go to Hektōr and urge him to fight, once more breathe power into him, make him forget 60 the pains now afflicting his senses, and drive the Achaians back once more, fill them with craven panic so that they’re routed, and fall among the benched ships of Achilles, Pēleus’s son, who’ll send out into battle his comrade Patroklos: but him will illustrious Hektōr slay 65 with the spear before Ilion, though first Patroklos will kill many other young men, including my noble son Sarpēdōn.
 Then, in his wrath for Patroklos, noble Achilles will slaughter Hektōr. Then I’ll set up a countercharge from the ships—continuous, unremitting—until, through the counseling 70 of Athēnē, the Achaians capture steep Ilion.
 But till then I’m neither abating my anger, nor will I let any other immortal there give aid to the Danaäns until Pēleus's son's desire is wholly fulfilled as I promised him at the beginning, with my nod of assent, 75 that day when the goddess Thetis clasped my knees, and begged me to honor the sacker of cities, Achilles."

So he spoke,
 and Hērē, white-armed goddess, did not disobey him, but went from the mountains of Ida to lofty Olympus.
 Like a man who's travelled to many countries, who 80 hurries about, reflects, "How I wish I was here, or there", whose sharp mind speeds its way through a mass of desires, so rapidly in her eagerness flew the lady Hērē, and came to lofty Olympus, where she found the immortal gods assembled in Zeus's house. On seeing her 85 they all stood up, and lifted their cups in welcome.
 The rest she ignored, but accepted the cup from fair-cheeked Themis, for she was the first to run up and greet her, speaking with winged words, and saying: "Hērē, why have you come here? You look quite distraught— 90 Kronos's son, your own husband, must have scared you badly."

Then the white-armed goddess Hērē answered her thus:
 "Themis, goddess, don't ask me—you yourself know how arrogant and unbending his temper is! Rather set out for the gods in his halls the fairly apportioned feast, 95 and then, together with all the immortals, you'll hear Zeus announce all the vile acts he's planning: in no way, I tell you, will this please the hearts of all, either mortals or gods—if indeed even now any feast with a cheerful mind."

After making this speech the lady Hērē sat down, 100 and throughout Zeus's hall the gods were troubled. She smiled with her lips, but above the dark brows her forehead revealed no comfort: it was in anger she now spoke among them all:
 "Fools we are, who so witlessly rage against Zeus, or are even hot to confront him, thwart his intentions 105 by argument or force! He sits apart, quite indifferent, not caring at all, for he says that among the immortal gods for power and strength he's beyond all doubt the best.
 So each of you must put up with whatever ills he sends you—as now already, I think, grief's been fashioned for Arēs, 110 since his son's perished in the fighting—no man he loves more—Askalaphos, whom strong Arēs claims as his own.”

So she spoke.
Both muscular thighs Arēs struck with his flattened palms, and, lamenting aloud, then made this declaration:
“You can't blame me now, you who have homes on Olympos, 115 if I seek the Achaians' ships to avenge my son's killing, though it may be my fate to be struck by the bolt of Zeus, and to lie among other corpses in the blood and the dust.”

So he spoke, and commanded Terror and Rout to yoke his horses, while he himself put on his gleaming armor. 120 Then would yet greater, less endurable resentment and anger have been engendered between the immortals and Zeus, had not Athēnē, in great fear for all the gods, hurried out through the doorway, leaving the chair she sat on:
she took Arēs' shield from his shoulders, the helmet from his head, 125 the bronze spear from his brawny hand, and set it down, and lit into reckless Arēs with words of rebuke: “You're mad, out of your senses, done for! Your ears listen, but uselessly, your understanding and sense of shame have perished!
Didn't you hear what the goddess, white-armed Hērē, told us— 130
she who indeed has come straight here from Olympian Zeus?
Or do you intend to get your quota of suffering, and be forced back, in great distress, to Olympos, to sow for the rest of us the seeds of great misfortune?
Zeus will very soon leave the Achaians and the high-spirited 135 Trojans, will come to Olympos and throw us into confusion, laying hands on all alike, the innocent with the guilty.
So I'm telling you now to forego your wrath for your son, since in times past there's many a stronger, more dexterous fighter has been killed—and will be hereafter: it's a difficult business 140 to safeguard the line and the offspring of every last mortal.”

So saying, she made reckless Arēs return to his seat.
But Hērē summoned Apollo to come outside the hall, and Iris too, the messenger of the immortal gods, and addressed them both, speaking in winged words: 145 “Zeus orders the two of you to come with all speed to Ida, and when you've come, and looked on the face of Zeus, then to do whatsoever he may urge and command you."

So saying, the lady Hērē returned inside, and sat down on her chair, while the two went quickly on their way. 150

To spring-rich Ida they came, mother of wild beasts, and found Kronos's far-seeing son perched on the topmost peak of Gargaros, wreathed about with a fragrant cloud.

They approached, and stood before Zeus the cloud-gatherer.
At the sight of them he felt no wrath in his heart, 155 since they'd quickly obeyed the instructions of his dear wife.

To Iris first of the two he then addressed winged words:

"Go now, swift Iris, report to the lord Poseidōn all that I tell you; you're not to be a false messenger!

My command is, he shall cease from warfare and battle, 160 and seek the gods' company, or go down to the shining sea.

But if he ignores my words, or fails to obey them, let him ponder this well in his mind and in his heart:

Will he, strong though he is, have the will to confront my coming? I declare that I far surpass him in might, 165 am, too, the elder by birth—yet his heart does not hesitate to rank himself equal to me, whom all others dread."

So he spoke,
and wind-footed swift Iris did not disregard him, but went down from the mountains of Ida to sacred Ilion;
as when from the clouds snowflakes or frozen hail 170 pelt down, impelled by the north wind's blast, that's born in the clear heavens, so swiftly did urgent Iris fly, and stood by the far-famed Earth-Shaker, and addressed him:

"A message for you, O dark-maned Earth-Encirler, I'm here to deliver, from Zeus who bears the aegis. 175

His command is that you must cease from warfare and battle, and seek the gods' company, or go down to the shining sea.
But if you ignore his words, or fail to obey them, then he threatens to come here in person, and to confront you in man-to-man combat; and you should stay clear of his hands, 180 he says, since he far surpasses you in might, is, too, the elder by birth—yet your heart does not hesitate to rank yourself equal to him, whom all others dread."

Then to her,

much troubled, the far-famed Earth-Shaker responded: “Look now, great though he is, he’s speaking arrogantly 185 if he means to restrain me, his equal in honor, by force, against my will! Three brothers were born to Rhea by Kronos:
 Zeus and I, the third being Hādēs, lord of the dead.
 All was divided three ways: each of us got his domain—
 I was allotted the grey sea to dwell in forever when 190 the lots were shaken, while Hādēs obtained the murky darkness, and Zeus won the wide airy firmament and the clouds;
 but the earth and lofty Olympos remain common to us all.
 So I will in no way walk as Zeus is minded—let him, powerful though he is, stay at ease in his own third portion, 195 nor try to scare me with toughness, as though I were some mere weakling: better for him to threaten with violent words his own sons and daughters, those he sired himself, who’ll be obliged to obey him, whatever his commands.”

Then wind-footed swift Iris answered him: “Is this 200 really the message, O dark-maned Earth-Encirler, that I’m to take back to Zeus—so forceful, so unyielding?
 Or will you concede a little? Good men’s minds can be changed—and you know how the Furies always side with the elder-born.”

Poseidōn the Earth-Shaker now answered her once more: 205 “Iris, goddess, your message you delivered correctly:
 an excellent thing it is when the messenger knows what’s right!
 But there’s this bitter resentment comes over heart and soul whenever a person’s minded to upbraid in angry terms one of like station, to whom fate’s allotted an equal share. 210 Still, for now, despite my indignation, I’ll yield—but another thing I’ll tell you, and I make this threat in my rage:
 if, in spite of me—and Athēnē the spoil-bringer, and Hērē, and Hermēs, and Lord Hēphaistos—he spares steep Ilion, and proves unwilling to lay it waste, 215 or to concede to the Argives their great victory, then let him know this: that between us will be bitterness without cure.”

So saying, the Earth-Shaker left the Achaian forces, and plunged in the sea. The Achaian heroes missed him.
 Then Zeus the cloud-gatherer thus addressed Apollo: 220 “Go now, dear Phoibos, in search of bronze-clad Hektōr:

already the Earth-Encircler and Earth-Shaker has gone down into the shining sea, avoiding our unbridled wrath; others too must have learned of our fight, those gods who are in the lower world with Kronos.¹ 225
 But this way was far better, both for me and for him, that though earlier angered he still should yield to my hands, since not without sweat would this business have been settled.
 So do you now take in your hands the tasseled aegis, shake it at these Achaian heroes, put them to flight! 230 For yourself, long-distance archer, let illustrious Hektōr be your concern: stir up great rage in him, until the Achaians, routed, flee to their ships and the Hellespont.
 But from then on I myself will devise, in deed and word, how the Achaians once more shall have respite from the toil of war.” 235

So he spoke, and Apollo did not disregard his father, but went down from the mountains of Ida like a falcon—that swift dove-killer, of all winged creatures the swiftest.
 He found the son of wise Priam, noble Hektōr, no longer flat on his back, but sitting: he’d come round, 240 recognized the comrades around him; his gasping and sweating had stopped, ever since the will of Zeus of the aegis revived him. Apollo, far-worker, standing close, now said: “Hektōr, son of Priam, why, quite apart from the rest, are you sitting here, barely alive? Are you in some trouble?” 245 Bright-helmeted Hektōr asked faintly: “Which of the gods are you, noble sir, who thus question me face to face?

 Have you not heard how, at the ships’ sterns of the Achaians, as I was killing his comrades, Aias of the fine war cry hit my chest with a great rock, cut short my fighting valor? 250 Truly, I thought that day I’d be looking upon the dead in the house of Hādēs, after gasping my dear life out.”

Lord Apollo the far-worker then addressed him again: “Take heart now: such is the helper that the son of Kronos has sent from Ida to stand by you and protect you— 255 Phoibos Apollo of the golden sword! As in the past

1. The “lower world” is Tartaros, “as far beneath Hādēs as the sky is above the earth” (8.13–16), used as a kind of dumping ground and prison for defeated or rebellious gods and primeval monsters; the gods referred to here are the Titans (8.479–81).

I'm here to guard both you and your steep citadel!
 So come now, urge all your many charioteers to drive their swift horses on against the hollow ships, and I shall go forward, make the whole way smooth 260 for the horses—and I'll turn the Achaian heroes to flight."

So saying, he breathed great strength into the people's shepherd.
 Just as a stabled horse, that's fed well at its manger, will snap its halter and charge, hooves clattering, over the plain—since it likes to bathe in the nearest fast-flowing river— 265 proudly, head held high, its full mane streaming out over its shoulders, as, confident in its splendor, it plies its nimble limbs towards the haunts and pastures of mares:
 so Hektōr worked feet and knees fast, while urging on his charioteers, now that he'd heard the voice of the god. 270 As when an antlered stag or a wild goat is pursued by country folk along with their dogs, but is saved by some high rock face or shady thicket—the hunters are out of luck, they weren't fated to catch it, —and then a great bearded lion appears in their path, 275 roused by their shouting, turns all back, even the eager:
 so, for a while, the Danaäns kept up the chase in a body, jabbing away with their swords and double-edged spears;
 but when they saw Hektōr going to and fro in the ranks of the Trojans they panicked, their courage sank to their boots. 280

Then there spoke up among them Thoas, Andraimōn's son, far the best of the Aitōlians, well skilled with the javelin, a good hand-to-hand fighter too, while few Achaians outdid him at public speaking, when young warriors debated.
 He now with friendly intent spoke before the assembly: 285
 "Something truly amazing I'm now witnessing—the way he's recovered, has somehow eluded the death-spirits—yes, Hektōr! Every man jack of us had high hopes he'd died at the hands of Aias, Telamōn's son, but once more some god or other has rescued him, kept him alive— 290 Hektōr, who's unstrung the knees of so many Danaäns, as I fear will happen again now, since it can't be without loud-thundering Zeus that he stands as so ardent a champion!
 Come then, let's all of us do what I suggest:
 let's order the rank-and-file to return to the ships, 295

but we—all those who claim we're the cream of the army—let's stand and face him, see if we can thrust him back first, with leveled spears: I think, despite his determination, he'll be scared at heart to venture into the Danaäns' ranks."

So he spoke: they heard him out readily, and obeyed. 300

Those who were comrades of Aias and the lord Idomeneus and Teukros and Mērionēs and Megēs, Arēs' equal, summoned the finest warriors and prepared for battle, lined up to face the Trojans and Hektōr: meanwhile the common troops went back to the ships of the Achaians. 305

Now the Trojans advanced in a body, led by Hektōr, taking long strides, while in front of him Phoibos Apollo, shoulders enveloped in cloud, bore the fearsome aegis—terrible, shaggy-fringed, gleaming: the smith Hēphaistos gave it to Zeus to carry, to cause panic in mortals: 310 this Apollo had in his hands as he headed the attack.

The Argives in close order awaited them, and a piercing clamor arose from both sides, while arrows leapt from the bowstring, and many spears, hurled by bold hands, lodged, some of them, in the flesh of battle-swift youths, 315 though many, before they could reach a white body, stood fixed in the earth midway, still yearning to glut themselves with flesh.
Now so long as Phoibos Apollo kept the aegis still in his hands, the missiles from both sides struck home, and men kept falling;
but when, looking straight at the swift-horse Danaäns, 320 he shook it, and gave a great shout, he cast a spell on the hearts in their breasts: they forgot their fighting valor.
Just as a herd of cattle or a great flock of sheep can be stampeded in black night's darkness by a couple of wild beasts that come on them suddenly, when no herdsman's nearby, 325 so the Achaians were routed, their courage lost; for Apollo loosed panic on them, gave the glory to Hektōr and the Trojans.

Then man slew man once the conflict was broken open:
Hektōr brought down Arkesilaös and Stichios, the first a leader among the bronze-corseleted Boiōtians, 330 the second a trusty companion of great-hearted Menestheus, while Aineias finished off Medōn and Iasos. One of these, Medōn, was the bastard son of godlike Oileus and Aias's half-brother; but the place where he dwelt was in Phylakē, far from his homeland, since he'd killed a kinsman 335 of Eriōpis, his stepmother, whom Oīleus married; Iasos was a commander of the Athēnians, known as Sphēlos's son, and the grandson of Boukolos. Mēkisteus was taken down by Poulydamas, while Politēs slew Echios in the battle's forefront, and noble Agēnōr laid Klonios low, 340 and Paris stabbed Deīochos as he fled with the front-line fighters, from behind, in the lower shoulder, and drove the bronze clean through.

While they were stripping the gear from these men, the Achaians, tripped up by the stakes, caught in the ditch they'd dug, fled this way and that, were forced inside their own wall, 345 and Hektōr called out to the Trojans, in a carrying voice:
 "Press on to the ships, and forget the bloodstained spoils!
 Any man I see going elsewhere, not making for the ships, I'll do to death on the spot: he'll not get his due share of fire as a corpse from his kinsmen or kinswomen: 350 no, rather will dogs tear his flesh here, outside our city!"

So he spoke, brought the whip down hard, lashed on his horses, calling out to the Trojans along the ranks; and they all, cheering, together with him drove their horses onward, raising a fearsome clamor. Ahead of them Phoibos Apollo 355 easily kicked down the banks of the deep ditch, heaping them into the middle, creating a causeway both long and wide, as far as a spear will fly when a man's making trial of his strength. Along this now they streamed, still in formation, with Apollo in front 360 holding the awesome aegis, breaking down the Achaians' wall with no trouble. In the way that a child at the seaside first builds—as children will—sandcastles, but as part of the game, with feet and hands will then knock them down again, so you, lord Phoibos, destroyed all the long hard work 365 of the Argives, and also panicked them into flight.

So these made a halt by the ships, and held their ground, calling out one to another; then lifting up their hands to all the gods, prayed aloud, and most fervently of all Gerēnian Nestōr, protector of the Achaians, 370 prayed, stretching out his hands to the starry heavens: “Zeus, Father, if ever any of us, back in wheat-rich Argos, burned fat thigh-pieces of sheep or cattle, and prayed for a safe return, and you promised, and nodded in consent, remember that now, Olympian! Stand off our pitiless day—don’t let the Achaians be thus worsted by the Trojans!”

375

So he spoke in prayer: Zeus the counselor thundered loudly on hearing the prayer of the old man, Nēleus’s son.

But the Trojans, on hearing the thunder of Zeus of the aegis, pressed the Argives still harder in their relish for battle, and as a great wave of the wide-roaming sea bears down over a ship’s bulwarks, when winds at full gale force are driving it on—this really swells big breakers—so the Trojans, with loud shouts, kept coming beyond the wall, driving their horses on, joined the fight at the ships’ sterns with two-edged spears, in close combat: they fought from their chariots,
 and their foes, who’d climbed to the decks of their black ships, wielded long naval pikes that lay there for sea battles, jointed in sections, their ends all tipped with bronze.

380

385

Now Patroklos, so long as the Achaians and the Trojans were fighting for the wall, away from the swift ships, remained sitting back in the hut of kindly Eurypylos, cheering him up with chat while on his grievous wound he spread powerful applications to ease the black agony.
 But when he perceived the Trojans rushing the wall, and the Danaäns crying out in their panicked flight, then he groaned aloud, struck both thighs with the flat of his hands, and then, lamenting, uttered these words: “Eurypylos, there’s no way, despite your need for me, that I can remain here: a great conflict’s under way!
 Your attendant can entertain you—but I myself am going in all haste to Achilles, to urge him into battle.
 Who knows? With divine assistance I may yet arouse his spirit by argument: a friend has persuasive power.”

390

395

400

So saying, he hurried away. The Achaians stood firm, awaiting the Trojans’ assault, yet proved unable to thrust them back from the ships, though they were fewer,

405

while the Trojans never managed to break the Danaäns' ranks, and so get through in among the huts and the vessels.
 As the chalked string marks off a straight line on a ship's timber 410 in the hands of a skilled carpenter, who's familiar with all aspects of his high craft through Athēnē's promptings—so tautly and evenly was their conflict stretched between them.
 Some were fighting by one ship, some beside another, but Hektōr charged straight at famous Aias. They both 415 were battling for possession of the same ship, but were unable,
 the one to dislodge the other and set the ship on fire, or the other to force him back, since a god had brought him there.
 Then illustrious Aias speared Kalētōr in the chest—Klytios's son, who was bringing fire to burn up the ship, 420 and he fell with a thud, and the torch dropped from his hand.
 But when Hektōr took in the fact that it was his cousin who was down in the dust, out in front of the black ship, then he called to the Trojans and Lycians, in a carrying voice:
 "Trojans and Lycians! You Dardanian hand-to-hand fighters! 425 Don't back off one step from the fighting on this narrow front, but rescue the son of Klytios, don't let the Achaians strip a fallen man of his armor in this battle for the ships!"

So saying, he let fly his gleaming spear at Aias:
 him he missed, but Lykophrōn, Mastōr's son, 430 Aias's henchman from Kythēra, who lived with him now, after killing a man in sacred Kythēra—him he struck on the head, just over the ear, with the keen-edged bronze as he stood beside Aias: he slumped from the stern of the ship on his back in the dust, and his limbs were unstrung, and Aias 435 shivered, and said to his brother: "Teukros, dear heart, a most loyal comrade of ours has been killed, yes, the son of Mastōr, that guest from Kythēra whom we honored like our own parents during his stay in our halls—great-hearted Hektōr has slain him! Where, now, are your shafts 440 of swift death, where's the bow that Phoibos Apollo gave you?"

So he spoke: Teukros heard, ran up and stood beside him, grasping the back-bent bow and the quiver that held his arrows, and quickly let fly at the Trojans. His first shaft struck Kleitos—the splendid son of Peisēnōr, 445 comrade to Poulydamas, Pánthoös's noble son—who, reins in hand, was occupied with his horses, driving them where the most troops were in headlong flight, to oblige the Trojans and Hektōr. But a disaster soon caught him that none, though wanting to, could prevent: 450 for into the back of his neck flew the grief-laden arrow, and he fell from the driver's seat, while his horses shied aside, rattling the empty chariot. Lord Poulydamas, quickly observing this, was the first to come up and stop the horses:

 these he gave to Astynoös, Protiaön's son, 455 with firm orders to keep them in check, and close, and watch him, while he himself went back to rejoin the front-line fighters.

Teukros lined up another shaft against bronze-clad Hektōr, that would have cut short his fighting by the Achaians' ships had he hit him as he fought valiantly, would have taken his life away; 460
 but he failed to escape the notice of sharp-minded Zeus, who, guarding Hektōr, robbed Teukros of his glory, snapping the well-twisted string of his matchless bow as he drew it, so that the shaft with its weight of bronze flew wide of its target, and the bow dropped from his hand. 465 Then Teukros shivered, and thus addressed his brother:
 "Look, our battle plan's being ruined by some maleficent spirit, which struck the bow from my hand and broke the fresh-twisted bowstring I gave it this morning, to stand the force of shafts leaping out from it, thick and fast!" 470

Then great Aias, Telamōn's son, made him this answer:
 "So, brother, leave your bow and your showering arrows to lie where they are: some god with a grudge against the Achaians has disabled them. Take a lance, put a shield on your shoulder, join the fight with the Trojans, urge on our other troops! 475 Don't let them capture our benched ships without a struggle even though they've outfought us: let's put our minds to battle!"

So he spoke. Teukros stowed away his bow in the hut, and over his shoulders slung a fourfold shield, and on his strong head settled a well-made helmet 480 with horsehair crest, its plume nodding terribly above it, and picked out a solid spear, tipped with sharpened bronze, and went on his way, at the double, to stand with Aias.

When Hektōr saw that Teukros's shafts were made useless
 He called out to Trojans and Lycians in a carrying voice: 485
 "Trojans and Lycians! You Dardanian hand-to-hand fighters!
 Be men, my friends! Remember your fighting valor here by the hollow ships, for I've seen, with my own eyes, one of their best men's weapons rendered harmless by Zeus!
 Easily recognized is the aid Zeus gives to men, 490 both by those on whom he bestows the greater glory and those whom he diminishes, has no mind to assist, as now he's reducing the Argives' strength, and supporting us.
 So close ranks, and fight by the ships; and if any man, whether shot or speared, meets his death and destiny, 495 let him die! No dishonor if it's in defense of one's country that he dies: his wife will be safe, and his children after him, and his house and land intact if it be that the Achaians sail away with their ships to their own dear fatherland."

So saying he stirred the strength and spirit of every man. 500
 On the other side Aias too called out to his comrades:
 "For shame, Argives! Now it's certain: we must perish, unless we can save ourselves by removing this danger from the ships!
 Do you think, if bright-helmeted Hektōr captures our ships, you'll each of you then walk home to your native country? 505 Can't you hear the way that Hektōr's firing up all his troops in his consuming passion to set the ships ablaze?
 It's not to a dance he's inviting them, but to battle!
 For us there's no better counsel or purpose than this,
 to grapple with them, in furious hand-to-hand combat— 510 better, once and for all, either to perish or survive than to be worn out in this grim and hopeless conflict beside the ships, by men inferior to ourselves."

So saying, he encouraged each man's strength and spirit.
 Then Hektōr slew Schedios, Perimēdēs's son, 515 a leader of Phokians, and Aias took down Laodamas, an infantry captain, Antēnōr's handsome son, while Poulydamas killed a Kyllēnian, Ōtos, the comrade of Phyleus's son, the great-hearted Epeians' leader.
 Megēs, on seeing this, sprang at Poulydamas, who 520 ducked away from the blow. Megēs missed him—Apollo would not let Pánthoös's son be vanquished among the front-line fighters—but instead hit Khroismos full in the chest with his spear.

 He fell with a thud: Megēs started stripping the gear from his shoulders, but Dolops, a highly skilled spearman, attacked him, 525
 Lampos's most warlike son, and Laomedōn's grandson, a man well acquainted with fighting valor, who now thrust his spear squarely into the shield of Phyleus's son, coming at him from close quarters. But the thick and plated corselet he wore protected him, that Phyleus long ago 530 brought back out of Ephyrē, by the Sellēis river, a gift from a guest-friend—Euphētēs, lord of men—to wear in battle, a defense against enemies: this was what now kept destruction from the flesh of his son.
 Megēs took aim at Dolops's bronze horsehair-plumed 535 helmet with his sharp spear, hit its topmost plate, broke off its horsehair crest, so that the whole piece, freshly dyed scarlet, fell to the dusty ground.
 As Megēs, holding his ground, fought Dolops, still hoping to win, Menelaös the warlike came over to help him, stood 540 with his spear, unseen, broadside on: threw, from behind, and pierced Dolops's shoulder. The point tore through his chest, driving onward: he collapsed on his face. They both rushed forward, eager to strip the bronze armor off his shoulders.
 But Hektōr called out to his kinsmen, one and all: the first 545 to get the rough edge of his tongue was Hiketaōn's son, strong Melanippos. Till lately, the foe still far off, he'd stayed to pasture his shambling cattle back at Perkōtē, but when the Danaäns came with their curved ships, then he went back to Ilion, won distinction among the Trojans, 550 and lived with Priam, who treated him like his own son. Him now Hektōr upbraided in these words: "Are we to give up like this, Melanippos? Does your dear heart feel nothing for your slain cousin? Do you not see the way they're busily taking possession of Dolops's battle gear? 555
 So come on with me: no longer can we fight the Argives from a distance—either we must slaughter them now, or else root and branch they'll vanquish steep Ilion, slaughter her people."
 That said, he led on: Melanippos, mortal but godlike, followed, while Telamōn's son, great Aias, urged on the Argives: 560

“My friends, be men now, let shame into your hearts, feel shame before one another in this violent combat—
of those who feel shame more survive than lose their lives, while runaways get no glory, win no battles.”

So he spoke. They themselves were hot to stand off the foe, 565 and laid up his words in their hearts, fenced the ships about with a hedge of bronze. While Zeus roused the Trojans against them, Menelaös, of the fine war cry, encouraged Antilochos:
“No other Achaian, Antilochos, is younger than you, or a swifter runner, or as valiant in battle— 570 could you not spring out in front, hit a Trojan fighter?”

So saying, he backed off himself, but stirred up Antilochos, who emerged from the front-line troops, took aim with his bright spear,
glancing quickly around. The Trojans all shrank back as he threw; not in vain was his missile cast, but struck 575 Hiketaön's son, overconfident Melanippos, in the torso, by one nipple, as he came to the battle line, and he fell with a thud, and darkness shrouded his eyes, and Antilochos leapt upon him, like a hunting dog pinning down a wounded fawn, that some hunter aims at 580 and hits as it darts from its den, and unstrings its limbs:
even so on you, Melanippos, did warlike Antilochos leap to strip you of your armor. But he failed to escape the notice of noble Hektör, who ran through the fighting to confront him.
Antilochos didn't stay put, nimble fighter though he was, 585 but fled like a wild beast that's done something really bad—such as kill a dog or a herdsman guarding his cattle—and makes its escape before a mass pursuit gets started:
so fled the son of Nestör, while the Trojans and Hektör noisily showered their pain-laden missiles at him— 590 but he turned and stood at bay when he reached his comrades.

The Trojans still, like lions that devour raw flesh, kept up their assault on the ships, obeying the behests of Zeus, who constantly stirred up great fury in them, but beguiled the Argives' hearts, stole their glory, spurred on their opponents, 595 since to Hektör, Priam's son, it was that his heart longed to give the glory, to let him cast fire, consuming and weariless, on the curved ships, and thus finally to fulfill the exorbitant prayer of Thetis. What Zeus the counselor was waiting for was to see the flare of a burning ship, 600 since at that point he'd arrange a repulse of the Trojans from the ships, and thus to the Danaäns now grant glory.

 With this end in mind, he urged Priam's son Hektör on against the hollow ships—he being eager enough already, as enraged as Arēs the spear-wielder, or like a deadly fire 605 raging up in the mountains, in a deep wood's thickets.
 Foam gathered round his mouth, and his eyes blazed bright under his shaggy brows, and about his temples fearsomely quivered the helmet of this embattled man, of Hektör, for from high heaven came as his helper— 610 alone though he was among many—Zeus himself, to grant him honor and glory, since he was fated to be short-lived, for already his day of doom at the hands of Pēleus's violent son was being hastened by Pallas Athēnē.
 And now his aim was to break the ranks by assault, 615 wherever he saw the most troops and the finest armor:
 yet not even so could he break them, enraged though he was,
 for they stood firm, set like a high wall, or a rocky headland, huge and sheer, that faces the grey sea, holding its own against the screaming gales' swift tracks 620 and the swollen breakers that belch forth their might against it.
 Just so the Danaäns stood off the Trojans, were not routed.
 But Hektör, agleam like bright fire, now assailed their ranks, fell upon them, as when a wave falls on a swift ship beneath the clouds, fierce, wind-driven, and the entire 625 vessel is hidden in foam, and the gale's wild blast comes roaring against the sail, and the mariners quake in terror, being borne along on the very edge of death—so too the Achaians' courage was shredded in their breasts, for Hektör assailed them like a killer lion that's found 630 cows grazing the bottomland beside an extensive marsh—lots of them, watched by a herdsman who as yet has no idea how to fight a wild beast off from a sleek heifer's carcass:
 he always either keeps pace with the leading cows, or with those in the rear; but it's in the middle the lion now pounces 635 to devour a heifer: the rest stampede in panic. Just so the Achaians were now stampeded by Hektör and Zeus the Father:

all of them, even though Hektōr slew only Periphētēs from Mykēnai, dear son of Kopreus, who'd served as a messenger from the lord Eurystheus to that mighty force Hēraklēs: 640 by him, a far meaner father, was sired a son who proved better in all kinds of excellence—speed of foot, warfare, brains: in all these he ranked with Mykēnai's leading men.
 This it was now that increased the glory he gave Hektōr, for as he turned back, he tripped over his own shield's rim, 645 one that reached to his feet, a defense against javelins:
 on this he stumbled, fell backwards, and about his temples loud clanged the helmet as he went down. Now Hektōr was quick to note this, ran swiftly up beside him, planted a spear in his chest, and—so close to his own comrades— 650 slew him. Though sad for their comrade, these could not rescue him, being themselves too scared of noble Hektōr.

They came in among the ships, and the beam-ends of those vessels first drawn up confined them; but their enemies still followed: the Argives were forced to make a further retreat 655 from the outermost ships, but held a line by their huts all in a body, not scattering through the camp for very shame and fear. They kept calling to one another, and above all Gerēnian Nestōr, the Achaians' guardian, begged each man, imploring him in his parents' name: 660
 "My friends, be men now, let shame into your hearts before other men; and remember, each one of you, your children and wives, your possessions and your parents whether for you they're living or dead! On behalf of them, far distant now, I who am here beseech you 665 to make a strong stand, not to turn back in craven flight!"

So saying, he stirred up each man's strength and spirit.
 From their eyes Athēnē removed the heavenly cloud of mist, and clear light shone down on them on either side, on that of the ships, and that of levelling warfare. Thus all 670 could see Hektōr, good at the war cry, and his comrades—both those holding back in the rear, not committed to battle, and all who were fighting the good fight beside the swift ships.

No longer did it suffice the courageous heart of Aias to stand back where the other Achaians' sons had withdrawn to: 675

he went with great strides from deck to deck of the ships, in his hands a huge pike that was intended for sea battles, jointed in sections, and twenty-two cubits long.
 As a man who's an expert rider of horses harnesses four out of many together, and drives them at a smart clip 680 from the plain towards a great city, using the public highway, with everyone marveling at him, both men and women, while he, quite safely, and controlling all his movements, will leap from horse to horse as they gallop on—so Aias kept ranging from deck to deck of the various 685 ships with long strides, and his voice went up to heaven as, fearsomely shouting, he kept exhorting the Danaäns to safeguard their ships and huts. Nor did Hektör hold back among the common mass of the well-corseleted Trojans, but as a tawny eagle will swoop down on a covey 690 of winged fowl feeding beside the bank of a river—geese or cranes, or long-necked swans—so Hektör made straight for a dark-prowed ship, charging right at it, while Zeus from behind thrust him forward with one mighty hand, cheering on both Hektör himself and the troops that went with him. 695
 So once more bitter fighting took place beside the ships:
 you'd have thought they were facing each other now in battle fresh and unwearied, so determinedly did they fight, and as they fought, these were their thoughts: the Achaians feared they would never escape from danger, but would perish; 700 and as for the Trojans, the heart in each man's breast hoped to fire the ships and to kill the Achaian heroes.
 Such were their thoughts as they stood confronting one another.
 Now Hektör caught hold of the stern of a fine seafaring ship, swift to traverse salt water, that had carried Prōtesilaös 705 to Troy, but never returned him to his own dear fatherland.
 It was all around his ship that Achaians and Trojans were engaged in hand-to-hand slaughter, nor did they now await volleys of arrows and javelins, but came right in, squared off at close quarters, the same thought in every mind, 710 and battled it out with sharp axes and hatchets, large swords and double-edged spears; many fine sword blades there were, hilts bound with black cord, that found their way to the ground, some dropped from the hands, some fallen from shoulder baldrics of men as they fought, and the black earth ran with blood. 715

Hektōr, the ship's stern once grasped, would not let go of it, kept his hands on the sternpost as he called out to the Trojans:
"Bring fire here, and you all as one man raise the war cry, for Zeus has now granted us a day worth all the rest, to take the ships that came here against the gods' will 720 and have brought us much trouble, through the cowardice of old men who, when I was ready to fight by the ships' sterns held me back, and restrained my troops. Though it may have been far-seeing Zeus who at that time addled our wits, now it's he who's urging us on—indeed, commanding us!" 725

So he spoke, and they redoubled their onslaughts on the Argives.
Now Aias, hard pressed by missiles, stood firm no longer but backed off a little, thinking he well might die, along the seven-foot cross-bench, and left the trim ship's deck, and stood there, watching warily, using a spear to thrust back, 730 away from the ships, any Trojan who came with a flaming torch, and kept urging the Danaäns on, in his terrifying voice:

"Friends! Danaän heroes! You henchmen of Arēs!
Be men, my friends! Call up your fighting courage!
Do we suppose we have other helpers at our backs? 735
Or some stronger wall, to ward off disaster from our troops?
No way—and there's no close city, well fortified with towers, where we could find allies, turn back this assault together!
Here we're stuck, here, on the well-armored Trojans' terrain, our backs to the sea, far away from our native country: 740
In our own hands lies our salvation, not in respite from battle!"

So saying, Aias, enraged, made fierce play with his keen-edged spear:
any Trojan who now came charging against the hollow ships with a blazing torch, in answer to Hektōr's exhortations, Aias would wait for, and wound with that same long spear, 745 and a dozen men he laid low in close combat beside the ships.

Book 16

While these fought on around the well-benched vessel, Patroklos came and stood by Achilles, the people's shepherd, shedding warm tears, like a spring of black-sourced water that sends its dark stream coursing down some deserted rock face.
At the sight of him swift-footed noble Achilles felt pity, 5 and addressed himself to him, speaking with winged words:
"Why are you weeping, Patroklos, like a girl, a small child who runs to her mother's side and begs to be picked up, clutching at her dress, delays her when she's busy, looks up at her tearfully, till she gives in and carries her? 10
That's what you're like, Patroklos, shedding those big round tears!
Have you got some news for the Myrmidons, or for me myself, or a message from Phthië that you alone know about?
Menoitios, Aktōr's son, still lives, they say, and Pēleus Aiakos's son, is alive there, among the Myrmidons— 15 for those two indeed we'd grieve sorely if they were dead!
Or is your lament for the Argives, the way they're being slaughtered by the hollow ships, on account of their own presumption?
Speak up, don't keep it a secret—we both should know it."

Then, horseman Patroklos, sighing heavily, you replied: 20
"Ah, Achilles, Pēleus's son, far the mightiest of the Achaians, do not be angry! Such trouble has come upon the Achaians—for all those who were once the very best of our warriors are laid up aboard their ships, either shot or speared:
shot is the son of Tydeus, mighty Diomēdēs, 25
speared are Odysseus, famed spearman, and Agamemnōn,
shot, too, is Eurypylos, with an arrow through his thigh.
Healers well-skilled in medicaments are now busy about them, treating their wounds. But Achilles, you are so stubborn!
Never may such wrath master me, as that which you cherish 30 in your lethal valiance! How will men not yet born profit by you, if you don't keep vile ruin from the Argives?
Pitiless man, your father was not Pēleus the horseman, nor was Thetis your mother: no, the grey sea bore you, and the towering rocks, for your mind is unchangeable! 35

 But if in your thoughts it's some prophecy you're evading, —some word from Zeus passed on by your lady mother—at least send me out now, and the rest of the Myrmidon force with me, and maybe I'll prove a light to the Danaäns—and give me your armor, to wear on my own shoulders, 40 so the Trojans may take me for you, back off from the fighting, let the Achaians' warlike sons, who are now exhausted, catch their breath: too brief is the breathing space from battle.
 We're fresh, not tired—we should easily drive men exhausted
 by battle back to the city, away from the ships and huts." 45

Such his entreaty, the great fool: but as fate decreed, his own ghastly death and destruction it was for which he prayed.

To him swift-footed Achilles, deeply troubled, then replied:
 "Ah, me, Zeus-born Patroklos, what's this that you've said?
 I'm not bothered by any prophecy that I know of, 50 nor has my lady mother told me of any word from Zeus; but there's bitter grief invades both heart and spirit when a man decides to rob somebody who's his equal and take back his prize, just because he has the greater power!
 Bitter grief this to me, for I was wounded in my pride. 55
 That girl the Achaians' sons had given me as an award, whom I won with my spear after sacking a well-walled city—her now has the lord Agamemnōn, yes, Atreus's son, snatched back from my arms, as though I were some unhonored refugee!
 Still, all this we'll let go as past and done with: no way 60 was it in my heart to be wrathful for ever, although I did declare I'd not put an end to my anger until the sounds of war and the fighting arrived at my own ships.
 So do you, then, array my famed armor on your shoulders, and lead out the war-loving Myrmidons into battle, 65 if indeed the dark cloud that's the Trojans has surrounded the ships by main force, and the seashore with a thin strip of land is all that's left in the hands of the Argives, and the Trojans' whole city has come out in force against them, boldly, since they don't see the light glinting off my helmet 70 up close—soon enough they'd be routed, choking the creeks with their corpses, if only the lord Agamemnōn had been minded to treat me well, whereas now they're fighting around the camp!

For not in the hands of Diomēdēs, Tydeus's son, is the spear now raging to hold off disaster from the Danaäns, 75 nor as yet have I heard the voice of Atreus's son bellowing out of his loathsome head; no, it's man-killing Hektōr's I hear echoing round me, exhorting the Trojans, while they with their war whoops fill all the plain, as they trounce the Achaians.
 Yet even so, Patroklos, to keep disaster from the ships 80 have at them mightily, lest with their blazing torches they fire the ships and deprive us of our longed-for return!
 Now: follow well the instructions I shall put in your mind, so you'll win me great honor and glory from all the Danaäns, and they'll deliver that beautiful girl 85 back to me, along with more splendid gifts besides.
 When you've driven them from the ships, come right back here!
 Should Hērē's loud-thundering husband let you achieve glory, don't be too eager to go battling on without me against the war-loving Trojans: you'd diminish my honor. 90 Nor should you become so exultant in warfare and fighting that, while you're killing Trojans, you press on towards Ilion, lest one of the gods eternal descends from Olympos and pitches in: Apollo the archer loves them dearly.
 Turn back as soon as you've set the light of deliverance 95 among the ships; leave the others to battle it out on the plain.
 How much I wish—Zeus, Father, Athēnē, and Apollo!— that not one out of all the Trojans might escape death, nor a single Argive, but that only we two should not perish, and together, alone, should loosen Troy's sacred diadem!¹ 100

Such was their conversation, each to the other. Meanwhile Aias no longer held firm, being hard-pressed by missiles, overcome by the will of Zeus, and the noble Trojans all letting fly at him: terribly rang the gleaming helmet about his temples as it was struck: the well-wrought 105 cheekpieces took endless hits, his left shoulder grew weary as he held up his bright shield. Yet they remained unable to knock it away from him, despite their many missiles.
 He kept gasping painfully, the sweat poured down in rivers

1. "[T]he breaching of the citadel's ring of walls is compared to a captive woman's headdress being torn off," Janko explains (329). The word here translated metaphorically as "diadem" (κρήδεμνον, krēdemnon), originally meant something like a mantilla or formal veil.

from all his limbs, he never was given the least chance to catch his breath: on all sides trouble was piled on trouble. 110

Tell me now, you Muses, whose homes are on Olympos, how fire first came to be flung on the Achaians' ships!

Hektōr confronted Aias and struck his ash-wood spear with his own great sword, near the socket below the tip, 115 and sheared the tip clean away, so that Aias, Telamōn's son, was left with a mere lopped shaft, while far from him the bronze spearhead clanged as it fell to the ground, and Aias recognized, with a shudder, in his peerless heart the work of the gods, saw all his battle plans had been wrecked by loud-thundering Zeus, who wanted victory for the Trojans. 120

He backed off from the missiles; the Trojans flung weariless fire on the swift ship: at once unquenchable flames broke out, and the whole stern was set ablaze. But now Achilles struck both hands upon his thighs, and called out to Patroklos: 125

"Up with you now, Zeus-born Patroklos, master horseman!

I clearly see by the ships the rush of devouring fire!

Don't let them take the ships, leave us no way of escape!

Arm yourself quickly, I'll muster the men."

So he spoke,

and Patroklos accoutered himself in the gleaming bronze. 130

The greaves first he fastened on about his shins—

finely made, and fitted with silver ankle-pieces.

Next, to cover his chest, he put on the corselet, fine-wrought and starry, of Aiakos's swift-footed grandson.

About his shoulders he slung the silver-studded sword 135

of bronze, and next grasped the shield, both huge and sturdy.

Then he set on his noble head the well-made helmet,

with its horsehair crest nodding terribly above it, and picked out two strong spears, well fitted to his grasp;

but of Aiakos's peerless scion the spear alone he left— 140 massive and strong, that no other Achaian fighter could wield, but only Achilles had the strength to wield it, the Pēlian spear of ash wood, that Cheirōn had given his father, felled on Pēlion's heights, to be the death of heroes.

The horses he ordered Automedōn to harness quickly— 145

the man whom he honored highest after Achilles the rank-breaker, and held as most trustworthy to await his battle orders.

 For him now Automedōn yoked up the swift horses—Xanthos and Balios, fleet as the gale's blast, that the storm mare Podargē conceived to the west wind 150 as she browsed in the meadows beside the stream of Ocean—while in the side traces he harnessed unmatchable Pēdasos, the horse that Achilles bore off when he took Ēētiōn's city, and which, though mortal, kept pace with those immortal coursers.

Meanwhile Achilles went to and fro through the huts, 155 getting the Myrmidons armed in their battle gear: like wolves that devour raw flesh, boundless fury in their hearts, and have killed a great antlered stag up in the mountains, and tear at the corpse, their jaws all reddened with blood, and then go off in a pack to some black-water spring 160 to lap with their narrow tongues at its dark flow's surface, belching up blood from the killing, while in their breasts the spirit is dauntless, and their bellies are glutted—so did the Myrmidons' leaders and chieftains quickly assemble around the noble henchman of Aiakos's swift-foot grandson, 165 while there in the midst of them stood warlike Achilles, urging on both horses and shield-bearing warriors.

Fifty were the swift ships that Achilles, beloved of Zeus, had brought to Troy as commander, and in each one fifty men, his companions, sat at the thole-pins: 170 five in whom he had trust he'd made captains, to issue orders, while he himself was the high commander over them all.
 The first squadron's captain, Menesthios, he of the bright corselet, was the son of Spercheios, Zeus's rain-fed river, whom Pēleus's daughter, the beautiful Polydōra, bore, 175 to unwearied Spercheios, a woman laid by a god, though in name she conceived him by Bōros, Periērēs' son, who openly wed her, and paid a bride-price past reckoning.
 Of the second squadron the captain was warlike Eudōros, born, though out of wedlock, to a fine dancer, Polymēlē, 180 daughter of Phylas: it was the strong Argos-slayer who fell in love when he saw her among the maiden singers dancing for Artemis, she of the loud chase, the golden arrows.
 No waiting: Hermēs the healer went up into her room, lay with her secretly: she bore him a splendid son, 185

Eudōros, outstanding as both swift runner and warrior.

But when finally Eileithyia, goddess of childbirth, brought him out to the light, and he saw the sun's rays for the first time, Echeklos, Aktōr's son, a man of might and power, took him home, having paid a bride-price past reckoning, 190 and old Phylas brought him up well, and cherished him dearly, giving him all the love he'd have given a son of his own.

The captain of the third squadron was warlike Peisandros, Maimalos's son, unrivalled among all the Myrmidons in spear-fighting, second only to the comrade of Pēleus's son. 195
The fourth squadron was led by Phoinix the old horseman, and the fifth by Alkimedōn, Laerkēs' peerless son.

Then when Achilles had mustered them all in good order, them and their captains, he spoke very harshly to them:

"Let none of you Myrmidons be unmindful of those threats 200 with which beside the swift ships you menaced the Trojans throughout the time of my wrath, each one of you blaming me:
'Stubborn Achilles,' you cried, 'did your mother rear you on gall?
Pitiless man, who hold back your comrades by the ships against their will! Let's go home, then, with our seafaring vessels, 205 since this loathsome bile has so invaded your spirit!'
With such charges you'd often assail me when you all met; but now a great work of war confronts you, what you once longed for, so let each of you with a bold heart go battle the Trojans!"

So saying he roused the passion and spirit of every man, 210 and their ranks drew closer together when they heard their king.

As a man with close-fitting stones erects the wall of a tall house, builds to defy the fury of the winds—so closely pressed were their helmets and bossed shields, bucklers, helmets, and men packed so tight together 215 that the horsehair crests on their helmets' gleaming bosses nudged as they bent their heads, so close were the ranks, while, out in front of them all, two armed warriors stood—Automedōn and Patroklos, each with the same intent:

to do battle before the Myrmidons. But meanwhile Achilles 220 went into his hut, and lifted the lid of a chest—fine, intricately wrought, that silver-footed Thetis had stowed on his ship to go with him, filled it with tunics and cloaks to keep out the wind chill, and thick woolen rugs.

In it Achilles kept a fine-crafted cup, from which 225 no other man could drink the fire-bright wine, and he poured libations from it to no god but Zeus the Father.
 This cup he took from the chest, first cleansed it with sulphur, then rinsed it off in fresh-flowing streams of water, washed his own hands, and drew the fire-bright wine. 230 Now he stood in the forecourt and prayed, poured out the wine gazing skyward, not unseen by Zeus who delights in thunder:
 "Zeus, king, Pelasgian, Dōdōnean, distant-dweller, ruler in wintry Dōdōna—where round you live the Selloi, with unwashed feet, your interpreters, who sleep on the ground— 235 just as before you heard my message when I prayed, and honored me by smiting the forces of the Achaians, so once again for me now accomplish my desire!
 I myself shall remain here, where the ships are drawn up, but my comrade I'm sending out, with a body of Myrmidons, 240 to do battle: far-seeing Zeus, send out glory with him, make strong the heart in his breast, that Hektōr too may know whether my henchman's skilled in the business of warfare when he's alone, or whether his hands irresistibly rage only when I myself also enter the grind of battle. 245
 And after he's freed our vessels from the fight and its clamor, then unscathed let him come back to me at the swift ships with all my battle gear and my front-rank comrades."

 So he spoke in prayer, and Zeus the counselor heard him.
 One wish the Father granted, but refused him the other: 250 that Patroklos from their ships should drive off warfare and combat
 he granted, but a safe return from battle he denied him.

 His libation made, after praying to Zeus the Father Achilles returned to his hut, put away the cup in its chest, then went back outside the hut, and stood there, still determined 255 to watch the fearsome conflict between Trojans and Achaians.

 Now those armed and ready with great-hearted Patroklos marched on, till with high resolve they assailed the Trojans.
 All at once they came charging out like a swarm of wasps by the roadside that boys have a way of provoking to fury, 260 constantly teasing them in their nests along the highway, as children will, creating a widespread nuisance, so that if some traveller passing by should happen to annoy them by accident, they with aggressive spirit all come buzzing out in defense of their offspring— 265 like them in heart and spirit the Myrmidons now streamed forth from the ships, and an endless clamor arose, and Patroklos called in a carrying voice to his comrades:

“Myrmidons, comrades of Pēleus’s son Achilles, be men, my friends, bear in mind your fighting spirit, 270 win honor for Pēleus’s son, far the best of the Argives by the ships, he and his henchmen, all of them front-line fighters—that Atreus’s son, wide-ruling Agamemnōn, may know his blind delusion in failing to honor the best of the Achaians!”

So saying he stirred the strength and spirit of every man, 275 and they fell in a pack on the Trojans, while all around them the ships echoed dauntingly to the Achaians’ war cries, and when the Trojans saw Menoitios’s valiant son, himself and his henchman, both agleam in their armor, their hearts quaked, and all their ranks were shaken: they thought 280
the swift-footed son of Pēleus, there by the ships, had foregone his wrath and turned instead to alliance, and each man looked for some way to escape sheer ruin.

Patroklos was the first to let fly his gleaming spear, right into the midst, where most troops were huddled together, 285 by the stern of the ship of great-hearted Prōtesilaös, and he hit Pyraichmēs, who’d brought his Paiōnian horsemen from Amydōn, close by the wide-flowing Axios river.
Pyraichmēs’ right shoulder he hit, and he fell back in the dust, groaning aloud, and his comrades around him panicked; 290 for Patroklos by killing their leader, that outstanding fighter, spread terror throughout the ranks of all the Paiōnians.
Back from the ships he drove them and put out the blazing fire, leaving the ship half-burnt there, while the Trojans retreated with an astonishing outcry, the Danaäns hot on their heels 295 among the hollow ships: the outcry was never-ending.
As from the topmost peak of some lofty mountain a thick cloud is moved away by lightning-gatherer Zeus, and all the heights are revealed, the towering headlands and glens, and from on high the infinite air shines clear— 300

so the Danaäns, when they'd thrust off devouring fire from the ships got a short breathing space. Yet from warfare there was no respite, for not yet were the Trojans by the warlike Achaians driven in headlong rout, away from the black ships, but still fought back, even when forced to give up ground. 305

Then, as the conflict spread widely, man slew man among the leaders: first, Menoitios's valiant son hit Areilykos in the thigh with a cast of his sharp-edged spear just as he turned to run. The bronze was driven clean through, the spear shattered his thighbone, he sank to the ground 310 face downward. Menelaös the warrior wounded Thoas where his shield left his torso exposed and unstrung his limbs;

 and Phyleus's son, waiting as Amphiklos made his charge, got his own blow in first, at the top of the leg, where a man's muscle is thickest: around the point of his spear 315
 the tendons were sliced apart, darkness shrouded his eyes.

One son of Nestör, Antilochos, with his sharp spear wounded Atymnios, drove the bronze point clean through his flank, and he slumped at his feet. Then Maris from close quarters faced Antilochos with his spear, enraged for his brother's sake, 320 standing in front of the corpse, but godlike Thrasy-mēdēs moved in before he could strike, and did not miss, but hit his shoulder: the spear point stripped away the base of his arm from its muscles, shattered the bone.

He fell with a thud, and darkness shrouded his eyes. 325
 So these two, laid low by two brothers, went on their way to Erebos—noble comrades, both, of Sarpēdōn, spearmen sons of Amisōdaros, who reared the monstrous Chimaira to bring disaster to many a mortal.

Aias the son of Oileus now went for Kleoboulos 330 and took him alive, a man who'd tripped in the crush; then unleashed his strength, struck with his hilted sword at the man's neck: the whole blade was warmed by his blood, scarlet death and all-mastering fate overpowered his eyes.

Pēneleōs and Lykōn now ran at each other—they'd both 335 missed with their spears, had let fly to no purpose, so now they moved in with their swords: Lykōn aimed a blow at the helmet's boss with its horsehair crest, but his sword broke off near the hilt, while Pēnelaös struck him under his ear on the neck—the blade sheared in so deep 340 that only the skin held firm: his head hung, his limbs went slack.

 Mērionēs, striding quickly, now overtook Akamas as he mounted his chariot, scored a hit on his right shoulder:
 he slumped from the chariot, a mist obscured his eyes.
 Idomeneus speared Erymas with his pitiless bronze 345 in the mouth: the bronze point sheared clean through beneath the brain, split the white bones apart, shook his teeth loose, while both his eyes were flooded with blood, and, as he gaped, from his mouth and nostrils blood spurted, and death's black cloud enshrouded him. 350

So these Danaän leaders each of them slew his man, and as wolves attack lambs or kids in their ravening hunger, picking them off from the flocks, when through their shepherd's carelessness they're scattered up in the hills, and the wolves, seeing this, promptly snatch the timorous young ones— 355 just so did the Danaäns fall on the Trojans, who then sought refuge in ill-famed flight, forgot their fighting spirit.

Great Aias as always was eager to let fly a spear at bronze-panoplied Hektōr, who, highly skilled in warfare, broad shoulders protected by his bull's-hide shield, 360 kept alert for the whirr of arrows, the thud of spears:
 though he recognized that the tide of victory was turning, even so he remained, did his best to save his loyal comrades.
 As from Olympos a cloud comes into the heavens from the bright upper air, when Zeus deploys a tempest, 365 so from the ships came the sound of cheers and panic as the Trojans, disordered, recrossed the ditch. Now Hektōr was carried out, with his gear, by his fast horses, left the Trojan troops behind, to be stopped, frustrated, by the Greek-dug ditch, in which many swift horses broke 370 their pole at the end, abandoned their masters' chariots.
 Patroklos, hot in pursuit, called urgently on the Danaäns, planning ills for the Trojans, who, shouting and panic-stricken, choked all the ways, broken-ranked, while high in the air a dust storm formed under the clouds, and the whole-hoofed horses 375 strained hard back to the city from the ships and huts.
 Wherever Patroklos saw men huddled the thickest, there he drove, shouting: beneath his axles new victims kept slumping down from their chariots, that then overturned; and right over the trench his swift horses—those immortal 380 steeds that the gods gave to Pēleus, glorious gifts—pressed eagerly forward; his heart now urged him against Hektōr, hot to attack; but Hektōr's own swift horses saved him.

 As under a storm cloud the whole black earth's weighed down at harvest time, when rainfall from Zeus is torrential, 385 as he, enraged, takes punitive measures against those men who in the assembly enforce their crook-backed judgments and drive justice out, indifferent to the scrutiny of the gods; and all their swollen rivers are overflowed, and many a hillside's scored deeply by the plunging torrents 390 that roar headlong down from the mountains into the dark sea, and men's tilled fields are ruined—so loud and grieving was the neighing of those Trojan mares as they sped on their way.
 When Patroklos had cut off the front ranks from their retreat he herded them back to the ships, would not let them go on 395 to the city, much though they longed to, but in between the ships, the high wall, and the river he ranged amongst them killing, exacting requital for the deaths of many.
 Here he hit Pronoös first with his gleaming spear, in the chest, left exposed by the shield, and unstrung his limbs: 400 he fell with a thud. Next Patroklos charged at Thestōr, Ēnops's son, who crouched there in his polished chariot, out of his mind with terror, while from his hands the reins slipped away. Patroklos closed in with his spear, rammed the right side of his jaw, drove the spear through his teeth, 405
 dragged him over the chariot's rim, like a man who, perched on a jutting rock, reels in a sacred fish from the deep on his line and bright bronze hook: just so from the chariot on his bright spear he hauled in the gaping Pronoös, dumped him face downwards. He dropped, and life fled from him. 410 Next Erylaös, charging at him, he hit with a rock square on the head, which split completely in two inside his heavy helmet: he collapsed on the ground face foremost, and death, the spirit-queller, embraced him.
 Amphoteros next, Erymas and Epaltēs, Tlēpolemos son 415 of Damastōr, then Echios, Pyris, and Ipheus, as well as Euippos, and Argeas's son Polymēlos—all these in turn he laid low on the nurturing earth.

When Sarpēdōn saw his comrades of the unbelted tunics being felled at the hands of Menoitios's son Patroklos, 420 he cried out, addressing his words to the godlike Lycians:
"Shame on you, Lycians! Where are you fleeing? Be keen now!
I myself shall confront this fellow, so I may learn just who he is that's unmatched here, who's inflicted such hurt on the Trojans, who's unstrung so many fine men's limbs!" 425

So saying, he sprang, armed, from his chariot to the ground, and Patroklos on the other side, seeing him, sprang down too;
and as two vultures, with hooked beaks and crooked talons, fight, screaming loudly, up on some lofty rock, so these two, shouting, charged the one at the other. 430
When he saw them, the son of Kronos, that devious schemer, felt pity, and said to Hērē, his sister and wife:
"Woe is me, that it's fate for Sarpēdōn, my best-loved mortal, to be laid low by Patroklos, the son of Menoitios!
My heart is divided two ways as I debate the matter— 435 Shall I snatch him up while he lives still, and then set him down, far from this grievous warfare, in Lycia's rich terrain, or shall I let him be vanquished by Patroklos, Menoitios's son?"

Then the ox-eyed lady Hērē replied to him, saying:
"Most dread son of Kronos, what's this that you're telling me? 440
Here's a man, a mortal, his fate long since determined:
Are you minded to free such a one from sorrowful death?
Then do it; but we other gods will not all approve.
One other thing I will tell you, and you should take it to heart:
If you send back Sarpēdōn alive to his own abode, 445 think of this: that hereafter some other god may be minded to send his own dear son away from the grind of battle—for fighting round Priam's great city there now are many sons of immortals, in whom you'll cause serious resentment.
But if he's so dear to you, and you're grieved at heart, 450 then let him be vanquished in the grind of battle at the hands of Patroklos, the son of Menoitios; and when the soul and life have departed from his body, send Death and soothing Sleep to convey him away till they reach the land of broad Lycia, and there his brothers and kinsfolk will give him due funeral rites with burial mound and gravestone, a dead man's entitlement." 455

So she spoke. At this the father of gods and men did not ignore her, but showered bloody raindrops on the earth in honor of his dear son, whom Patroklos was very soon 460 to kill off in rich-soiled Troy, far away from his own country.

Now when, advancing, they finally joined battle, then it was that Patroklos hit illustrious Thrasymēlos, the valiant henchman of the lord Sarpēdōn;
him he speared in the nether belly, unstrung his limbs. 465 Sarpēdōn, letting fly next with his gleaming spear, missed the man himself, but speared the horse Pēdasos in its right shoulder: it screamed, gasped out its spirit, dropped neighing into the dust, and the breath of life fled from it.
The other two pulled apart, the yoke creaked, and the reins 470 were tangled, now that the trace horse lay there in the dust.
But for this the famed spearman Automedōn found an answer:
unsheathing the long sword from beside his sturdy thigh he jumped down and cut free the trace horse, wasted no time, and the other two were thus righted, strained at the reins, 475 while the two fighters got back together in heart-devouring strife.

Then once more Sarpēdōn missed with his gleaming spear, and over Patroklos's left shoulder the spear point flew, not hitting him, and Patroklos in turn made play with the bronze, and not vainly did the shaft fly from his hand, 480 but struck at the point where the lungs enclose the solid heart,² and Sarpēdōn fell like an oak tree or a white poplar, or a tall pine that up in the mountains shipwrights fell with their newly sharpened axes to serve as a ship timber:
so there in front of his horses and chariot he lay 485 stretched out, bellowing, hands clutching the bloody dust.
As a lion that comes on a herd will slaughter a bull, tawny, great-hearted, in among the shambling cattle,

2. Onians (26–27) is, as usual, valuable here. The φρένες (phrenes) are originally the lungs, not (as often, and nonsensically, supposed) the midriff or diaphragm. "Solid" or "dense" is Onians's interpretation of ἄδινόν (hadinon), recognized by Janko as giving "an anatomically correct description" (379). See also n. 3 to 504.

and it perishes, bellowing still, in the jaws of the lion, so now, laid low by Patroklos, the Lycian spearman's leader, 490 dying, still struggled, and called his comrade by name:
 "Dear Glaukos, warrior among men, today there's urgent need for you to be both spearman and dauntless warrior too—if you're ready, let violent warfare be your choice!
 First, you must urge on the Lycians' warrior leaders— 495
 checking them all—to fight for Sarpēdōn's body, then join them, and battle in my defense with the bronze:
 For even in time to come I'll be a reproach and a cause of disgrace to you all your days, unendingly, should the Achaians strip my gear from my fallen body by the drawn-up ships! 500 Now hold the line bravely, and urge on all our troops!"

As he spoke thus death's conclusion enshrouded him, his eyes and his nostrils. Patroklos set one foot on his chest, and tugged the spear from his flesh. The lungs followed with it.
 Sarpēdōn's soul and the spear point he drew out together,³ 505 as the Myrmidons reined in the snorting horses that now, freed from their masters' chariot, wanted only to escape.

Terrible grief seized Glaukos as he heard Sarpēdōn's voice, and his heart was wrung, since he'd not been able to help him.
 With one hand he gripped and pressed his arm, for the wound 510 vexed him, that Teukros had dealt him with an arrow—in support of his own comrades—as Glaukos charged the high wall.
 Now he addressed in prayer Apollo, the deadly archer:
 "Hear me, lord, you who may be in Lycia's rich terrain or perhaps here in Troy: wherever you are, you're able 515 to listen to men in trouble, just as trouble's come on me now, for I have this serious wound, and my arm's shot through with sharp cutting pains, nor can the flow of blood be stanchd, and my shoulder's a dead weight because of it.
 I can't hold my spear in place, or join the battle against 520 our enemies, while our best fighter has perished—Sarpēdōn, son of Zeus, who won't even save his own flesh and blood!
 But do you, lord, now at least heal this serious wound of mine,

3. Since θυμός (thymos), which came to be equated with "soul" or "spirit", originally meant "breath", as the physical sign of life (Onians 44–53), it is tempting to see a neat zeugma here: "the soul is imagined as breath which escapes through the wound," as Janko (381) does.

lull my pains to sleep, and give me the strength to exhort my Lycian comrades to keep up the fight, 525 and myself to join the battle for Sarpēdōn's body."

So he spoke in prayer, and Phoibos Apollo heard him.
The pains the god stopped at once, dried up the black blood that flowed from his hurtful wound, put strength in his heart.
Glaukos knew what had happened, rejoiced in silence 530 that the great god had listened, and answered his prayer so soon.
First he urged on the Lycians' warrior leaders, checking them all, to fight for Sarpēdōn's body;
then he made his way, taking long strides, to the Trojans, to Poulydamas, Pánthoös's son, and noble Agēnōr, 535 and sought out Aineias and the bronze-panoplied Hektōr, whom he now went up to, and addressed with winged words:
"Hektōr, it's plain you've completely forgotten your allies, who on your account, far distant from friends and country are wasting their lives away—yet you will not help them! 540 Sarpēdōn lies dead now, the Lycian spearmen's leader, whose judgments and strength were Lycia's protection:
him brazen Arēs has vanquished through Patroklos's spear!
My friends, stand beside him now, think shame to hold back, lest he be stripped of his arms and his corpse maltreated 545 by the Myrmidons, angered at all the Danaän deaths, those whom we killed with our spears at the swift ships."

So he spoke,
and the Trojans were possessed from head to foot by grief, uncontrollable, unendurable, for Sarpēdōn had been their city's prop, though a foreigner, since numerous troops 550 came with him, and he himself was a champion warrior.
They made straight for the Danaäns, fiercely, their leader Hektōr enraged for Sarpēdōn's sake. The Achaians were urged on by the shaggy heart⁴ of Patroklos, Menoitios's son.
First he addressed both Aiases, already hot for the fray: 555
"You two needs must be keen to defend yourselves, as brave as you were in time past among fighters, or even braver!"

4. Onians (28–29) reminds us that the epithet "bushy, shaggy" (λάσιος, lasios) is most appropriate for the heart itself, with "the multitudinous branching veins and arteries growing immediately out of it, like bushes, many through the lungs."

The man who first got beyond the wall of the Achaians, Sarpēdōn, is lying there dead—let’s grab him, disfigure his corpse, strip the battle gear from his shoulders, with the ruthless bronze 560 dispatch any comrade of his who tries to defend him!”

So he spoke, and they themselves were raging to attack.
 Then, when on both sides they’d reinforced their ranks, Trojans and Lycians, Myrmidons and Achaians, they clashed in battle over Sarpēdōn’s corpse, 565 with terrible shouts, and their battered armor rang loud, and Zeus spread deadly darkness over the grinding conflict, to match the deadly war work centered on his dear son.

At first the Trojans forced the sharp-eyed Achaians back, for a man by no means the worst of the Myrmidons was stricken— 570
 the son of great-hearted Agaklēs, noble Epeigeus, who’d formerly ruled as king in well-populated Boudeion, but at this time, after he’d killed a noble kinsman, came as a suppliant to Pēleus and silver-footed Thetis, and they sent him to serve with Achilles, the breaker of ranks, 575 at Ilion, rich in foals, as a fighter against the Trojans.

Him, as he grabbed at the corpse, illustrious Hektōr struck, with a rock, on the head, which split completely in two inside his heavy helmet: he collapsed on the body face foremost, and death, the spirit-queller, embraced him. 580

Then over Patroklos came grief for his slaughtered comrade, and he charged through the front ranks like a speedy hawk in pursuit of fleeing jackdaws and starlings: even so, Patroklos, driver of horses, straight for the Lycians and the Trojans did you charge, in your wrath for your comrade! 585 Sthenelaös too he struck, dear son of Ithaimenēs, on the neck with a rock, and tore away the tendons.

Front-line fighters gave ground, illustrious Hektōr with them:
 as far as is the flight of a good long hunting spear thrown by a man making trial of his strength in sport, 590 or even in war, when hard pressed by murderous foemen, so far did the Trojans retreat, and the Achaians drove them.

Glaukos, the Lycian spearmen’s commander, was the first to turn around, and he slew high-spirited Bathyklēs, Chalkōn’s dear son, who made his home in Hellas, 595 and ranked high among Myrmidons for wealth and prosperity.

Him Glaukos struck full on the chest with his spear, turning suddenly on him when about to be overtaken, and he fell with a thud, and thick grief now seized the Achaians, since a good man had fallen, while the Trojans, with loud cheers, 600 closed and crowded round them. Yet the Achaians did not forget their fighting spirit, but pitted their strength against them.
 Mēriōnēs next took down a helmeted Trojan fighter, Laogonos, Onētōr's bold son, a priest of Idaian Zeus, who was honored by his people like a god. 605 Him he struck under the jaw and ear: at once the breath of life fled his limbs, and loathsome darkness seized him.
 Aineias then let fly his bronze spear at Mēriōnēs, hoping to hit him as he advanced behind his shield;
 but Mēriōnēs was watching, and avoided the bronze spear 610
 by ducking down forward, so that its long shaft
 stuck in the ground behind him, its butt end quivering, and there mighty Arēs took its power away from it.
 [And Aineias's shaft ended quivering, point first, deep in the ground, flung in vain from his sturdy hand.]⁵ 615
 At this Aineias was angered, and spoke to him, saying:
 "Soon enough, Mēriōnēs, dancer though you are, my spear would have stopped you for ever, had I but hit you."

 Mēriōnēs, famed spearman, made him this answer:
 "Aineias, it's hard for you, however strong you may be, 620 to quench the strength of every man who confronts you in his own defense: you too were born a mortal!
 Should I aim and hit you squarely with my sharp bronze, soon enough—strong though you are, with trust in your hands—
 you'd give glory to me, and your soul to horse-proud Hādēs." 625

 So he spoke; but Menoitios's valiant son rebuked him:
 "Mēriōnēs, you're a good man, why carry on like this?
 Look, friend, insulting words are not what will make the Trojans back off from the corpse: that would take killing most of us.
 War's outcome rests in our hands, talk's place is the council. 630
 No point in endless words—what we need is to fight."

5. Lines 614–15 = 13,504–5: originally they were written in the margin as a parallel, but at some point they were accidentally interpolated into the text.

So saying, he led the way, and the other, mortal but godlike, followed, and from the armies—like the din made by woodcutters at work in some mountain clearing, audible far away—there went up off the wide-wayed earth the thud and clatter 635 of bronze and oxhide and cleverly fashioned shields as they thrust at each other with swords and two-edged spears; and no longer could any man, though he knew him well, have recognized noble Sarpēdōn, now covered with blood and dust and missiles, from his head to the soles of his feet. 640 Men crowded around the corpse the way that flies in a farmyard buzz round the brimming pails of milk in springtime, when the milk spurts down into the buckets: just so they kept crowding around the corpse. Nor did Zeus ever turn his sharp gaze away from the grind of battle, 645 but watched them closely, debating a problem in his mind, uncertain regarding the matter of killing Patroklos—was illustrious Hektōr right now, in the grind of battle over godlike Sarpēdōn, to slay him too with the bronze, and strip the gear off his shoulders, or rather should he, Zeus, 650 prolong the sheer labor of fighting for yet more men?
 And as he debated, this struck him as being the better way:
 that the excellent henchman of Pēleus's son Achilles should once more drive the Trojans and bronze-clad Hektōr back to the city, and take the breath of life from many. 655 In Hektōr first he aroused craven panic: Hektōr boarded his chariot, turned to flight, and called upon the rest of the Trojans to flee, having seen Zeus's sacred scales in action.
 Nor did the brave Lycians stand fast, but panicked to a man when they saw their king laid low, pierced through the heart, 660 lying in a heap of corpses, for many had fallen on him since Kronos's son stretched taut the cords of powerful strife.
 They stripped from Sarpēdōn's shoulders the gleaming armor of bronze, which Menoitios's valiant son now gave to his comrades, to carry back to the hollow ships. 665
 Then Zeus the cloud-gatherer thus addressed Apollo:
 "Go now, dear Phoibos, and wipe the dark clotted blood from Sarpēdōn—first get him clear of the missiles—then take him far off, find a river, wash him clean in its flowing waters, spread ambrosia on him, have him clothed in immortal raiment, 670 then give him to fast-moving escorts, to carry him away—

Sleep and Death, twin brothers, who'll lose no time, but speedily set him down in broad Lycia's rich terrain.
 There his brother and kinsfolk will give him due funeral rites with burial mound and gravestone, a dead man's entitlement." 675

So he spoke, and Apollo did not disregard his father, but went down from the heights of Ida to the grim battlefield, and at once raised noble Sarpēdōn, got him clear of the missiles, took him far off, found a river, washed him clean in its flowing waters, spread ambrosia on him, had him clothed in immortal raiment, 680 then gave him to fast-moving escorts, to carry away—Sleep and Death, twin brothers: they lost no time, but speedily set him down in broad Lycia's rich terrain.

Patroklos now commanded Automedōn as driver to keep chasing the Trojans and Lycians—being blindly deluded, 685 the fool, since had he followed the advice of Pēleus's son he'd surely have kept well clear of black death's foul spirits!
 But the mind of Zeus is always more potent than that of men, turns even a hero cowardly, steals victory from him—easily, too, and as easily stirs up a man to fight. 690
 He it was now who put spirit in Patroklos's breast.

So whom did you slaughter first, and whom last, Patroklos, when the gods thus summoned you deathward? First of all was Adrēstos, and then Autonoös, Echeolos, Perimos son of Megas, Epistōr, followed by Melanippos, 695 Elastos next, and Moulíos, and Pylartēs: these he killed, and the rest of them then chose flight, every last man of them.

Then the Achaians' sons would have taken high-gated Troy through Patroklos's hands, so widely he raged with his spear, had Phoibos Apollo not stood on the well-built ramparts 700 with death in mind for him, while aiding the Trojans.
 Three times Patroklos climbed up the lofty wall's elbow-bend, and three times Apollo violently beat him back, thrusting against the bright shield with his immortal hands.
 But when for the fourth time he came on like a god, 705
 in a terrible voice Apollo addressed him with winged words:
 "Withdraw, Patroklos, scion of Zeus! It's not fated that the lordly Trojans' city should be laid waste by your spear, nor by that of Achilles, a far better man than you!"

So he spoke, and Patroklos backed off a healthy distance, to avoid the wrath of Apollo, the deadly archer. 710

At the Skaian Gates Hektōr reined in his whole-hoofed horses, in two minds: should he drive them back to the tumult and fight, or should he recall his forces, regroup inside the wall?
As he pondered thus, Phoibos Apollo approached him 715 in the form of a man both vigorous and strong—Asios, who was uncle to Hektōr the horse-breaker and Hekabē's brother, but the son of Dymas, who dwelt in Phrygia near the Sangarios river:
in his likeness now Apollo, the son of Zeus, addressed him: 720
"Hektōr, why have you quit the fight? You must not!
If I were stronger than you, as much as I'm really weaker, it'd be to your instant hurt that you'd hold back from the battle!
Come on, now! Set at Patroklos your strong-hoofed horses!
You might kill him, and then win glory from Apollo!" 725

So he spoke, and went back, a god to the struggle of mortals, and to warlike Kebrionēs illustrious Hektōr gave the word to whip on his horses to battle. Meanwhile Apollo had made his way to the troops, loosed dangerous confusion on the Argives, thus giving glory to the Trojans and Hektōr. 730 Other Danaāns Hektōr ignored, made no effort to slay them, but set his strong-hoofed horses at Patroklos alone;
and Patroklos over against him sprang down from his chariot, a spear in his left hand, while the other grasped a rock, jagged and glinting: his hand enclosed it. With all his weight 735 behind it he threw. The missile did not fall short; he did not throw in vain, but hit Hektōr's charioteer, Kebrionēs—a bastard of glorious Priam's, now holding the reins—in his forehead with the sharp rock: it crushed both eyebrows together, the bone did not hold firm, 740 both eyeballs bolted out, dropped to the ground in the dust right in front of his feet, and he, like a diver, fell from the well-built chariot. The breath of life left his bones.
Then mockingly you addressed him, horseman Patroklos:
"Oh ho, such a nimble fellow, such an effortless tumbler! 745

I'm sure if he were out there on the fish-breeding deep this fellow would catch enough sea squirts to feed a multitude, diving in from his ship, even when it's bad weather, so lightly he somersaults now from his chariot on the plain!
 It would seem that even the Trojans have their share of acrobats." 750

So saying, he went after Kebrionēs the hero with the pounce of a lion that, while ravaging a farmstead, is hit in the chest, and thus it's its own courage that destroys it:
 just so at Kebrionēs, Patroklos, you sprang in your fury, while on the other side Hektōr jumped down from his chariot, 755 and they fought over Kebrionēs like a pair of lions that high up in the mountains over a slain hind—both ravenous, both determined—battle it out. Just so for Kebrionēs these two veterans of the war cry, Patroklos son of Menoitios and illustrious Hektōr, 760 longed to cut up each other's flesh with the pitiless bronze.
 Hektōr seized the corpse by the head, and would not let go, while Patroklos on the other side clung to a foot, and round them Trojans and Danaāns contested the grind of battle.
 As the east and south winds compete the one with the other 765 at shaking some deep wood in a mountain clearing—a wood of beech and ash and smooth-barked cornel, their long boughs grinding together with an amazing racket, along with a crackle of snapping branches—so the Achaians and Trojans now went for one another, 770 killers all: neither side had deadly rout in mind, and all round Kebrionēs many sharp-edged spears were planted, and flighted arrows that had leapt from the bowstring, and many large rocks that shattered against the shields of the men fighting over him; but amid the swirling dust 775 great in his greatness he lay, his horsemanship forgotten.

As long as the sun still straddled the midpoint of the sky, both sides' shots struck home, and men dropped, hit; but when the sun declined to the point at which oxen are unyoked, then it was the Achaians proved stronger, beyond what was destined: 780 the hero Kebrionēs they pulled out of the range of missiles, away from the Trojans' war cries, stripped the gear from his shoulders, and Patroklos with deadly intent now went after the Trojans.
 Three times he charged them, the equal of swift Arēs, shouting terribly: three times he slew nine men. 785

 But when for the fourth time he came on like a god, then for you, Patroklos, the end of your life showed clear, for Phoibos confronted you in the grind of battle, dread god—yet Patroklos missed him coming through the turmoil, for he was wrapped in a thick mist when they met. 790 Standing behind him, Apollo slammed his back and broad shoulders with the flat of one hand. His eyes turned in his head, from which now Phoibos Apollo struck off the helmet, and it rolled away, clattering, under the horses' hoofs crest, visor, and all, its horsehair plumes besmirched 795 with blood and dust. Never till then had the gods allowed that crested helmet to be besmirched with dust, when it guarded the head and fine brow of a godlike man, Achilles; but now Zeus made a present of it to Hektōr to wear on his head, though his own doom was very near. 800 In Patroklos's hands the far-shadowing spear, so huge, so solid, bronze-tipped, was all broken, and from his shoulders the fringed shield with its baldric fell to the ground, and his corselet the son of Zeus, Lord Apollo, now undid.
 Delusion clouded his mind, his bright limbs were unstrung, 805 he stood in a daze, and was struck from behind, at close range, midway between the shoulders, with a sharp-edged spear, by Euphorbos, Pánthoös's son, a Dardanian, who excelled all those of his age as a spearman and horseman, and at running:
 twenty men by now he'd dislodged from driving their horses 810 since he first arrived with his chariot, still a novice at warfare.
 He it was first threw his spear at you, horseman Patroklos, yet did not kill you, but pulled his ash spear from your flesh and ran back into the ranks, did not stay there to face Patroklos, even unarmed, in hand-to-hand combat, 815 while Patroklos too, overcome by the god's blow and the spear, turned back towards the ranks of his comrades, avoiding fate.

 But Hektōr, when he perceived great-hearted Patroklos backing off, after taking a hit from the sharp-edged bronze, came up close to him through the ranks, and with his spear 820 stabbed into his nether belly, driving the bronze clean through:
 and he fell with a thud, greatly grieving the troops of the Achaians.
 As a lion brings down an unwearying boar in battle when the two of them up in the mountains battle with high resolve for a small spring from which both are determined to drink, 825 and the boar pants hard, but the lion's might prevails—from Menoitios's valiant son, when he'd killed so many, Priam's son Hektōr now took the life with his spear, close up, and, boastfully, over him spoke winged words:

 "Patroklos, you imagined you were going to sack our city, 830 and take the day of freedom from the women of Troy, and carry them off in your ships to your dear fatherland.
 You fool! It was for their protection Hektōr's swift horses galloped out to battle, and with the spear I myself, 835 outstanding among warlike Trojans, am here to ward off the day of doom from them: but you the vultures will eat here, you wretch! And brave though he is, Achilles couldn't save you—he stayed behind, but I'm sure he gave you marching orders—
 'Don't you come back to me, Patroklos, master horseman, at the hollow ships, before you've sliced up the tunic of Hektōr, 840 killer of men, round his chest, left it bloody.' That's how, I fancy, he spoke to you, thus persuading your mind in its mindlessness."

 Then, strength ebbing, you answered him, horseman Patroklos:
 "Go on, boast big while you can! You were handed this triumph by Apollo and Zeus, son of Kronos, who overwhelmed me 845 easily: they themselves removed the gear from my shoulders.
 If twenty men such as you had confronted me, all would have perished here, quelled by my spear! Oh no, it was deadly fate and the son of Lētō that slew me, and of mortals Euphorbos: you're only the third hand in my killing. 850
 And another thing I'll tell you, and you lay it to heart:
 You yourself are not for a long life: now already death's moved in close beside you, your all-mastering fate to be slain at the hands of Achilles, Aiakos's peerless grandson."

 When he'd spoken thus, death's end enshrouded him, 855
 and the soul fled from his limbs, fluttered down to Hādēs bewailing its fate, youth and manhood all abandoned.
 Yet still Hektōr harangued him, dead though he was:
 "Patroklos, why do you prophesy sheer destruction for me?
 Who knows if perhaps Achilles, fair-haired Thetis's son, 860 may, struck by my spear, lose his life before that happens?"

So saying, he tugged out his bronze spear from the wound, with one foot on Patroklos's chest, eased him backward off the spear.
Then he and his spear were gone, pursuing Automedon, the godlike henchman of Aiaikos's swift-footed grandson, 865 very zealous to hit him; but him the swift horses carried away, immortal steeds, that the gods gave to Peleus, glorious gifts.

Book 17

It did not escape Atreus's son, the warlike Menelaös, that Patroklos had been brought down in the struggle with the Trojans:
through the front ranks he went, armored in gleaming bronze, and stood there, straddling his corpse, as over her first-born calf its mother stands lowing, plaintively, having never given birth before: so over Patroklos fair-haired Menelaös stood, holding before him his spear and well-balanced shield, ready to kill any fighter that came out and confronted him. 5

Nor was Pánthoös's son, of the good ash spear, indifferent to the fall of peerless Patroklos; he came and stood near warlike Menelaös, and thus addressed him: 10
"Atreus's son Menelaös, Zeus's nursling, leader of armies, yield ground now, leave the corpse, forego these bloodstained spoils!
No man prior to me of the Trojans or their famed allies put a spear in Patroklos during the grind of battle, 15 so you now allow me to win true glory among the Trojans, or else I'll let fly and hit you, rob you of honey-sweet life." Deeply stirred, fair-haired Menelaös answered him thus:
"Zeus, Father, such over-proud boasting is most unseemly!
Of neither lion nor leopard is the rage so great, 20 nor of the deadly wild boar—in whose breast the greatest fury exults in its strength—as is the arrogant spirit of Pánthoös's sons, they of the good ash spear! Not even Hyperēnōr, the mighty one, the tamer of horses, had any joy of his youth, when he mocked and confronted me, 25 called me the feeblest warrior among the Danaäns:
not on his own feet, I tell you, did he make his way back home to gladden his dear wife and his devoted parents!
Just so will I unstring your strength, if you persist in standing against me: back off, I tell you, into the crowd, 30 don't try confrontation, get out before you suffer some hurt: what's done even a fool can recognize."

So he spoke, but did not persuade him: Euphorbos replied:
"Now indeed, Menelaös, Zeus's nursling, you'll pay the price for the brother of mine you killed: you rant boastfully over him, 35 his wife you left a widow in her new bridal chamber, unspeakable grief and sorrow you brought on his parents!

 Surely for them in their misery I could be an easing of grief if I bring them your head and your armor, lay these in the hands of Pánthoös and of noble Phrontis! 40
 No longer shall this struggle between us go untested or unfought, whether it end in victory or in flight.”

That said, Euphorbos struck Menelaös's well-balanced shield, but the bronze failed to break through, its point was turned by the strong shield; then Atreus's son Menelaös 45 in his turn attacked with the bronze, praying to Zeus the Father, and as Euphorbos drew back, speared him hard at the base of his throat, leaning into the thrust, relying on his strong fist; and clean through his delicate neck the spear point passed.
 He fell with a thud, and his armor rattled upon him. 50 Blood soaked his hair that was such as the Graces have—those locks wasp-waisted with spirals of gold and silver.¹
 As a man cultivates an olive tree's flourishing slip in a lonely spot, where spring water wells up in abundance—a fine, healthy sapling, and breezes from every quarter 55 make it shiver, and soon it bursts out in white blossom, but then a sudden gale comes, with abundance of storm winds, tears it up root and all and lays it out flat on the ground:
 in such wise Pánthoös's son, the ashen-speared Euphorbos, was slain by Atreus's son Menelaös, stripped of his armor. 60
 As some mountain-bred lion, confident in its strength, from a grazing herd snatches a cow, the best one there—when he's caught her, he first breaks her neck with his powerful teeth, then gulps down her blood, along with all her innards, tearing her flesh, while all round him hunting dogs and herdsmen 65 make much noise, but from a distance, not being minded to confront him, for pale fear has them in its grip:
 just so the heart in the breast of no Trojan dared

1. “Golden spirals apparently for binding the hair are common in sub-Mycenean and Geometric graves,” Edwards 1991 notes (67). The verb ἐσφῆκωντο (esphékōnto), here only in Homer, means to be pinched in like a wasp's waist. It has also been suggested that color—golden/yellow bands on black hair—may have contributed to the wasp image.

to come out and confront illustrious Menelaös.
 Easily, then, would the famed arms of Euphorbos 70 have been borne off by Atreus's son, had not Phoibos Apollo —in a man's likeness, as Mentēs, the Kikōnians' leader—begrudging this, stirred against him Hektōr, peer of swift Arēs, whom he addressed as follows, in winged words: "Hektōr, while you're vainly chasing a quarry you'll never catch, 75 the horses of Aiakos's warrior grandson—hard are they for any mortal to master or to drive, save only Achilles, who had an immortal mother—meanwhile Menelaös, the warlike son of Atreus, straddling Patroklos's corpse, has slain the best of the Trojans, 80 Pánthoös's son Euphorbos, cut short his fighting spirit."

So he spoke, and went back, a god to the struggle of mortals.
 Bitter grief now spread round Hektōr's dark spirit: he glanced along the ranks, and at once perceived both men, the one stripping off the famed armor, the other one lying there, 85 blood trickling out of the stab wound. Then Hektōr gave a sharp cry, strode out through the foremost fighters, armed in gleaming bronze, like Hēphaistos's unquenchable flame.
 Nor did Atreus's son miss that sharp cry: deeply perturbed he now communed with his own great-hearted spirit: 90
 "Ah, me, if I leave that fine armor behind, and Patroklos too, who lies here dead in his quest to restore my honor, any Danaän who sees it, I fear, will blame my action!
 But if, single-handed, I take on Hektōr and the Trojans out of shame, I fear they'll surround me, being many against one— 95 bright-helmeted Hektōr's bringing every last Trojan here.
 Yet why should my heart and I be debating any of this?
 When, against heaven's will, a man chooses to fight with a mortal whom some god honors, at once great trouble rolls over him.
 So, no Danaän will be indignant on seeing me retreat 100 before Hektōr, since he's fighting with a god as his backer.
 Yet, if I could only find Aias of the fine war cry, then we two might turn back and battle it out, even against divine will, in the hope of rescuing the corpse for Achilles, Pēleus's son: that would be the best of evils." 105

Meanwhile, as he was pondering thus in his mind and spirit, the Trojan ranks advanced, with Hektōr leading them.

Menelaös began to retreat now, abandoning the corpse, but constantly looking back, like a bearded lion that dogs and men are chasing away from the cattle pen 110 with spears and shouting—the bold spirit in his breast is chilled, and reluctantly he slinks off from the farmstead:
 so fair-haired Menelaös moved away from Patroklos.
 But on reaching his comrades' division he stood there, looking round, attempting to find great Aias, Telamön's son, 115 and quickly located him, at the far left side of the battle, encouraging his companions, urging them on to fight, because of the awesome fear put in them by Phoibos Apollo.
 He set off at a run, reached him quickly, addressed him thus:
 "Aias my friend, come with me, we must hurry to save 120 dead Patroklos—at least let's rescue his body for Achilles—his naked body: his armor bright-helmeted Hektör holds."

So speaking he roused the spirit of warlike Aias:
 through the front-line fighters he strode, Menelaös with him.
 Now Hektör had stripped Patroklos of his famed battle gear, 125 and was dragging him off to cut his head from his shoulders with the sharp bronze, and leave his body for Trojan dogs;
 but up came Aias, behind his towering shield, and Hektör retreated into the body of his comrades, boarded his chariot, turned the famed armor over 130 for the Trojans to take to the city, to bring him great glory.
 But Aias with his broad shield covered Menoitios's son, and stood there like a lion protecting its young, one that hunters meet as it leads these cubs in the forest, and it bears itself proudly, glorying in its strength, 135 hooding its eyes with the down-drawn skin of its brow:
 just so did Aias bestride the hero Patroklos, while on the other side Atreus's son, the warlike Menelaös, stood there, nursing great sorrow within his breast.

And now
 Glaukos, son of Hippolochos, the Lycian warriors' leader, 140 scowling darkly at Hektör, upbraided him with harsh words:
 "Hektör, so handsome, but sadly wanting in battle—this fine reputation of yours conceals a girlish coward!
 You'd better start thinking now of some way to save your city and citadel on your own, helped only by native Trojans, 145 for at least of the Lycians not one man will turn out to fight the Danaäns over this city, since I now see there's no thanks for struggling, without respite, forever against the foe!

 How would you rescue a lesser fighter, one of the crowd, you callous brute, when you leave Sarpēdōn—your guest, 150 your comrade—there for the Argives, to be their prey, their booty?
 Often enough he helped you, your city and yourself, while he lived—yet now you don't dare keep the dogs off him!
 So now, if my Lycian troops will obey my orders, we're going home, and for Troy sheer ruin is like to follow! 155
 If only that dauntless courage was in the Trojans, unflinching, that comes to men who, for their country's sake, shoulder the strife and the struggle with their foes, then soon enough would we drag off Patroklos to Ilion—and if this man came, dead, to King Priam's great city, 160 when we'd dragged him out of the battle, then quickly enough would the Argives surrender Sarpēdōn's fine battle gear and we'd bring the man himself back into Ilion; for such a fighter is he whose squire has been slain, the best of these Argives by their ships—he and his veterans! 165
 But you lacked the courage to stand up, face to face, against great-hearted Aias, amid enemies' battle cries, and fight him head on, since he's a better man than you."

Scowling darkly, bright-helmeted Hektōr replied:
 "Why, Glaukos, being who you are, have you spoken so arrogantly? 170
 My friend, I once regarded you as the most sensible man of all those who have their homes in rich-soiled Lycia; but now what you say makes me doubt your sense entirely—when you claim that I failed to stand against huge Aias!
 I tell you, I don't fear battle or the hoof beats of horses— 175 but the mind of Zeus of the aegis is always too strong, he scares even the valiant, deprives men of victory without effort, and as easily stirs them up to fight.
 Come, friend, stand by me, watch my actions, see whether,
 as you proclaim, I'm a coward the whole day through, 180 or whether many a Danaän, however fierce a fighter, I'll stand off from battling over the dead Patroklos."

So saying, he called out to the Trojans, in a carrying voice:
 "Trojans! Lycians! You Dardanian hand-to-hand fighters!

Be men, my friends! Remember your fighting spirit, until I put on the armor of peerless Achilles, the splendid gear that I stripped from mighty Patroklos when I slew him!” 185

Having spoken thus, bright-helmeted Hektōr withdrew from war’s deadly turmoil, ran fast, overtook his comrades who were not far off yet, hastened on swift feet after 190 those bearing towards the city the famed armor of Pēleus’s son.
Then he halted, away from the grievous conflict, changed his armor: his own he gave, to be taken to sacred Ilion, to the Trojans, lovers of warfare, and himself put on the immortal gear of Achilles, Pēleus’s son, that the heavenly 195 gods gave to his father, and he bequeathed, when old, to his son; but the son did not grow old in his father’s armor.

Now when from far off Zeus the cloud-gatherer saw him arming himself in the war gear of Pēleus’s godlike son, he shook his head and said, addressing his own heart: 200 “Ah, wretched man: death has no place in your thoughts, near though it is to you: you’re putting on the immortal gear of a prince among men, before whom others, too, tremble.
His comrade you’ve slain, a man as gentle as he was strong, and improperly stripped the armor from his head and shoulders. 205 Still, for now I’ll allow you great power, in compensation for the fact that no way are you coming back from battle, nor will Andromachē get from you the famed arms of Pēleus’s son.”

So the son of Kronos spoke, and, nodding his dark brows, made the armor fit Hektōr’s body, and there entered him then 210 fearsome Enyalian Arēs, and his limbs were filled with inner courage and strength. Then he went in among the far-famed allies, shouting his war cry, and displayed himself to them all, agleam in the battle gear of Pēleus’s great-hearted son, urging on every man he approached with his winged words— 215 Mesthlēs and Glaukos, Medōn, Thersilochos, Hippothoös, Deisēnōr, and Asteropaios, Phorkys and Chromios, the bird-augur Ennomos—these he approached, to these his winged words were addressed: “Hear me, you countless tribes of allies that dwell around us! 220
It was not in search of mere numbers, or because I lacked them, that I brought each one of you here from your cities, but rather for you to rescue the Trojans' wives and children, of your own will, for me, from these war-loving Achaians.

It's with this aim that I'm straining my people's resources 225 for gifts and food to keep strong the spirit in you all!
So let each man make straight for the foe, whether to perish or come safely through: that's the sweet embrace of warfare.
And whoever drags Patroklos, dead though he is for sure, back among the horse-breaker Trojans, and Aias yields to him, 230 half my booty I'll share with him, keep only half myself: for his glory will be as great as mine."

So he spoke: they charged, full force, straight at the Danaäns, spears raised, the hearts within them brimming with hope that they'd drag the corpse away from Aias, Telamōn's son— 235 the fools, for over that body he robbed many of their life.
Yet now Aias spoke to Menelaös of the fine war cry, saying:
"My friend Menelaös, Zeus's nursling, no longer do I hope that the two of us will ever come home safe from this war—it's not so much the corpse of Patroklos that concerns me, 240 which all too soon will glut the dogs and vultures of Troy:
it's my own head I'm afraid for, lest ill befall it, and yours as well, for a cloud of war—I mean Hektōr—now enshrouds everything: it's sheer destruction confronts us.
Still, call to the Danaäns' leaders: someone may hear us." 245

So he spoke: Menelaös of the fine war cry did not ignore him, called out to the Danaäns in a carrying voice:
"Friends, leaders and rulers of the Argives, you who with Atreus's sons, Agamemnōn and Menelaös, drink at the public cost, who, each of you, issue orders 250 to your people, who from Zeus have honor and glory!
Hard it is for me to distinguish each individual leader, so vast the strife of war that's flared up—so let each man advance unnamed, but with fury in his heart that Patroklos should end as a plaything for the dogs of Troy." 255

So he spoke: Oïleus's son, swift Aias, heard him clearly.
He was the first who came to him, at a run, through the fighting, and after him Idomeneus, and Idomeneus's comrade Mêrionēs, the equal of Enyalios, killer of men.

As for the rest—who, from memory, could reel off all the names of those who followed, who woke the Achaians' battle spirit? 260

The Trojans charged in a massed body, Hektōr leading.
As at the outflow of some rain-fed river, giant waves come roaring against the current, and all around the coast's headlands re-echo as the salt sea breaks in foam, 265 with such huge clamor the Trojans came on. But still the Achaians stood steadfast around Menoitios's son, united in purpose, fenced with bronze shields: upon them Kronos's son shed thick mist, hid their gleaming helmets, since, even before, he'd not hated the son of Menoitios, 270 the squire of Aiakos's grandson, while he still lived; so now, hating the thought of his becoming the prey of his Trojan enemies' dogs, Zeus stirred up his comrades to defend him.

At first, the Trojans thrust back the sharp-eyed Achaians, who retreated, leaving the corpse. Not a single one of them 275 did these spirited Trojans spear, though they longed to, but started dragging the body away. Yet for a short while only were the Achaians to hold off, being quickly rallied by Aias, a man who for handsome looks and war craft surpassed all Danaäns, after Pēleus's peerless son. 280 Through the front-line fighters he stormed, in prowess resembling a wild boar, that in hill country easily scatters dogs and vigorous youths as it charges, swerving, through the glens:
just so lordly Telamōn's son, illustrious Aias, easily, once in among them, scattered the Trojan ranks 285 that had closed in over Patroklos, determined above all to drag him back to their city, and so win glory.

Hippochoös now, Pelasgian Lēthos's illustrious son, was dragging the corpse by one foot through the grind of battle with his baldric lashed fast around the ankle's tendons, 290 delighting the Trojans and Hektōr; but swiftly disaster struck him, that no one, though desperate to, could ward off:
out from the crowd darted Telamōn's son, closed in,
and hit him, right through his bronze cheek-pieced helmet, which, horsehair crest and all, split round the spear point, 295 struck by a heavy spear from a powerful hand: the brains, all blood-bespattered, shot out from the wound along the spear's socket, his strength was loosened, his hands let fall great-hearted Patroklos's foot. It fell to the ground and lay there. He fell prone, close by it, on the corpse, 300 far from rich-soiled Lárissa, and never repaid his parents the cost of his upbringing: brief indeed was his life, cut off short by the spear of mighty-spirited Aias.

Hektôr let fly in turn at Aias with his gleaming spear, but Aias, watching him closely, avoided the bronze-tipped 305 shaft, a near miss; it hit Schedios, great-hearted Iphitos's son, best by far of the Phokians, who in famous Panopeus had his dwelling, and reigned as king over many subjects.

Hektôr hit him under the collar-bone, in the mid-part: the bronze spear point drove right through, emerged at the shoulder's base. 310
He fell with a thud, and his armor rattled upon him.

Next Aias hit Phorkys—the warlike son of Phainōps, who was standing over Hippothoös—in the mid-belly, broke the plate of his corselet, so that his guts spilled out through the bronze: in the dust he fell, hand clawing the earth. 315

Then the front-line fighters and illustrious Hektôr gave ground, and the Argives, cheering loudly, dragged off the corpses—Phorkys, Hippothoös—and started stripping the gear from their shoulders.

Now would the warlike Achaians have once more driven the Trojans, undone by their lack of spirit, back up to Ilion, 320 and the Argives would have won glory—even beyond the measure approved by Zeus—through their forceful strength; but Apollo himself roused up Aineias, assuming a herald's likeness—that of Periphas, Ēpytos's son: in Aineias's aged father's house he'd grown old as a herald, was on friendly terms with him. 325
In his likeness now Zeus's son Apollo addressed Aineias:

“Aineias, how, against a god's will, could you all safeguard steep Ilion? I've seen other men who relied on their forceful strength, on their bravery, on their common people, even when their numbers were very few; 330 but now it's for us Zeus wants victory, not for the Danaäns—yet nevertheless you're scared witless, refuse to fight!”

So he spoke: Aineias, face to face with him, recognized Apollo, the deadly archer, and shouted to Hektôr, saying:

“Hektōr, and you other leaders of the Trojans and allies! 335
 This is a shameful business, that by the warlike Achaians we’re being driven back up to Ilion, undone by our lack of spirit!
 But one of the gods just approached me, who says that Zeus, the all-highest counselor, is our backer in this battle!
 So let’s go straight for the Danaäns, not leave them undisturbed 340 to carry the corpse of Patroklos back to their ships!”

So he spoke,
 then charged far beyond the front-line fighters, and stood there.
 The Trojans rallied to him, confronting the Achaians, and Aineias with his spear now wounded Leiōkritos, Arisbas’s son, Lykomēdēs’ worthy comrade; 345 and Lykomēdēs, fierce warrior, in sorrow for his death advanced to close quarters, let fly with his gleaming spear, hit Hippiasos’s son Apisaōn, a shepherd of men, in his liver, below the midriff, and at once unstrung his knees—Apisaōn, who’d come out there from rich-soiled Paiōnia, 350 and after Asteropaios was Paiōnia’s finest fighter.
 Asteropaios, fierce warrior, in sorrow for his death likewise charged forward, eager to challenge the Danaäns, but no longer could, for their shields now fenced them in as they encircled Patroklos, spears couched before them, 355 while Aias ranged round them all, with endless directions—that none of them should give ground, fall back from the corpse, or come pushing forward in front of the other Achaians to fight, but keep close order round the body, battle hand-to-hand.
 Such were huge Aias’s orders: the earth grew sodden 360 with dark red blood, and jostling men dropped dead in mingled heaps, Trojans and their proud allies, and Danaäns too: though these did not avoid bloodshed, far fewer of them were falling: they took constant care in the crush of battle to save one another from death. 365

So they battled on like fire, and you could not tell if the sun and the moon were still in their place, intact, for a dark mist now enshrouded all the bravest who stood and fought in the struggle around Menoitios’s dead son, while the rest of the Trojans and well-greaved Achaians engaged, 370 unimpeded, in the clear air, with the sun’s keen rays spread over them, and not one single cloud to be seen above plain or mountain. These fought with occasional breaks, avoiding each other's grief-laden missiles, and standing well apart, whereas those in the center were under duress 375 from the conflict as well as the darkness, all the bravest worn down by the pitiless bronze. But two men who'd not yet learned—Antilochos, Thrasymēdēs, famous fighters both—of peerless Patroklos's death, and thought he was still alive, and battling the Trojans there in the foremost ranks, 380 were now—though alert for their comrades' death or rout—fighting off at a distance, as Nestōr had told them to do while urging them into battle, away from the black ships.

All day long the great struggle of their grievous conflict raged on, and endlessly with the sweat of action 385 every man's knees and calves, and the feet below them, and his arms and eyes, were bespattered, as they fought over the noble squire of Aiakos's swift-footed grandson.
 As when a man consigns the hide of a hefty bull to his people for stretching—one already made supple with fat— 390 and they take it and all stand round in a circle and stretch it, so that at once the moisture goes out, while the fat sinks in, with many hands pulling, and the whole hide's surface is stretched—so this way and that both sides were tugging the corpse in a narrow space, and they all were hopeful at heart 395 that they'd get it away: the Trojans to Ilion, the Achaians to the hollow ships; and around it a contest arose, so fierce that neither Arēs, driver of armies, nor yet Athēnē could have made light of it, however great their rage.

Such was the grim labor of men and horses that Zeus 400 stretched taut that day over Patroklos. Nor did noble Achilles yet have any knowledge of Patroklos's death, for far distant from the swift ships the conflict raged, beneath the Trojans' ramparts. So he never expected that Patroklos would die, thought that once he'd reached

Troy's gates 405
 he'd come back alive; for it did not enter his mind that Patroklos would try to sack Troy, with or without him, having often heard that from his mother, in private talk, when she brought him news of mighty Zeus's intentions;
 while now indeed his mother did not tell him the great disaster, 410 that his comrade, of all men the dearest to him, had been slain.

The combatants round the corpse, sharp spears in hand, pressed on without pause, kept up their killing of one another, and of the bronze-corseleted Achaians thus would one declare:

“Friends, we’d achieve no glory by going back at this point to the hollow ships: here and now let the black earth gape for us all—far better indeed that would be for us, if we must surrender this man to the Trojan horse breakers, to drag back to their city and so win glory.” 415

Thus likewise
would one of the great-hearted Trojans declare: “My friends, even though it may prove our destiny to be slaughtered beside this man, one and all, let no one give up the battle!” 420

This was how they spoke, arousing each man’s passion.
So they fought on, and an iron clatter went up through the still upper air till it reached the brazen heavens. 425

But the horses of Aiakos’s grandson, now far from the conflict, were weeping, since first they learned that their charioteer had been laid low in the dust by Hektōr, killer of men.
Automedōn, valiant son of Diōrēs, again and again lashed them with blows from his swift whip, many times tried shifting them with kind words, many times with curses; yet neither back to the ships by the broad Hellespont 430 were they willing to go, nor yet to join the Achaians in battle, but as firm as stands the marker that’s set up over the burial mound of some dead man or woman, so they 435 stood immovable, still hitched to the exquisite chariot, heads bowed down to the ground, while the warm tears flowed from their eyelids earthward as they shed them, mourning their charioteer, and dust soiled the rich manes that streamed down from the yoke-pad, both sides of the yoke. 440

Their mourning was viewed, with compassion, by Kronos’s son, who shook his head while communing with his own heart:

“Wretched pair, why, oh, why, did we give you to King Pēleus, a mortal, when you yourselves are immortal and ageless?
Was it to bring you sorrows among these wretched humans? 445
For surely there’s nothing more pitiable than man among all the creature that breathe and creep on this earth!

But never behind you, upon that subtly worked chariot, will Priam's son Hektōr mount: I shall not let him!
 Is it not enough that he has the armor, brags over it? 450 Into your knees and spirit I'll channel strength, to bring Automedōn also back safe from the fighting to the hollow ships, since I'll still bestow glory on the Trojans, to go on killing until they reach the well-benched ships, and the sun goes down, and sacred darkness comes on." 455

So saying, he breathed great power into the horses: they both shook off the dust from their manes to the ground, and lightly took their swift chariot in among Trojans and Achaians, while behind them Automedōn, though grieving for his comrade, fought on, swooped with his team like a vulture after geese: 460 easily would he retreat from the Trojans' noisy conflict, easily make his charge, force a passage through the crowd.
 Yet not one man did he bring down during his urgent pursuit, since no way was he able, alone in that headlong chariot, both to attack with a spear and rein in his speeding horses. 465
 In the end a comrade of his observed his behavior—Alkimedōn, son of Laerkēs and Haimōn's grandson, and getting behind the chariot now spoke to Automedōn:
 "Automedōn, which of the gods has put such profitless counsel into your mind? Who's so robbed you of common sense 470 that you're fighting among the foremost Trojan troops alone? Your comrade's dead, and his armor—Achilles' own—Hektōr himself now wears on his shoulders, flaunts it!"

To him Automedōn, son of Diōrēs, responded:
 "Alkimedōn, what other Achaian save you is able 475 to curb and control the might of these immortal steeds—except for Patroklos, the gods' own equal in counsel, while he still lived? But now death and his fate have claimed him.
 So you take from me the whip and shining reins, and I'll dismount from the chariot, join the fighting." 480
 So he spoke. Alkimedōn boarded the rescue-swift chariot, quickly gathering in his hands both the reins and the whip, while Automedōn jumped down. Illustrious Hektōr saw them, and at once said to Aineias, who was standing near by:
 "Aineias, counselor of the bronze-corseleted Trojans, 485 I've just seen the team of Aiakos's swift-footed grandson showing up in the battle line with incompetent charioteers!

These two horses I'd hope to capture, if you in your heart are agreeable, since if the two of us went at them they wouldn't dare to stand firm, to face us in battle." 490

So he spoke, and Anchīsēs' fine son did not disregard him:
the pair strode forward, shoulders hooded with oxhide—dried, stiff, with thick bronze hammered upon it—and with them went both Chromios and the godlike Arētos, hearts brimming with hopeful expectation that they'd now 495 kill the two men and drive off their strong-necked horses—fools that they were, for they wouldn't come back without bloodshed from Automedōn, who now was praying to Zeus, the Father, his dark heart within him filled with courage and strength.
Quickly he spoke to Alkimedōn, his trusty comrade: 500
"Alkimedōn, don't keep the horses any distance from me—let their breath fall close on my back, for I don't suppose Hektōr, the son of Priam, will be stayed from his raging might till he either mounts behind Achilles' fine-maned horses after killing us both, and routing the rank and file 505 of the Argives—or else himself is slain in the front line."

So saying, he called out to both Aiases and Menelaös:
"Aiases, leaders of Argives, and you, Menelaös!
Entrust the body to those who are the best men we have, to stand around it and fend off these crowding assailants— 510
But we're alive! Come help us, keep the ruthless day from us, for here, bearing hard down on us in grievous battle are Aineias and Hektōr, the Trojans' best fighting men!
Still, the outcome of all this lies on the knees of the gods—
I too will let fly my spear: for the rest, let Zeus decide!" 515

So saying, he poised and threw his far-shadowing spear, and hit the well-balanced shield of Arētos, that failed to stop its passage: clean through the bronze it drove,
and pierced through the baldric into the nether belly.
As when a strong young man, wielding a sharpened axe, 520 lands a blow behind the horns of a country ox, cuts clean through the tendon, and the ox starts forward, falls, so Arētos jerked forward, then fell on his back: the spear, razor-sharp, quivered deep in his innards, unstrung his limbs.

Now Hektōr with his bright spear let fly at Automedōn, 525 but Automedōn was watching, and avoided the bronze spear
 by ducking down forward, so that its long shaft
 stuck in the ground behind him, its butt-end quivering,
 and there mighty Arēs took its power away from it.
 They'd have faced off with their swords then, fought hand to hand, 530 had the two Aiases not parted them—both hot for battle—coming out through the ranks in response to their comrade's call, so that from fear of them both Hektōr and Aineias, together with godlike Chromios, retreated once more, leaving Arētos behind, mortally wounded, still 535 lying there. Automedōn now, the peer of speedy Arēs, stripped off Arētos's armor and boasted over him, saying:
 "Indeed, if only a little, I've eased my heart of its grief for Menoitios's son, though it was a lesser man that I killed."

 So saying, he picked up the bloodstained trappings, put them 540 in the chariot, climbed aboard it himself, his feet and hands above them all bloody, like a lion that's devoured a bull.

 Once more over Patroklos the grinding battle was stretched, tear-laden and agonizing: Athēnē stirred the conflict, coming down from the sky, dispatched by far-seeing Zeus 545 to urge on the Danaäns, for by now his mind had been changed.
 As Zeus from heaven stretches a rainbow's shimmering arc as a portent for mortals—it may be either of war, or of some chill winter storm, that stops men from working outdoors on the land, and distresses their flocks—just so 550 Athēnē, enshrouding herself in a dark cloud, now ranged through the Achaian forces, began spurring each man on.
 First, with encouraging words she addressed the son of Atreus, brave Menelaös, since he was near at hand, assuming the form of Phoinix, and his unwearying voice: 555
 "For you indeed, Menelaös, there will be sure disgrace and shame, if lordly Achilles' trusty comrade is torn apart by quick dogs beneath the walls of Troy!
 So hold your position firmly, encourage all your men."

 Menelaös of the fine war cry made her this answer: 560
 "Phoinix, old daddy, aged sir, if only Athēnē would give me strength, fend off the oncoming missiles, then I'd be ready to stand by Patroklos, protect him, for his death touched my heart to the quick. But Hektōr's strength is like fire's, he never rests from slaughtering with the bronze, since it's to him Zeus now grants glory." 565

So he spoke, and the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē, rejoiced, since it was to her, before all other gods, that he'd prayed;
and she put power into his knees and shoulders, and filled his breast with the aggressiveness of the fly: 570 however often swatted away from a man's skin, still it persists in biting him, so sweet it finds human blood.
Such the daring with which she flooded his dark spirit:
he went and stood over Patroklos, let fly his gleaming spear.
Now among the Trojans there was one Podēs, Ēētiōn's son, 575 both wealthy and a good fighter, and honored by Hektōr, above all the people, as his friend and dinner-companion.
Him fair-haired Menelaös struck on the baldric as he leapt into flight; the bronze made its way clean through.
He fell with a thud, and Atreus's son Menelaös 580 dragged his corpse from the Trojans into his comrades' ranks.

Then Apollo intervened, gave encouragement to Hektōr, in the likeness of Phainōps, Asios's son, who of all his guest-friends was dearest him, whose house was in Abydos.
In his likeness the deadly archer Apollo now addressed him: 585
"Hektōr, what other Achaian will be afraid of you, now you've fled before Menelaös, who—at least in the past—seemed a faint-hearted fighter? Yet single-handed he's snatched a corpse from the Trojans, and killed your trusty comrade, a good front-line fighter—Podēs, Ēētiōn's son." 590

So he spoke, and a black cloud of grief enshrouded Hektōr, and he strode through the front-line fighters, clad in gleaming bronze.

Now, too, the son of Kronos took his aegis—tasseled, glittering bright—enveloped Ida in clouds, sent lightning, made a huge thunderclap, shook the aegis, 595 gave victory to the Trojans, put the Achaians to flight.

First to panic and flee was Boiōtian Pēneleös, who, turning to face the enemy, was hit in the upper shoulder, a glancing blow, yet Poulydamas's spear point nicked

the bone (it was he who'd speared him, at close range). 600 Lēitos too, great-hearted Alektryōn's son, was wounded, in the wrist, at close quarters, by Hektōr, put out of the fight:
 he backed off, glancing round, since he no longer hoped,
 spear in good hand, to do battle with the Trojans.
 As Hektōr chased after Lēitos, Idomeneus struck 605 his corselet, upon the chest by the nipple; but the long spear shaft broke off at the socket, so that the Trojans raised a loud cheer. Now Hektōr had a shot at Idomeneus, Deukaliōn's son, as he stood in his chariot—just missed him, but hit the charioteer and comrade of Mērionēs, 610 Koiranos, who'd accompanied him from well-built Lyktos.
 Idomeneus had at first come on foot from the curved ships, and would have yielded a great triumph to the Trojans had Koiranos not quickly driven up his swift horses, come as a light of deliverance to him, warding off his pitiless day, 615 but died himself at the hands of Hektōr, killer of men, who hit him below the ear, in under the jawline. The spear dashed his teeth out by their roots, cut his tongue at the midpoint.
 He fell from the chariot, dropped the reins on the ground.
 Mērionēs bent down, gathered them up in his own hands 620 from the earth, and addressed Idomeneus:

"Use the whip now till you get to the swift ships! You yourself can recognize that the upper hand is no longer with the Achaians."

So he spoke, and Idomeneus lashed the fine-maned horses back to the hollow ships, for fear had seized his heart. 625

Nor did great-hearted Aias and Menelaös fail to see that Zeus was backing the Trojans, turning the tide of battle.
 Of these it was Telamōn's son, great Aias, who spoke first:
 "What's to be done? By this time even the merest idiot could figure that Zeus himself, the Father, is for the Trojans: 630 all their missiles, whoever throws them, coward or hero, hit their target—Zeus anyway steers them straight—but for us every man's shot falls uselessly to the ground!
 So let's think up a plan, the best way we can contrive to drag that corpse out of the fray, and as for ourselves, 635 manage to get back home, a great joy to our comrades, who must be distressed by the scene here, who don't believe that the rage and invincible hands of Hektōr, killer of men, can now be stood off, are sure they'll descend on the black ships!

 If only there were some comrade to take a message posthaste 640 to Pēleus's son, since I don't think he's yet received the sorrowful news that his own dear comrade is slain.
 But such a one I can't see amongst the Achaians, since they're all shrouded in mist—their selves and their horses!
 Zeus, Father, rescue the Achaians' sons from this mist, 645 make the sky clear, let us see with our eyes; if you mean to kill us, if that's your pleasure, at least do it in daylight."

So he spoke: the Father pitied him as he wept, and forthwith scattered the darkness, drove the mist away:
 the sun shone on them, the battle was all now in clear view. 650
 Then Aias addressed Menelaös of the fine war cry:
 "Take a look, Menelaös, Zeus's nursling, in case you can spot Antilochos still alive there, great-hearted Nestōr's son, and send him, as fast as may be, to warlike Achilles to tell him his dearest comrade by far has been killed." 655

So he spoke: Menelaös of the fine war cry did not disregard him, but went on his way like a lion from a steading, tired of provoking the dogs and men that won't let him get in and seize the fattest steer, who are vigilant
 the whole night through—yet he, so desperate for meat, 660 keeps coming, but gets nowhere, has to face a shower
 of hunting spears flung by strong hands, and blazing firebrands
 before which, for all his eagerness, he shrinks back, and at dawn goes on his way, his spirit crushed—so from Patroklos went Menelaös, of the fine war cry, 665 against his will, for he greatly feared that the Achaians in their disastrous flight might leave him a prey for his foes.
 Repeatedly he adjured Mērionēs and both Aiases:
 "You Aiases, Argive leaders, and, Mērionēs, you too—each one of you should remember the gentleness of Patroklos— 670 unhappy soul!—for he knew how to be kind to all men while he still lived: but now death and destiny have claimed him."

This said, fair-haired Menelaös went on his way, glancing from side to side like an eagle—which, they say, has the keenest eyesight of all the sky's winged creatures, 675 and from it, high though it glides, the hare is not hidden crouching under a leafy bush, but the eagle swoops straight down, and having caught it, quickly robs it of life.

 Thus then, Menelaös, Zeus's nursling, did your glinting eyes roam everywhere over the company of your many comrades, 680 in the hope of discovering Nestör's son still alive there.
 Menelaös soon picked him out—at the far left of the battle, encouraging his comrades and urging them on to fight—and went over, and said, standing near him: "Come here, Antilochos, Zeus's nursling: there's news you need to learn, 685 distressing news, that I wish had never come about!
 By now I think you must know, from what you've seen, that there's some god's who's rolling disaster upon the Danaäns, that the Trojans are winning. Slain is the best of the Achaïans—Patroklos, leaving the Danaäns with a huge sense of loss: 690 so you must run, at once, to the Achaïans' ships, bring word to Achilles, let him quickly bring the body back to his ship—the naked body: his armor bright-helmeted Hektör holds."

 So he spoke: Antilochos heard his words with horror.
 For long he was stricken speechless, while both his eyes 695 were brimming with tears, and his strong young voice was stilled.
 Even so he did not ignore the command of Menelaös:
 he set off at a run, gave his gear to his peerless companion Laodokos, who was turning his whole-hoofed team close by.

 So Antilochos's feet bore him, weeping, away from the battle 700 to bring these evil tidings to Pēleus's son Achilles.
 Nor, Menelaös, Zeus's nursling, was your spirit minded to lend help to those hard-pressed Pylïan comrades whom Antilochos, going, had left with a huge sense of loss.
 He sent noble Thrasymēdēs to them, but himself, at a run, 705 went back to the hero Patroklos, stood once more over him.
 Going first up to the Aiases, he told them at once:
 "That man you mentioned I've sent on to the swift ships, to go to swift-footed Achilles, who, even now, I don't think will come out, enraged though he is at noble Hektör— 710 there's no way he would fight without armor against the Trojans.
 So let's think up a plan, the best way we can contrive

to drag that corpse out of the fray, and as for ourselves, to stay clear of death and its spirits amid the Trojans' clamor."

Then great Aias, Telamōn's son, responded to him: 715
"All you've said, renowned Menelaös, is right and proper.
So you and Mērionēs go quickly, shoulder the corpse, carry it out of the struggle: we two behind you will do battle with the Trojans and noble Hektōr, one in name as in spirit, we who in times gone by 720 have stood firm in sharp battles, each supporting the other."

So he spoke: they gathered the corpse in their arms and with huge effort heaved it up, while behind them the Trojan troops all cried out when they saw Achaians lifting the body, and charged straight at them, like hounds that go for a wounded 725 wild boar, out in front of their young huntsmen: at first they keep rushing at it, eager to tear it apart, but when, trusting its strength, it turns at bay amongst them, they back off, scatter in panic, one this way, one that—so the Trojans at first kept after them in a body, 730 stabbing at them with swords and two-edged spears; but each time the two Aiases turned and made a stand against them, then would their color change, and none now dared to come forward and do battle for the corpse.

So these two, hurriedly, bore the body out of the fighting 735 back to the hollow ships: against them pressed a conflict as savage as flames that race to reach a populous city, set it ablaze in an instant, and houses collapse in the vast fire that's driven, roaring, by the wind's force—so against these now the uproar of chariots and spearmen 740 came beating ceaselessly as they struggled on their way; but like mules that put their strong backs into the effort and drag from the mountains, down some steep stony track, a beam or a huge ship timber, their hearts within them worn down with sweat and exhaustion as they strive onward— 745 so these two, straining, bore off the corpse, while behind them the Aiases held back the foe, as a ridge holds off a flood, a wooded ridge, that by chance lies right across a plain,
and checks the dangerous onset of even the strongest rivers, turns all their streams back to wander over the plain, 750 nor can their mighty torrent ever burst through it—so the two Aiases constantly stood off the assaults; yet the Trojans kept on coming, two of them above all, Aineias, son of Anchīsēs, and illustrious Hektōr.

As a cloud of starlings or jackdaws will take wing, and cry 755 the alarm when they catch sight of a hawk approaching—the creature that bodes plain murder for all small birds—so from Aineias and Hektōr fled the Achaians' young warriors, crying the alarm, forgetful of their fighting spirit. Many fine pieces of armor were lost now, round and about the ditch, 760 as the Danaäns fled; but from warfare there was no respite.

Book 18

So these fought on in the likeness of blazing fire;
but swift-footed Antilochos came to Achilles as messenger, and found him in front of his high-sterned ships, his mind foreboding what indeed had already been fulfilled.
Deeply vexed, he addressed his own proud spirit: “Ah me, 5 why yet again are the long-haired Achaians being driven over the plain, panic-stricken, back to their ships?
May the gods not be fulfilling that grim grief for my heart spelled out to me once by my mother, when she told me that the very best of the Myrmidons, while I still lived, 10 would flee the light of the sun, at the Trojans’ hands!
It must be that he’s dead, Menoitios’s valiant son!
The fool! I told him, when he’d beaten the fierce fire back, to return to the ships, not match his strength with Hektōr’s.”

While he was reflecting thus, in his mind and heart, 15 the son of illustrious Nestōr came into his presence shedding hot tears, and announced his unhappy message: “Alas, son of warlike Pēleus, painful indeed is the news you must hear, of what never should have been—Patroklos lies dead, and they’re fighting over his body, 20 his naked body: his armor bright-helmeted Hektōr holds.”

So he spoke: a black cloud of grief closed over Achilles.
With both hands he gathered up the dark grimy dust, scattered it over his head, befouled his handsome features, and on his fragrant tunic the black ash settled. 25
There stretched in the dust, great in his greatness he lay;
with his own hands he tore and defiled his hair.
Those maidservants won as spoils by Achilles and Patroklos shrieked aloud in their heartfelt anguish, ran out of doors, stood around warlike Achilles, all with their hands 30 beat on their breasts, the limbs of all were weakened.
Antilochos, opposite them, lamented, shedding tears—and grasped the hands of Achilles, whose heartfelt groans made Antilochos fear he might cut his throat with his knife.

 So terrible was his outcry, his lady mother heard him, 35 ensconced in the sea's depths, beside the Old Man, her father, and shrieked in her turn, and the goddesses gathered round her,
 all of Nereus's daughters there were in the sea's depths.
 Thither came Glaukē and Thaleia, Kymodokē, Nēsaia, Speiō, and Thoē, and ox-eyed Haliē, 40
 Kymothoē and Aktaia, along with Limnōreia, Melitē and Iaira, Agauē, Amphithoē, Dōtō and Prōtō, Dyamenē and Pherousa, Dexamenē and Amphinomē and Kallianeira, Dōris and Panopē and far-famed Galateia, 45 Nēmertēs, Aspeudēs, and Kallianassa.
 With these also came Klyménē, Ianeira, and Ianassa, Maira and Ōreithyia and fair-tressed Amatheia, and other Nēreïds from elsewhere in the sea's depths; and with them the bright cave was filled, and all alike 50 beat their breasts, and their lamentation was led by Thetis:
 "Listen, my Nēreïd sisters, that one and all you may hear and know well the sum of the sorrows within my heart!
 Ah, wretch that I am, most miserable in my splendid offspring!
 A son indeed I bore, incomparable and mighty, 55 preeminent among heroes: like a sapling he shot up, and when, like a tree on an orchard knoll, I'd reared him,
 I sent him out to Ilion in the curved ships, to fight the Trojans; but now I'll never welcome him back to his home, he'll never return to the house of Pēleus! 60
 Now, even while he still lives and sees the sunlight, he has sorrow, nor can I be of help by going to him;
 but go I will, to see my dear child, and learn what grief has come upon him while he's still keeping out of the war."
 So saying, she left the cave, and the nymphs went with her, 65 shedding tears: on each side of them the waves of the sea broke into surf. When they came to rich-soiled Troy they stepped out onto the beach one by one, where, in serried ranks, the Myrmidons' ships were drawn up round swift Achilles.
 As he groaned heavily, his lady mother went to him, 70 gave a sharp cry, then cradled the head of her son in her arms, and, lamenting, addressed him with winged words:

“Why are you weeping, child? What grief has touched your heart?
 Tell me, don’t hide it! What you wanted has been fulfilled by Zeus, what you earlier prayed for, hands uplifted— 75 that all the Achaians’ sons should be huddled by their ships, in desperate need of you, enduring shameful treatment.”

To her, sighing deeply, swift-footed Achilles replied: “Mother, all this indeed the Olympian managed for me, but what joy have I from it, now my dear comrade is dead— 80 Patroklos, whom I honored above all other comrades, as I would my own life? Him I’ve lost, while his armor Hektōr stripped when he’d killed him—a marvel to look at, fine gear, that the gods gave to Pēleus as glorious gifts the day they delivered you into the bed of a mortal! 85 Better you’d stayed among the sea’s deathless maidens, and that Pēleus had brought to his home a mortal bride!
 But now there’s measureless grief awaiting you too, for the death of your son, whom you’ll not welcome home ever again: my heart won’t let me live on, either, 90 in mankind’s company, unless it happens that Hektōr, struck down by my spear, shall lose his life first, and pay for the way he despoiled Patroklos, Menoitios’s son.”

Thetis then answered him, shedding tears: “Oh, my child, what you say now means that you’re doomed to an early death, 95 since your own fate awaits you very soon after Hektōr’s.”

Deeply moved, swift-footed Achilles replied: “Let me die very soon, then! Clearly I wasn’t fated to save my comrade from being killed—far away from his native soil he perished, in need of me as his protector from harm! 100
 So now, since I’ll not return to my own dear fatherland, nor have been of the slightest help to either Patroklos or my other comrades—those many destroyed by noble Hektōr—but sit, a useless burden on earth, here by the ships—I, who am such as no other bronze-corseleted Achaian 105 is as a fighter, though others may be better in council—would that strife might perish among both gods and men, and bitter resentment, that stirs even sensible men to fury, and, far sweeter than honey dripping down, increases in men’s breasts like billowing smoke! Thus, lately, 110 did the lord of men, Agamemnōn, arouse my resentment. Still, all this, despite our grief, we'll treat as past and done with, restraining, because we must, the heart in our breast. So now I shall come out, to run down that dear soul's killer, Hektōr; my own death I'll accept whenever Zeus 115 and the other immortal gods decide to bring it on;

 for not even the mighty Hēraklēs could escape death, dearest of all though he was to Zeus the son of Kronos, but fate overcame him, and Hērē's grim resentment.
 So I too—if indeed there's a like fate's in wait for me— 120 shall lie when I'm dead. But for now, let me win high renown, causing many a one of all those deep-bosomed women—Trojan, Dardanian—to wipe tears from their tender cheeks with both hands, to keen ceaselessly, to get it into their heads that I'd held off too long from battle! So do not try, 125 though you love me, to stop me fighting: you'll not persuade me."

Then the goddess, Thetis the silver-footed, replied:
 "Yes, this is certainly true, child: it's no bad thing to fend off sheer destruction from hard-pressed comrades.
 But your fine battle gear's in Trojan hands, your armor 130 of gleaming bronze: bright-helmeted Hektōr himself wears it now on his shoulders, flaunts it—but won't, I think, glory in it for long, since his own killing's very close.
 Do not, for now, go into the turmoil of battle until with your own eyes you see me return here: 135 I'll be back in the morning at sunrise, bringing with me fine new armor for you from the lord Hēphaistos."

With that
 she turned away from her son, and having left him approached her marine sisters, and spoke thus among them:
 "You now go back down into the sea's wide gulf, 140 call on the Old Man of the Sea, visit our father's house, tell him all the news. I myself am off to high Olympos, to approach Hēphaistos, famed craftsman, and see if he'll agree to furnish my son with new battle gear, fine and gleaming."
 So she spoke: at once they plunged under the sea's waves, 145 while she, Thetis, the goddess, silver-footed, made her way to Olympos, to fetch splendid armor for her beloved son.

Her then her feet took to Olympos; but the Achaians, with deafening outcry, pursued by Hektōr, killer of men, came in their flight to the ships and the Hellespont. 150 Nor could these well-greaved Achaians drag Patroklos out of missile range, corpse though he was, and Achilles' squire, for now once more Troy's troops and chariots were on him, and Hektōr, Priam's son, a man of flame-like valor.
 Thrice did illustrious Hektōr seize his feet from behind, 155 bent on dragging him off, and yelling to the Trojans, while thrice the two Aiases, clothed in courage and daring, beat him back from the corpse—yet, sure of his own prowess, he'd now make a charge in the fray, and now stand firm, shouting aloud; but he backed off not one step. 160
 Just as there's no way country shepherds can drive off a tawny lion from a carcass when he's starving hungry, so the two Aiases could not, prime warriors though they were, scare Priam's son Hektōr away from the corpse. And now he'd have dragged it off, and garnered ineffable glory, 165 had not swift Iris, wind-footed, come to Pēleus's son from Olympos in haste, with a message to arm himself for battle, sent by Hērē, unknown to Zeus and the other gods.
 Now standing beside him she addressed him with winged words:
 "Up with you, son of Pēleus, of all men the most fearsome, 170 and rescue Patroklos, on whose account grim fighting is going on before the ships: men are slaughtering one another, some striving to defend the fallen warrior's corpse, while others, the Trojans, are determined to haul him away from the fighting to windy Ilion. Of them all, illustrious Hektōr 175 is most set on dragging him off, for his heart's bidding him cut the head from that tender neck, stick it up on a sharp stake!
 Up, then, lie here no longer: shame should possess your heart that Patroklos may become sport for the dogs of Troy—yours the disgrace, if his body should reach us at all disfigured." 180 Swift-footed noble Achilles responded to her: "Iris, goddess, which god was it sent you as messenger to me?"
 Swift Iris, wind-footed, made him this reply:
 "It was Hērē who sent me, Zeus's far-famed bedfellow—
 The high-throned son of Kronos knows nothing about it, nor 185 any other immortal that dwells upon snow-clad Olympos."

In answer to her then swift-footed Achilles said:
 “But how can I enter the struggle? They have my armor, and my mother told me not to arm myself for the fray until with my own eyes I see her come back here, since 190 she promised to bring me fine new armor from Hēphaistos.
 No other man do I know whose famed battle gear I might use, except for the shield of Aias, the son of Telamōn—but he, I think, will be out himself with the front-line fighters, dealing death with his spear in defense of dead Patroklos.” 195

To him again spoke swift Iris, the wind-footed: “We too are well aware that the Trojans now have your famous armor!
 Go just as you are to the ditch, show yourself to these Trojans, see if they fear you enough to back off from the fighting!
 Let the warlike Achaians’ sons, now worn out, catch their breath 200 for a little: too brief is the breathing space from battle.”

This said, swift-footed Iris went on her way, but Achilles, beloved of Zeus, now stood up, and Athēnē around his powerful shoulders arranged the tasseled aegis, and about his head she, bright among goddesses, set 205
 a golden cloud, and from him made blaze a shining flame.
 As when smoke rises up to heaven from a city on some distant island that enemies are besieging, and all day long men contend in hateful warfare from the city’s walls, and then when the sun goes down 210 the beacon fires are lit one after another, their flames blazing high for those dwelling round about to observe, in the hope that they’ll come in their ships, help fix the trouble, so from Achilles’ head the gleam went up to heaven.
 From wall to ditch he went, and stood there, but did not mingle 215 with the Achaians, respecting his mother’s wise advice.
 There he stood, and shouted—and Athēnē, standing apart, gave voice too—arousing vast panic among the Trojans.
 As clear as the trumpet’s note sounds out when a township’s encircled by enemies with destruction on their minds, 220 so clear was the war cry uttered by Aiakos’s grandson: when the Trojans heard that brazen voice, and knew its author, the spirits of all were confounded. The fine-maned horses turned their chariots backwards, sensing trouble ahead; their charioteers were in panic when they saw the tireless fire 225 blaze marvelously over the head of Pēleus's great-hearted son—a fire lit and kept shining by the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē.

 Three great shouts over the ditch did noble Achilles give, and three times the Trojans and their far-famed allies panicked:
 twelve of their finest fighters perished there and then, 230 among their own spears and chariots.¹ But the Achaians happily dragged Patroklos out of range of the missiles, laid him down on a litter. His comrades gathered around him, weeping: swift-footed Achilles accompanied them, shedding warm tears, on seeing his loyal comrade 235 stretched out on the bier, cut about by the sharp bronze:
 he'd sent him out, along with his chariot and horses, to war, but never was he to welcome him back again.

The ox-eyed lady Hērē now forced the unwearying sun to make its unwilling return to the streams of Ocean: so 240 the sun set, and the noble Achaians had some respite from the powerful turmoil and warfare's uncertain outcome.

The Trojans, for their part, when back from the grind of battle, unyoked the swift horses from their chariots, and gathered in assembly, before any thought of supper. They stayed 245 on their feet right through the meeting: not one man dared to sit down, scared to trembling as they all were by Achilles' appearance, so very long he'd been gone from injurious battle. Shrewd Poulydamas spoke first, Pánthoös's son, who alone looked both forward and back:² 250 Hektōr's comrade he was, and born on the same night, though the one excelled with words, with a spear the other.
 He with friendly intent now spoke before the assembly:
 "Think hard on both sides, my friends. For myself, I urge you to go back now to the city, not to wait for the bright dawn 255 out on the plain by the ships: we're far from our walls here.

1. How are we to assume that these twelve fine warriors died? The question has bedeviled everyone from the earliest Hellenistic scholiasts on. Textual emendation has offered no convincing solutions. Was there such panic that they were crushed in the frantic rout of their own troops? One intriguing suggestion (Jasper Griffin, Homer on Life and Death, 1980, 39, cited by Edwards 2011, 173) is that they are supposed to have died of fear at the terrible sound of the great hero's war cry. But I know of no clearly satisfying explanation.

2. This refers not to any prophetic powers, but simply to "the wisdom of experience" (Edwards 2011, 176).

While this man remained wrathful at noble Agamemnōn, it was an easier business to fight against the Achaians:
 I too gladly stayed all night out by the swift ships then in the hope of seeing them captured, rounded hulls and all; 260 but now I'm truly afraid of Pēleus's swift-footed son—his spirit's so headstrong, he won't be willing to stay here in mid-plain, where both Trojans and Achaians share the rage of battle between them on disputed ground:
 it's for our city he'll be fighting, and for our women! 265
 So, back to the city: this, believe me, is how things will be.
 For now night has stilled the swift-footed son of Pēleus, ambrosial night; but if tomorrow he comes out armed, and finds us still here, there are those who'll get to know him too well, and then happy the man who escapes to sacred 270 Ilion, for many the victims that dogs and vultures will eat—Trojans! But may such tidings never reach my ears!
 Now: if we follow my plan—however reluctantly—tonight we'll keep our forces in the place of assembly, while the ramparts, the high gateways, and the tall polished doors 275 close-fitted in them, well bolted, will safeguard the city.
 Tomorrow at dawn, then, armed, armored, and ready, we'll position ourselves on the ramparts: the worse for him, if he wants to come up from the ships and fight us for our wall!
 Back he'll go to the ships, after glutting his high-necked horses 280 with all his to-and-fro dashing, in vain, beneath the city!
 As for getting inside—that he won't, however great his rage, nor ever sack Troy: before that swift dogs will devour him.”

 Scowling darkly, bright-helmeted Hektōr responded: “Poulydamas, what you're proposing no longer pleases me— 285 telling us to retreat, to stay cooped up in the town!
 Haven't you yet had your fill of being stuck inside the ramparts?
 Time was when Priam's city was talked of by all mankind, how rich it was in gold, all its wealth of bronze;
 but its homes have now lost their fine treasures, while many 290 possessions have gone to Phrygia and to lovely Maiōnia, sold for cash, ever since great Zeus turned his wrath against us.
 But now, when the son of devious Kronos has let me win renown at the ships, blockade the Achaians by the sea, no longer, you fool, promote such ideas as these in public: 295 not one Trojan will support you, I'll not allow it!

 So come, then, let us all agree to do as I say:
 For now, take your dinner throughout the camp, as usual:
 and keep a good lookout, every one of you stay alert;
 any Trojan who's overmuch concerned for his possessions 300 should turn them all in for the populace to eat up—better that they should enjoy them than the Achaians!
 Tomorrow at dawn, then, armed, armored, and ready,
 let's go to the hollow ships, start some sharp engagements—and if noble Achilles has really stood up to fight by the ships, 305 so much, if he's that way minded, the worse for him: I for one won't avoid him or miserable warfare, but face to face I'll confront him, and see whether he then triumphs, or I do.
 Enyalios is impartial: he kills the would-be killer."

Such was Hektōr's address, and the Trojans cheered him, 310 the fools, for their wits had been stolen by Pallas Athēnē: on Hektōr, for his bad counsel, they all heaped praise; but none praised Poulydamas, though he'd offered them excellent advice.
 So throughout the camp they ate dinner; but the Achaians wailed all night long in their mourning for Patroklos. 315 Pēleus's son it was led them in their heartfelt lamentation, laying his murderous hands upon his comrade's breast, with quick loud sobs. He was like a bearded lion whose cubs a deer hunter has stolen away from some dense thicket: later, the lion returns and ranges, 320 grieving, through many a glen on the hunter's tracks, hoping to catch him somewhere, possessed by bitter fury.
 So, groaning deeply, to the Myrmidons spoke Achilles:
 "Ah, me, vain indeed were the words I uttered that day reassuring the hero Menoitios in our halls— 325 I said I'd bring his son home to Opoeis wreathed in glory from the sacking of Ilion, with his fair share of the spoils!
 But not all their designs does Zeus fulfil for mortals—we two are both fated to redden the selfsame earth here in Troy, since I too shall never come back home 330 to be welcomed by the old horseman Pēleus in his halls or by Thetis my mother: the earth will hold me here for ever.
 But now, Patroklos, since the earth will claim me later than you, I'll not bury you till I've brought here Hektōr's armor and head—he, the killer of your mighty heart; 335 and in front of your pyre I shall cut the throats of a dozen noble Trojan youths, so enraged I am at your slaying.

 Till then you'll lie as you are alongside my curved ships, and round you deep-bosomed women, Trojans, Dardanians, will mourn for you, shedding tears, by day and by night— 340 women we toiled to win by the force of our long spears, laying waste the wealthy cities of mortal men.”

That said,
 noble Achilles now gave the word to his comrades to set on the fire a great cauldron, so they might quickly wash Patroklos clean of oozing blood and gore. 345
 They stood in the blaze a vessel for heating bathwater and filled it, and under it gathered and kindled much firewood:
 flames licked round the cauldron's belly, the water warmed.
 When the water came to a boil in the shining bronze then indeed they washed him, and rubbed his body with oil, 350 filled his wounds with an ointment nine years old, then laid him out on a bier, wrapped from head to foot in soft linen, and over that they dressed him in a white robe.
 The whole night through then, round swift-footed Achilles, the Myrmidons wailed in mourning for their Patroklos. 355

Now Zeus spoke to Hērē, his sister and his wife:
 “You've had your way, then, my ox-eyed lady Hērē: you've aroused swift-footed Achilles! Surely they must be your very own offspring, all these long-haired Achaians.”

The ox-eyed lady Hērē then responded to him: 360 “Most dread son of Kronos, what is this that you've said?
 Even a human, surely, will do things for his fellow-man—though, being mortal, he doesn't possess all the wisdom that I do—I who declare I'm the highest of all goddesses, as the eldest born, and because I'm recognized 365 as your consort—and you're the king of all the immortals!
 How, in my rage, could I not cobble trouble for these Trojans?”

Thus they spoke to each other; but meanwhile Thetis, the silver-footed, came to the house of Hēphaistos—imperishable, starry, outstanding among gods' homes, 370 made of bronze, and built by the little clubfoot himself.

Him she found sweating as he bustled around his bellows, working fast: he was making tripods, twenty in all,
 to stand round the wall of his solidly built dwelling, and under the base of each he'd fixed golden wheels, 375 so that of themselves they could enter the divine assembly and come back again to his house, a marvel to behold.
 So far, then, they were finished, but the intricately wrought ear-handles had not yet been added: these he was fitting, and hammering in the rivets. As he worked with expert skill, 380 he was approached by Thetis, the silver-footed goddess.
 She was seen by bright-veiled Charis, who now came forward—lovely Charis, wed by the far-famed lame-of-both-legs god—and clasped her hand, and addressed her in these words:
 "What, long-robed Thetis, brings you now to our house? 385 Though a dear and respected friend, you've not visited us before.

Do come in, and let me offer you entertainment."

So saying, the bright goddess led her inside the house, seated her on a chair, all silver-studded, finely and intricately worked, with below it a stool for the feet, 390 and called to Hēphaistos, famed craftsman, in these words:
 "Hēphaistos, come out here! Thetis has need of you."

The far-famed lame-of-both-legs god answered her:
 "It's an awesome and venerable goddess who's in my house!
 She rescued me, when I was hurting, having fallen so far 395 because of my bitch of a mother, who had her mind set on hiding me and my lameness. I'd have suffered agonies had Eurynomē and Thetis not welcomed me warmly—that Eurynomē who's the daughter of encircling Ocean. The nine years I was with them I made much intricate metalwork: 400 brooches, spiral earrings, rosettes and necklaces, in their hollow cave, and round it the stream of Ocean flowed, boiling with foam and boundless; nor was anyone else, whether god or mortal man, aware of my presence:
 only Thetis knew, and Eurynomē, they who'd saved me. 405 Now herself has come to our house, and I have a great need to repay fair-tressed Thetis fully for having saved my life.
 So you set before her our best entertainment for a guest, while I put away my bellows and all my working tools."

With that, he rose from his anvil, hard-breathing, bulky, 410 limping: yet under him his stunted legs moved lightly.
 His bellows he put well away from the fire, and all his tools that he worked with he stored in a silver chest.
 Then with a sponge he cleaned his face and both his hands, and his bull neck and shaggy breast, and put on a tunic, 415 and chose a thick stick, and took himself to the door, limping; and quickly there moved to support their master handmaids of gold, in the likeness of young living girls.
 There was mind and intelligence in them, they could speak, they had bodily strength, the immortal gods taught them skills. 420 Now they bustled around their lord, while he limped across to where Thetis was, sat down on a shining chair, took her hand in his, and greeted her with these words:
 “What, long-robed Thetis, brings you now to our house?
 Though a dear and respected friend, you’ve not visited us before. 425 Tell me what’s on your mind: my heart bids me fulfill it if fulfill it I can, and if it’s fulfillable.”

Thetis then answered him, weeping: “Is there any goddess today, Hēphaistos, of all those on Olympos, who’s endured so many grievous sorrows in her heart 430 as the woes that Zeus son of Kronos has given me, far beyond all others? Of all marine nymphs only me he made wed a mortal—Pēleus, Aiakos’s son: I endured that mortal’s bed greatly against my will. Now he lies in his halls, broken up by wretched old age; but today there are other woes I endure. 435
 A son indeed he gave me, to bear and to bring up, preeminent among heroes: like a sapling he shot up,
 and when, like a tree on an orchard knoll, I’d reared him,
 I sent him out here to Ilion in the curved ships, to fight the Trojans; but now I’ll never welcome him back 440
 to his home, he’ll never return to the house of Pēleus!
 Now, while he still lives and sees the sunlight
 he has sorrow, nor can I be of help by going to him.
 That girl given him as a prize by the Achaians’ sons has been snatched back out of his hands by the lord Agamemnōn. 445 In grief for her he was eating his heart out; then the Trojans penned the Achaians in by their ships’ sterns, would not let them break out. The Argive elders appealed to him for help, detailed by name the many rich presents they'd offer:

 he himself still refused to keep disaster from them, 450
 but instead arrayed Patroklos in his own armor, and sent him to fight the war, with many men besides.
 The whole day long they struggled around the Skaian Gates, and that day they'd have sacked the city, had not Apollo, after much damage done by Menoitios's brave son, 455 killed him in the front line, giving Hektôr the credit.
 This is why I now beg you, clasping your knees, to agree to make my short-lived son a shield and a helmet, and a corselet and fine greaves equipped with ankle-pieces; for the gear he once possessed his trusty comrade lost 460 when slain by the Trojans, and now he lies heartbroken on the ground."

The far-famed lame-of-both-legs god then answered her: "Don't despair,
 and don't let these matters become a burden on your mind!
 I just wish that I could conceal him, far away from grievous death, when his dread fate comes on him, as surely as now 465 he'll get his fine new armor, such gear that in time to come all mankind will be thunderstruck at the sight of it."

So saying,
 he left her there, and went back to where his bellows were, turned them to face the fire, gave them their working orders; and the bellows, twenty all told, blew through their nozzles, 470 sending out blasts of air from every angle—at times to support Hēphaistos's quick actions, or again to do whatever he needed to make his work complete.
 Into the fire he now cast solid bronze and tin, silver and precious gold; next he set a large anvil 475 to stand on its anvil block, and then grasped in one hand a weighty hammer, in the other his forging tongs.

First he fashioned a shield, both huge and sturdy, adorned intricately all over, and around it set a bright rim, three-layered and glinting, complete with silver baldric. 480 Five were the layers of the shield itself, and on it with consummate skill he set a number of decorations.

On it he fashioned the earth, the sea, and the heavens, the unwearying sun, the moon on its increase to full, and every constellation with which the heavens are crowned— 485

 the Pleiadēs, the Hyadēs, the majesty of Orīōn, and the Bear, that's also known to mankind as the Wain, that revolves in one place, keeping a watchful eye on Orīōn, and alone never sinks into the baths of Ocean.

On it he also fashioned two cities of humankind, 490 fine ones: in the first there were marriages and banquets, with brides being led from their quarters by flaring torchlight through the city, to the accompaniment of many a wedding song, and young men awirl in the dance, while for them the pipes and lyres played on without stopping, and the women stood 495 at their doors, admiring spectators. There was a crowd of citizens drawn to the meeting place: a dispute had arisen between two men, at loggerheads over the blood-price of a man who'd been killed: one claimed, in a public speech, to have paid it all, but the other swore he'd been given nothing, 500 and both were determined to win the arbitrator's verdict.
 People were backing both sides, cheering one or the other, while heralds held them back, and the elders were sitting on polished seats of stone in the sacred circle, the loud-voiced heralds' staffs in their hands: holding these 505 they would rise to deliver judgment, each in turn;
 and there between them were set two talents³ of gold,
 to go to the one who delivered the fairest verdict.

But around the other city there lay two bodies of troops, agleam in their armor, divided by two competing plans— 510 should they lay the place waste, or share between both sides all the wealth that this lovely city contained? However, the besieged would have none of it, were arming for an ambush.
 The ramparts were manned by their dear wives and children, and along with them such men as were crippled by old age; 515 but the rest were out after action, led by Arēs and Athēnē—both of gold, and golden the raiment in which they were clad, handsome and tall in their armor, as befits gods, and clearly visible all around: the men below them were smaller.

3. If Ridgeway (cited by Leaf, 2: 253–54) was right, the Homeric talent equaled the price of one ox, which would seem a fair enough recompense in this context (and elsewhere in Homer, e.g., 23.269, 614). We are certainly not dealing here with the later classical talent of roughly 57 ½ lbs weight, which in gold would represent a sizable fortune.

When they reached the spot where they'd chosen to set their ambush, 520 in a riverbed, with a watering place for flocks and herds, then they settled down, all of them, armored in gleaming bronze, and two scouts were posted, some way from the main body, to watch out for a glimpse of the sheep and well-fed cattle.

These very soon arrived, and with them a pair of herdsmen 525 playing their pipes, unaware of the trap. Then the ambushers, when they saw them coming, charged out, and in a trice cut off the herded cattle, the splendid flocks of white-fleeced sheep, and slaughtered both the herdsmen.

The besiegers, now hearing loud tumult among the cattle 530 from the meeting place where they sat, mounted at once behind their high-stepping horses, set off, and quickly reached them.

Then they halted, and fought there beside the river's banks, letting fly, each side at the other, with their bronze-tipped spears; and Strife and Tumult mixed with them, and the baneful Death-Spirit, 535 seizing one man alive, but wounded, another without a wound, yet another dragged through the turmoil, dead, by the feet;
and the shift Strife wore round her shoulders was scarlet with men's blood; like living mortals they engaged and fought, and each of them dragged off bodies that the others had slain. 540

On it he also fashioned a broad field of rich plowland, soft-soiled, thrice-plowed from fallow, with many plowmen on it, turning their teams, driving them up and down, and when, at the turning point, they reached the edge of the field, then a man would come up and hand them a cup of wine, 545 honey-sweet, and the plowmen would speed to the furrow's end, eager to reach the turn in the deep soil; and behind them the field grew black, as though it had really been plowed, though made of gold: here indeed was marvelous artistry.

On it he also fashioned a royal estate, where farmhands 550 were reaping, sharp sickles in hand. Of the cut swathes some were falling in rows, along the line of the furrow, while others the sheaf-binders were tying with twists of straw.

Three binders stood there ready, while behind them boys collected the swathes and delivered them, by the armful, 555 without pause, and all the time the king stood by, in silence, at the line of the swathes, staff in hand, and happy at heart.
Away under an oak tree were heralds, preparing a feast, dressing a great ox that they'd sacrificed, while women lavishly sprinkled white barley upon it for the farmhands' dinner.⁴ 560

On it he also fashioned a vineyard, lush with clusters, fine and golden; black the bunched grapes, while the vines were propped up throughout on silver poles. Around it he set a ditch, done in cobalt enamel, and outside that a fence made of tin, with one path to the vineyard, on which 565 the grape pickers went to and fro when harvesting the vines:
and he had girls and boys, all innocently light-hearted, carrying the honey-sweet fruit in wicker baskets, while in the midst of them a boy with a clear-toned lyre made sweet music, and accompanied his own singing— 570 soft and exquisite—of the Linos Song,⁵ while they, stamping the beat and shouting, danced along after him.

On it he also set a herd of straight-horned cattle:
the cows were fashioned out of gold and tin, and went eagerly, lowing, on their way from byre to pasture 575 beside a rushing river, a rippling reed bed.
Of gold were the herdsmen accompanying the cattle—four of them, together with nine swift-footed dogs.
But among the foremost cattle two fearsome lions had got hold of a noisy bull, which, bellowing loudly, 580 was being dragged off, with dogs and youths in hot pursuit.
The lions had ripped up the great bull's hide and were gobbling its innards and black blood, while the herdsmen tried, in vain, to scare them, urging on their swift dogs; but these fought shy of biting the lions: instead 585 they ran up close, barking, then swerved aside.

4. The Greek is ambiguous: was the barley sprinkled as dressing for a general feast or to form a kind of porridge for the workers, while the king and others enjoyed roast meat? At least two modern translations have assumed the latter; but both Leaf (2: 257–58) and Edwards 2011 (224) prefer, rightly I think, the former: Edwards points out that the verb παλύνω (palynō) can only mean “sprinkle” as opposed to “boil in water”, and there is no reason, linguistically or socially, why Homer should not here be describing a general popular feast somewhat like a modern Greek panēgyri.

5. Linos was a mythical musician, supposedly the first human divinely endowed with the art of song, but killed out of jealousy by Apollo (Paus. 9.29.3), and mourned by the Muses. The Linos Song, according to Herodotos (2.79) was an eastern dirge; it was popular with singers at feasts and dances (HE 2: 478, Edwards 2011, 225), so something more cheerful than a dirge in the modern sense: perhaps autumnal / harvest-related, an ancestor of the John Barleycorn songs?

On it the far-famed lame-of-both-legs god made a pasture in a charming glen: a large pasture of white-fleeced sheep along with their sheepfolds and pens and covered shelters.

On it the far-famed lame-of-both-legs god subtly 590 inlaid a dancing floor like the one in spacious Knossos that long ago Daidalos fashioned for fair-tressed Ariadnē.
Here were young men, with maidens worth many oxen in bride-price, dancing, hands on each other's wrists, the girls robed in fine linen, while the men wore 595 fine-woven tunics, softly gleaming from worked-in oil,⁶ and the girls had on sweet garlands, the men their daggers of gold, suspended from silver baldrics.
Now they would dance in a circle, feet well-skilled, very lightly, as when a potter sits at a wheel that matches 600 his hands' grasp, and tries it, to see how it will run; and now they'd approach each other in dancing lines while a crowd of spectators stood round them, much enjoying such an elegant dance, [and among them a sacred bard sang to his lyre,]⁷ and two tumblers whirled among them, 605 taking the lead in all their sport and pleasure.

On it he also set the mighty stream of Ocean to run round the outermost rim of this strongly fashioned shield.

Then, when he'd finished the shield, both large and solid, he forged him a corselet more bright than the blaze of fire, 610 and forged him a heavy helmet to fit his temples closely, a fine piece, cunningly wrought, with a golden crest set on it, and lastly fashioned him greaves, made out of pliant tin.

The far-famed lame-of-both-legs god, this battle gear all finished, took it and laid it before Achilles' mother, who then 615 swooped down like a hawk from the high snows of Olympus, bringing from Hēphaistos the glinting armor he'd made.

6. C. W. Shelmerdine, The Perfume Industry of Mycenaean Pylos (1985), 595–96, cited by Janko 175, assures us, surprisingly, that linen thus treated with oil “becomes, not greasy, but supple and shining, and it remains so after washing.”

7. The phrase in brackets was allegedly (Athen. 180c–d) added in antiquity from a similar passage in the Odyssey (4.15–19), in all likelihood “to provide the dancers with music” (Edwards 2011, 230); it does not figure in either the MSS or surviving papyri, though some modern editors have included it in the text.

Book 19

Now saffron-robed Dawn rose up from Ocean's streams to bring light to the immortals and to mortal mankind, and Thetis arrived at the ships bearing the god's gifts.
She found her beloved son lying clasping Patroklos to him, and weeping loudly, while round him large numbers of his comrades 5
were shedding tears too. The bright goddess came among them, stood at his side, clasped his hand, and spoke to him, saying:
"My child, this man we must let lie, for all our sorrow, since from the start it was the gods that willed his death.
Accept rather now, from Hēphaistos, this splendid armor, 10 fine gear, such as never man yet wore upon his shoulders."

So saying, the goddess set down the pieces of armor in front of Achilles: each rang clear in its intricate splendor.
Trembling swept through the Myrmidons: no man dared to look directly at them, but flinched away. As Achilles 15 viewed them, his wrath swelled further, his eyes glared out terribly under their lids, like blazing fire, and he rejoiced as he handled these dazzling gifts from the god.
But when, to his mind, he'd spent enough time admiring their workmanship, then to his mother he spoke winged words: 20
"Mother, these arms the god's given me are such as immortal work should be, what no mortal could accomplish!
Now indeed I shall arm myself. Yet I'm desperately anxious for the valiant son of Menoitios, lest meanwhile flies may enter the wounds that the bronze has inflicted on him, 25 engender worms there, to outrage his body, now that the life's killed from it—and so all his flesh will rot."

Then the goddess, silver-footed Thetis, replied: "My child, don't let these things bother your mind! I'll take good care to fend off from his body those savage tribes, the flies 30 that feed on the flesh of men lately slain in battle. Suppose that he lies for a year's full cycle, his flesh will remain fresh and whole, or even better than now! But first you must call the Achaian heroes to assembly, and renounce your rage against Agamemnōn, the people's shepherd: 35 that done, you can arm yourself for battle, be clad in valor."

So saying, she filled him with dauntless strength, while for Patroklos she dripped ambrosia and red nectar through his nostrils, to keep his flesh forever unspoiled.

Along the seashore he went now, did noble Achilles, 40 shouting scarily loud, to alert the Achaian heroes, and even those who before had stayed where the ships were hauled up—the steersmen, those who handled the ships' steering oars, or the ships' stewards, who served out rations—all now made their way to the meeting place, since Achilles 45 had appeared, after long abstention from grievous battle.

Two men, veterans both, came limping in together—Tydeus's son, steadfast fighter, and noble Odysseus, both of them leaning on spears, since their wounds still hurt them—and went and sat down in the front of the assembly. 50

Last of all there arrived the lord of men, Agamemnōn, he too nursing a wound: in the grind of battle he'd been hit by the bronze-tipped spear of Koōn, Antēnōr's son.
Then, when all the Achaians were gathered together, swift-footed Achilles stood up and addressed them, saying: 55

"Son of Atreus, was it really the best thing for both of us, for you, for me, that we two, grief-filled as we were,
should rage on in heart-eating strife because of a girl?
I wish she'd been killed by an arrow from Artemis that day at the ships when I chose her, after sacking Lyrnessos! 60 Fewer Achaians then would have bitten the boundless earth at the enemy's hands, on account of my fierce wrath.

Good news, this, for the Trojans and Hektōr; but the Achaians will long, I think, remember the strife between you and me!
Still, despite our grief, we'll treat this as past and done with, 65 restraining, as now we must, the spirit in our breasts.

So now I renounce my wrath: that I should rage on for ever unrelentingly is not fitting. Come then, waste no time, urge on the long-haired Achaians into battle, let me, once again, face these Trojans, make trial of them, 70 find out if they're still ready to spend a night by the ships—though I think there are some who'll be happy to rest their knees—those who escape my spear, and the struggle of battle.”

So he spoke, and the well-greaved Achaians all rejoiced, because Pēleus's great-hearted son had abandoned his wrath. 75

There then addressed them the lord of men, Agamemnōn, from the place where he sat, not standing up among them:¹ “My friends, you Danaän heroes, you henchmen of Arēs!
It's good to hear out a man on his feet, nor is it seemly to interrupt him—vexation to even a skilled speaker! 80

Against the clamor of many how can a man either listen or speak? He's disabled, however clear his voice.

It's to Pēleus's son I'll declare myself, but you other Argives should pay attention too, and mark my words, all of you.

Many times have the Achaians addressed me in the same terms, reviling me; yet it's not I who am the one at fault, 85

but rather Zeus, and Fate, and some night-walking Fury, who in the assembly cast wild delusion on my mind that day when, acting alone, I took his prize from Achilles.
But what could I do? It's a god that fulfills all matters: 90

Zeus's eldest daughter, Delusion, who blinds all mortals—accursed creature, with delicate feet, for it's never the ground she touches: she treads on the heads of men, damaging mortals' minds, has trapped others before me.

Indeed, she once blinded Zeus, though men declare him 95

the greatest of men and gods both: him even Hērē, though only a woman, deceived by her crafty wiles the day when that mighty force Hēraklēs was due to be born, to Alkmēnē, in Thēbē with its fair crown of walls.

Zeus spoke in boastful tones, among all the gods: 100

‘Listen to me, every god, and all you goddesses, while I tell you what the heart in my breast now bids me say.
Eileithyia, spirit of birth pangs, today will bring to the light a man who will rule over all those dwelling about him, one of that line of men whose ancestry is my own.’ 105

To him, with deception in mind, Lady Hērē then declared:

1. The Greek is ambiguous, and there has been considerable debate as to what exactly Agamemnōn does, and why. I agree with those who argue that he not only stays put, but delivers his speech sitting, using the privilege of a wounded man to emphasize the difference between himself and Achilles, who has for long been safely out of the fighting. See Edwards 2011, 243–44.

‘You’ll turn out a liar, once more not see your words fulfilled!
 Very well, then, Olympian: swear me a strong oath that he’ll truly rule over all those dwelling about him, he who today drops between the feet of a woman 110 and is of the line whose blood is also your own.’
 So she spoke, but Zeus failed to understand her deception, and swore a great oath, and thus was greatly deluded.
 Now Hērē swooped down from the peaks of high Olympos, and quickly made her way to Achaian Argos, where, 115
 she knew, was the noble wife of Perseus’s son Sthenelos, then pregnant with a son, and her seventh month had come.
 This child Hērē brought out, though its months were incomplete, while delaying Alkmēnē’s delivery, restraining her birth pangs.
 Then she herself broke the news to Zeus, the son of Kronos: 120 ‘Zeus, Father, lord of the bright thunderbolt, just let me drop a word in your mind. A great man indeed is born, who’ll be lord of the Argives: Eurystheus, Sthenelos’s son, Perseus’s grandson²—your line, so not unfit to rule Argos.’
 So she spoke, and sharp pain struck him, deep in his mind, 125 and promptly he seized Delusion by her glossy-tressed head, infuriated at heart, and swore a powerful oath that never more to Olympos and the starry heavens should Delusion come, she who blinds all. So saying, he flung her down from the starry heavens, whirling 130 her round with one hand, and soon she reached human soil.
 Ever after Zeus groaned at the thought of her, when he saw his son demeaned by the tasks that Eurystheus set him.³ So I too, then, at the time bright-helmeted Hektōr was busy slaughtering Argives at the sterns of their ships, 135 could not forget Delusion, by whom I was first blinded.
 But since blinded I was, and robbed of good sense by Zeus, I’m willing to make amends, to give recompense past counting.
 So up with you to the battle, rouse the rest of your troops!
 Gifts I’m ready to offer you, all that you were promised 140 by noble Odysseus earlier when he came to your hut!
 Or wait a bit, if you’d rather, eager to fight though you are,

2. Thus great-grandson of Zeus (who begot Perseus on Danaë) and cousin to Hēraklēs, son of Zeus and Alkmēnē (though Amphitryōn was his nominal father).

3. These were the famous Twelve Labors, imposed upon Hēraklēs by Eurystheus as a penalty for having in a fit of madness killed his three children by Kreōn’s daughter Megara.

and attendants will gather and fetch you these gifts from my ships, to let you see that I'll give you what will satisfy your heart."

Then in answer to him swift-footed Achilles declared: 145
"Most glorious son of Atreus, Agamemnōn lord of men, as regards the gifts, if you want to, present them, as is proper, or keep them—your choice. But for now, let's turn to battle right away! We've no business to sit here wasting our time in idle chatter when there's great work still to be done! 150
As each of you once again sees Achilles among the foremost, with his bronze spear spreading death through the ranks of the Trojans,
let him have that in mind as he battles his own opponent."

In answer to him resourceful Odysseus now said:
"Do not thus, godlike Achilles, brave warrior though you are, 155 urge the Achaians' sons to go against Ilion fasting to fight the Trojans, since it's for no short time that this struggle will last, from when the warriors' ranks first engage, and the god breathes might into either side.
Rather command the Achaians by their swift ships to consume 160 both food and wine first, for in them is strength and courage.
No man through the livelong day, till the setting of the sun, will be able to stand and fight who hasn't eaten:
for though in his heart he may be eager for battle, yet his limbs unawares grow heavy, hunger and thirst 165 come on him, while as he moves his knees get weaker—but the man who's taken his fill of wine and food can fight with enemy warriors all day long:
the heart in his breast's still steadfast, his limbs don't tire until everyone's disengaged from the business of fighting. 170 Come then, dismiss the troops, give the order to make ready their meal; and as for the gifts, the lord of men, Agamemnōn, should have them brought to the meeting place, where all the Achaians can see them, and your heart may be comforted; and let him stand up and swear an oath before the Argives, 175 that he never went into that woman's bed nor lay with her—
as is the custom, my lord, between men and women—and let the heart in your own breast be gracious!
Let him give you a feast in his hut by way of amendment, a lavish one, that you may lack nothing that's due to you. 180

And you, son of Atreus, will be more just in future to others; there's nothing blameworthy in a king, when he's started the trouble, making amends to any man."

Then the lord of men, Agamemnōn, answered him, saying:
"I'm very glad, son of Laertēs, to have heard your speech: 185 all you set forth and discussed was properly stated.
This oath I'm ready to swear: my heart bids me do so, nor will I perjure myself to a deity. But Achilles should stay here, however eager he may be for battle, and all the rest of you too, until the gifts are fetched 190 from my hut, and we pledge ourselves in solemn agreement.
And you yourself I charge with this duty, that you choose the best young warriors out of all the Achaians to bring the gifts from my ship, all that earlier we promised to bestow on Achilles, and also to fetch the women. 195 And in the Achaians' broad camp let Talthybios right now prepare a boar, to sacrifice to Zeus and the Sun."

Then swift-footed Achilles made answer to him, saying:
"Most glorious son of Atreus, Agamemnōn lord of men, better at some other time for you to fix these matters, 200 when perhaps there's a break in the fighting, when at least the rage in my breast's less intense. But at this moment they are lying there, flesh rent open, all those warriors that Priam's son Hektōr slew when Zeus gave him his glory—and you two are saying we should eat! If I had my way 205 I'd tell the Achaians' sons to join battle, here and now, fasting, unfed, and then, when the sun went down, to prepare their great feast—when we'd wiped out this defilement!
But until that moment, down my own throat at least, neither food nor drink will pass, now my comrade is dead, 210 who lies in my hut, flesh rent by the keen-edged bronze, feet facing the door,⁴ while around him our companions shed tears. So it's not such things that at all concern me now, but killing, and blood, and the groans of dying men."

Then in answer to him resourceful Odysseus said: 215
"Ah, Achilles, Pēleus's son, far the greatest of the Achaians,

4. As Leaf reminds us (2: 275) this was an ancient funeral custom, symbolic of imminent departure—"facing the journey", as Vermeule says (12–13).

You are stronger than me, and greater by no small measure with the spear; but as for wisdom, I'd far surpass you, since I'm the older man, with much more knowledge—so let your heart be receptive to what I have to say. 220 Mankind very soon gets surfeited with its crop of fighting, the stalks of which the bronze spreads in plenty on the ground;
 but the harvest is all too small, since the scales are tipped by Zeus, who is for mankind the steward of warfare.
 No way by denying the belly can Achaians mourn a corpse: 225 too many, one after another, are endlessly falling day after day—when would anyone get a respite?
 No: what we have to do is to bury our casualties, harden our hearts, shed tears on that one day only, and all those of us who survive the loathsome struggle 230 must be mindful of drink and food, that we may the better battle it out with our enemies, for ever, unceasingly, flesh clad in the stubborn bronze. Let no one of our troops hold off from action while awaiting some other order:
 there's one order only: ill betide any man who hangs back 235 at the ships of the Argives! Let's all advance together, and raise a sharp battle against these horse-breaking Trojans!"

That said, he took with him far-famed Nestōr's sons, and Phyleus's son Megēs, and Thoas, and Mērionēs, and Kreiōn's son Lykomēdēs, and Melanippos, 240 and they made their way to the hut of Atreus's son Agamemnōn.
 The word had been given, and straightway the thing was done:
 seven tripods they fetched from the hut, as he'd promised Achilles, a score of bright cauldrons, a dozen horses; and then quickly they led out the women, skilled in fine handiwork: 245 seven there were of these, with fair-cheeked Briseïs the eighth.
 Odysseus weighed out gold, ten talents in all, and led off, while the other Achaian warriors carried the gifts, and set them down in the midst of the meeting place. Then Agamemnōn rose, while Talthybios, a man whose voice was like a god's, 250 stood, with the boar in his hands, beside the people's shepherd.
 The son of Atreus now grasped and drew the knife that always hung at the side of his sword's great scabbard, cut the first ritual hairs from the boar, and raising his hands prayed to Zeus, while every Argive sat silent in his place, 255

as was right and proper, ears alert to the king, who now, looking up to the broad heavens, made his prayer: “Let Zeus, first, be my witness, highest and best of gods, and Earth, and Sun, and the Furies that underground exact retribution from those men who swear false oaths, 260 that never did I lay hands on the girl Briseïs, either to bed her, or with any other intention, and that she’s remained untouched all the time she’s been in my huts!
 If any of this is sworn falsely, may the gods give me all the many griefs they inflict on perjurers in their name.” 265

That said, he cut the boar’s throat with the pitiless bronze, and the body Talthybios swung round and hurled into the grey sea’s wide gulf, food for fishes. Then Achilles stood up and spoke among the battle-minded Argives: “Zeus, Father, great the delusions with which you visit mankind! 270 Not otherwise would the son of Atreus have so stirred up the heart in my breast, nor would he have taken the girl against my will, so determinedly: it may be that Zeus was set on bringing death to large numbers of Achaians!
 Go eat your meal now, and then let’s move to battle.” 275

So he spoke, and broke up this very brief assembly.
 The rest all scattered, each man to his own vessel, while the great-hearted Myrmidons busied themselves with the gifts, and carried them off to the ship of godlike Achilles.
 Some they stowed in the huts, and settled the women there, 280 while stalwart henchmen drove off the horses to the herd.

But now Briseïs, the image of golden Aphrodītē, when she saw Patroklos, his flesh all rent by the sharp bronze, flung herself on him, keening shrilly, her hands tearing her breasts and tender neck and lovely face; 285 and amid her weeping this woman, so like a goddess, exclaimed: “Patroklos, in my misery the man most dear to my heart, it was living I left you when last I went out from the hut, and now, great leader, it’s dead I return to find you!
 Thus in my life does trouble always breed trouble: 290
 the husband bestowed on me by my father and lady mother I saw rent by the sharp bronze in front of our city, and the three men who were born to that self-same mother, my much-loved brothers, all these met their day of death.

 Yet you'd not even let me weep when swift Achilles 295 killed my husband and sacked the city of godlike Mynēs—you said you'd see me the lawful wedded wife of godlike Achilles, you'd take me back on your ships to Phthiē, and hold a marriage feast for me among the Myrmidons. So I mourn your death without cease: you were always kind to me." 300

So she spoke, weeping: the women lamented with her, for Patroklos professedly, but each one for her own sorrows.
 Meanwhile the Achaian elders gathered around Achilles, all imploring him to eat: but he refused them, sobbing:
 "I beg you—if any of you, my dearest comrades, will listen— 305 please, please don't tell me to glut my heart with food or drink, now this terrible grief has come upon me: until sundown I shall remain thus, and endure, whatever."

So saying, he sent away all the other princes, except the two sons of Atreus, who stayed, as did noble Odysseus, 310 and Nestōr and Idomeneus and Phoinix the old horseman, to comfort him in his great sorrow, but not one whit would his heart be comforted till he'd entered war's bloody jaws, and as he reflected, he heaved a deep sigh, and said:
 "Time was when you—so ill-fated, my dearest comrade— 315 would yourself lay out an enjoyable meal in our hut, quickly and skillfully, when the Achaians were impatient to bring grievous warfare against the horse-breaking Trojans.
 But now here you lie, flesh rent, and my heart's indifferent to food and drink, though both are to hand, through yearning 320 for you: no other worse thing is there that I could suffer, not even news of the death of my own father, who now perhaps in Phthiē is shedding heavy round tears for the loss of a son such as I am, who now in a foreign land, all because of hateful Helen, am at war with the Trojans; 325 not even were it my own dear son, now being raised on Skyros—if indeed it is true that godlike Neoptolemos still lives.
 Until now the heart in my breast had cherished the hope that I alone should die far from horse-grazing Argos, here at Troy, but that you should return to Phthiē, 330 and that you'd pick up my son in your swift black ship from Skyros, and show him everything that was mine—my possessions, my servants, my splendid high-roofed house, since by now I suppose that Pēleus must either be at last dead, or, if barely alive still, bowed down by the inroads of loathsome old age, and by waiting forever to hear unhappy tidings of me, that at last I've perished." 335

So he spoke, weeping: the old men lamented with him, remembering, each of them, all that he'd left back at home;
 and as they mourned, the son of Kronos observed them, 340 was moved to pity, and quickly spoke winged words to Athēnē:
 "My child, you're completely neglecting your favorite mortal!
 Do you no longer have the least care in your heart for Achilles?
 There he sits, in front of his high-sterned vessels, in mourning for his dear comrade: the others indeed 345 have all gone to dinner, but he stays fasting and foodless.
 So off with you now, dribble nectar and sweet ambrosia into his breast, so that hunger may not come on him."

So saying,

he encouraged Athēnē, herself already most eager, and she, like a shearwater, long-winged and raucous-voiced, 350 swooped down through the high air from heaven. The Achaians were promptly arming throughout the camp, while she into Achillēs' breast dribbled nectar and sweet ambrosia in order that joyless hunger should not come upon his knees.
 Then she herself was gone to the strong abode of her mighty 355 father, while from their ships the Achaians poured out.
 As when, thick and fast, Zeus's snowflakes come floating down, ice-cold, and driven by the sky-born north wind's blast, so now, thick and fast, the brightly gleaming helmets emerged from the ships, and with them the bossed shields, 360 the well-plated corselets and the ash-wood spears. Their radiance shone up to heaven, all the earth around was stirred to laughter by the bright bronze, and a din rose from under men's tramping feet: in their midst was noble Achilles, arming himself, teeth grinding, eyes all ablaze 365 like flames of fire, while into his heart there now entered unbearable grief. Enraged at the Trojans, he now put on the god's gifts, that Hēphaistos had labored hard to make him.
 The greaves first he fastened on about his shins—finely worked, and fitted with silver ankle-pieces. 370

Next, to cover his chest, he put on the corselet.
 About his shoulders he slung the silver-studded sword,
 of bronze; then came the shield, both huge and sturdy,
 from which gleamed afar a brightness like the moon's.
 As out at sea the gleam is visible to sailors 375 of a burning fire, one alight high up in the mountains, in some lonely farmhouse, but they cannot stop the gale from driving them over the teeming deep, far distant from their friends—so a gleam went skyward from Achilles' shield, so fine, so intricate. Then he lifted the mighty helmet 380 and set it upon his head: it shone like a star, this helmet with horsehair crest, and around it there waved
 the lovely gold plumes that Hēphaistos had set thick about its crown.
 Then noble Achilles tested himself in his armor to see if it fitted well, if his lithe limbs had free movement, 385 and it buoyed him like wings, delighting the people's shepherd.
 Lastly he drew from its stand his father's spear, weighty and huge and massive. No other Achaian could wield it: only Achilles could manage its handling—that spear of Pēlian ash wood that Cheirōn gave his dear father, 390 felled on Pēlion's summit, to embody death for heroes.
 Alkimos and Automedōn were about the business of yoking the horses: fitting fine girth straps, thrusting the bits between their jaws. Now they drew back the reins to the dovetailed chariot; then grasping the bright whip that fitted his hand 395 Automedōn sprang aboard, to the driver's place, and behind him, armed and ready, came Achilles, a gleam in his battle gear like Hyperīon the bright Sun.
 and called out in a terrible voice to his father's horses:
 "Xanthos and Balios,⁵ famed offspring of Podargē! 400 Think of some other way to bring your charioteer back safe to the Danaān camp when we're through with fighting—don't leave him dead there, as you did Patroklos."

Then

from under the yoke the fleet-footed horse addressed him—Xanthos: he bent his head sharply, and all his mane 405 streamed to the ground from the yoke-pad, on both sides of the yoke,

5. I.e., "Bay" and "Dapple"; their dam, Podargē, is "Swiftfoot".

and the goddess, white-armed Hērē, made him articulate:
 “Yes, this time we’ll bring you back safely, mighty Achilles!
 But the day of your death is near, though we shall not be its cause, but rather a great god and all-mastering Fate: 410 it was through no slowness or sloth of ours that the Trojans succeeded in stripping the armor from Patroklos’s shoulders:
 it was the best of the gods, whom fair-hired Lētō bore, that slew him among the front-liners, gave Hektōr the glory.
 We two could run with the speed of the west wind’s blast, 415 which, they say, is the swiftest of all! But you yourself are destined to be laid low by a god’s might, and a man’s.”

When he’d said this, the Furies cut off his power of speech.
 Then, deeply moved, swift-footed Achilles addressed him: “Xanthos, why foretell my death? You need not do so. 420
 I know well myself that it’s my fate to perish here, far from my father and mother. But nevertheless I shan’t stop till I’ve driven the Trojans to their fill of war.”

With a shout,
 out among the foremost he urged on his whole-hoofed team.

Book 20

So by the curved ships, and around you, Pēleus's son, never glutted with fighting, the Achaians were arming themselves, and across from them likewise the Trojans, on the rise of the plain.
Zeus meanwhile ordered Themis to call the gods to assembly from high, many-clefted Olympos. She went around everywhere, 5 with the message that they should come in to Zeus's own abode.
Not a single river was absent, save only Ocean, nor any of all the nymphs that frequent the lovely groves, the sources of rivers, the grassy meadows. So when they arrived at the abode of Zeus the cloud-gatherer, 10 they sat down in the polished stone porticos that Hēphaistos with cunning expertise had built there for Zeus, the Father.

Thus they gathered in Zeus's house; nor did the Earth-Shaker ignore the goddess's summons, but came from the sea to join them, sat in their midst, asked Zeus what his purpose was: 15 “Why, lord of the bright bolt, have you once more summoned the gods
to assembly? Are you concerned about the Trojans and Achaians, since battle and warfare are close to flaring up between them?”

In answer to him then Zeus the cloud-gatherer said:
“You know, Earth-Shaker, what's on my mind, the reason 20
I summoned you all: they're dying—yes, I'm concerned for them!
Even so, I myself will stay here, in a glen of Olympos, seated, enjoying the spectacle.¹ As for the rest of you, take yourselves off now, among the Trojans or the Achaians, give aid to either side, whichever one you prefer! 25 Should Achilles, even alone, now fight against the Trojans, they won't for one moment stop Pēleus's swift-footed son—why, even before, they shook just at the sight of him,

1. Edwards 2011 (289) well remarks here that Zeus “does not lack sympathy for the human warriors, and it is the gods from whom he (justifiably) expects to get a good deal of amusement . . . his very active sense of humour breaks through when he thinks about the antics some of his relatives will surely get up to now that he has turned them loose.”

and now, when his heart's so enraged by his comrade's death
I fear he may override fate, and storm their ramparts too." 30

So saying, the son of Kronos stirred up unending warfare.
Battlewards now went the gods, but with purposes divided:
Hērē to where the ships were beached, and with her Pallas Athēnē, Poseidōn the Earth-Encircler, Hermēs the Helper, who for smart thinking excels all others, 35 accompanied by Hēphaistos, exultant in his strength, limping, but under him his stunted legs moved lightly.
To the Trojans went bright-helmeted Arēs, and with him Phoibos, whose hair is unshorn, and Artemis the archer, and Lētō and Xanthos² and smiling Aphrodītē. 40

For so long as the gods stayed apart from mortal men the Achaians kept winning great glory, now that Achilles had appeared, after lengthy absence from the grievous struggle, while dread trembling came on the limbs of every Trojan when, terrified, they caught sight of Pēleus's swift-footed son 45 agleam in his battle gear, a match for Arēs the killer.
But when the Olympians entered this throng of warriors, and Strife sprang up, that strong rouser of nations, then Athēnē cried out aloud: now standing by the ditch dug outside the wall, and now on the thunderous shore, she gave her long battle cry. 50 Arēs bellowed as well, on the other side: black as a storm cloud, now from the topmost ramparts he urged the Trojans on,
and now as he hastened by Simoeis toward Kallikolōnē.³

So both sides now did the blessed gods encourage to clash head-on, and broke out oppressive strife between them. 55 Fearsomely thundered the Father of men and of gods from on high, while down below Poseidōn caused the boundless earth to quake, and the lofty mountain peaks:
all the foothills of spring-rich Ida were shaken, and all her heights, and the Trojans' city, and the Achaians' ships. 60
In the underworld fear now gripped Hādēs, lord of the dead:

2. This Xanthos is not Achilles' recently mentioned immortal horse, but rather the local river god, known to the gods as Xanthos but to men as (the) Skamandros (73–74), against whom, or which, he is very soon to have a fearsome and protracted encounter (21.211–382).

3. Kallikolōnē (Καλλικολώνη, "Pleasant Hill"): exact position in relation to the Simoeis river uncertain, but traditionally believed to have been the site of the Judgment of Paris (HE 2: 430).

he leapt from his throne in panic and cried out, lest above him the ground be split open by Poseidōn the Earth-Shaker, and his own realm be laid bare to both gods and mortals—dreadful and dank, abhorred even by the gods themselves. 65 Huge now was the crash when god faced god in strife, for lined up against the lord Poseidōn there stood Phoibos Apollo, winged arrows clutched in his hand, and against Enyalios the grey-eyed goddess Athēnē, while Hērē was faced by her of the loud chase, the golden arrows— 70 Artemis, archer herself, the deadly archer's sister.
 Arrayed against Lētō was the mighty Helper Hermēs, and against Hēphaistos the great deep-eddying river known to the gods as Xanthos, but as Skamandros by mortals.

Thus gods went forth to stand against gods; but Achilles 75 was hungry to confront, above all, in the general mass, Priam's son Hektōr: his heart was dead set on glutting Arēs, that war god with oxhide shield, on Hektōr's blood.
 However, it was Aineias whom Apollo, rouser of troops, sent straight against Pēleus's son, and filled with mighty power. 80 Making his voice resemble that of Priam's son Lykaōn, in his likeness Apollo, son of Zeus, now spoke to Aineias:
 "Aineias, the Trojans' counsellor, where now are those threats you once made to the Trojan lords while you were drinking, that you'd fight, man to man, against Pēleus's son Achilles?" 85

Then Aineias in answer spoke to him in these words:
 "Son of Priam, why urge me on, when I'm not so minded, to match myself against Pēleus's all too arrogant son?
 This would not be the first time I've faced swift-footed Achilles:
 once before this he drove me headlong with his spear 90 from Ida, that time when he'd come out against our cattle, and sacked both Lyrnessos and Pēdasos—but Zeus saved me, stirred up my strength, put swiftness into my knees.
 Else I'd have surely been slain at the hands of Achilles and Athēnē, who went before him as his protector, urged him 95 to kill with his bronze spear both Lelegēs and Trojans.
 Look, no mere man can meet Achilles in battle, since there's always some god beside him, warding off trouble.
 Besides this, his spear flies straight, and never rests till it's gone through some human flesh. But supposing a god 100 were to stretch warfare's outcome evenly, then he'd not beat me with ease, though he claimed to be made all of bronze."

To him then replied Zeus's son, the lord Apollo:
"Well, hero, you too can boast to the gods who are forever—for they say that it was Zeus's daughter Aphrodītē 105 who bore you, while Achilles is the son of a lesser goddess, your mother being Zeus's daughter, while his has as her father the Old Man of the Sea. So, at him, with your unyielding bronze!
Don't let him scare you off with words of scorn or contempt!"

So saying he breathed great strength into the people's shepherd, 110 who now joined the foremost fighters, armored in gleaming bronze.
Nor did Anchīsēs's son go unnoticed by white-armed Hērē as he went through the mass of troops to confront the son of Pēleus;
she called the gods together, and addressed them, saying:
"It's you two—Poseidōn, Athēnē—who now have need 115 to figure out in your minds how these matters are to be.
Aineias here has marched out, armored in gleaming bronze, to confront Pēleus's son, spurred on by Phoibos Apollo!
So come, let's either turn him back here and now, or else one of us should likewise stand by Achilles, 120 and endow him with mighty strength, let his heart lack nothing, let him know that those who love him are the finest of the immortals, while it's mere windbags who till now have fended off warfare and fighting from the Trojans!
We've all come down from Olympos to play our part 125 in this battle, so that Achilles may suffer no hurt from the Trojans today, though later he'll suffer whatever Fate spun for him at his birth, when his mother bore him.
But if Achilles isn't told this, by some god in person, he'll take fright later on, if a god comes up against him 130 in battle: gods are terrifying when visible as themselves."

Then Poseidōn the Earth-Shaker answered her, saying:
"Hērē, don't be enraged beyond reason: you've no need to.
Myself, I wouldn't choose to have the gods clash in strife [us versus the rest, since we're by far the stronger];⁴ 135 so I think we should leave the beaten track for a spot

4. The sense is uncertain: the line may have been adapted from 8.211 at an early date.

to watch from, sit down there, let humans get on with the war.
 Yet if Arēs starts up a fight, or Phoibos Apollo, or they hold Achilles back, won't allow him to fight, then from us too they'll be hit by the burgeoning strife 140 of battle: quite soon, I think, they'll pull out from the fighting and scuttle back to Olympos, to the other gods' gathering, overwhelmed by the irresistible force of our hands."

With that
 the dark-maned deity led the way to where there stood those heaped-up ramparts named for Hēraklēs the godlike, 145 the high wall built for him by the Trojans and Pallas Athēnē, to provide him a refuge in his flight from the sea beast when it chased him from the seashore onto the plain.⁵
 There the other gods and Poseidōn sat themselves down, wrapping their shoulders about with a dense unbroken cloud, 150 while the opposing group settled on the brow of Kallikolōnē, round you, Phoibos the archer, and Arēs, sacker of cities.

So they sat there on opposite sides, still busily planning their strategies; yet to plunge into grievous warfare both sides were reluctant, though Zeus on high urged them on. 155

By now the whole plain was filled with the glinting bronze of men and horses: the earth resounded beneath their feet as both sides charged as one. The two best of all these fighters faced each other, eager to fight, out there in the middle—Aineias son of Anchīsēs and noble Achilles. 160

Aineias was first to emerge, with threatening mien, his weighty helmet's plumes nodding, his warlike shield held in front of his body: he was wielding a spear of bronze.
 Opposing him, Pēleus's son came at him like a lion, a ravening beast, that men are determined to kill—the whole 165 neighborhood in a body. At first he goes on his way,

5. Bilked of his reward by Laomedōn for having built him Troy's walls, Poseidōn dispatched an amphibious sea beast to be a general menace in the region. An oracle told Laomedōn to put out his daughter as the monster's prey. He did this, having previously secured Hēraklēs' services to kill the creature by offering him some of his immortal horses. Aided by the defensive wall described here, Hēraklēs did the job, saving Laomedōn's daughter in the process; but Laomedōn, a chiseler to the core, rewarded him with mortal rather than immortal steeds; whereupon Hēraklēs returned with an expeditionary force and sacked Troy. See Gantz 400–401, 442–43.

uncaring; but when some youth, a brisk fighter, throws his spear and hits him, then he crouches, jaws open, foam gathering round his teeth: the mighty spirit groans within his heart, with his tail he lashes his ribs and flanks on either side, 170 works himself up for the coming fight, and then, eyes glaring, charges straight ahead in his raging power, to kill some man, or himself to die among the foremost.
 Just so Achilles' own strength and proud heart impelled him to come out and confront great-hearted Aineias. When they 175 were close, as the two of them moved one against the other, the first to speak was swift-footed Achilles: "Aineias, why have you come so far out, away from the main body, to make a stand here? Does your spirit urge you to fight me in the hope of becoming lord, among the Trojan horse breakers, 180 of Priam's power? But supposing you were to kill me, not even for that would Priam place his realm in your hands!
 He has sons, he's of sound mind, he isn't crazy! Or have the Trojans marked you out an estate that outstrips all others, fine both for orchard and plowland, for you to possess 185 if you slay me? That, I think, you'd find a tough task.
 Once in the past, I'd remind you, I put you to flight with my spear—don't you remember?—when you were alone and I sent you scampering headlong down Ida's slopes 190 as you ran from me! Then you fled to Lyrnessos, but I, with Athēnē and Zeus the Father, assaulted and sacked it, led its women captive, took their day of freedom from them, while you were rescued by Zeus and the other gods.
 But now, I think, they won't rescue you, as in your heart 195 you fondly imagine: so go off back, I urge you, into the common crowd—don't confront me here—before you suffer some hurt; what's done even fools can recognize."

Then Aineias in his turn now answered him, declaring:
 "Son of Pēleus, don't try to frighten me like a child 200 with mere words, since I too know very well myself how to frame the language of taunts and unseemly abuse.
 We each know the other's lineage, we know his parents, through hearing the tale of old from mortal tellers—yet you've never set eyes on my parents, nor I on yours. 205
 They say that you're the offspring of peerless Pēleus, and your mother is fair-tressed Thetis, the sea goddess;

 while I claim I am the son of the great-hearted Anchīsēs, and that my mother is Aphrodītē.
 Of these one pair will be weeping for a beloved son 210 this very day: for it won't be with mere childish insults that we two settle our business and return from battle.
 Still, if you insist, hear this too, and gain full knowledge of our ancestry—something many men know already.
 Dardanos first was begotten by Zeus the cloud-gatherer, 215 and founded Dardania, since not yet was sacred Ilion built in the plain, a city of mortal humankind, but people then still dwelt on the slopes of spring-rich Ida.
 Dardanos sired a son, Erichthonios the king, who lived to become the richest of mortal men: 220 three thousand mares he had grazing in the water meadows, breeders, rejoicing in their newborn foals. Of these mares out at pasture the north wind became enamored, and taking the shape of a black-maned stallion, covered them:
 twelve foals were conceived and born of this coupling, 225 and these, when bounding over the grain-rich plowland skimmed the topmost ears of ripe corn, never crushed them, and when bounding across the broad back of the sea skimmed the crests of the grey brine's breakers. Then came Trōs, whom Erichthonios sired to be king among the Trojans, 230 and Trōs in his turn fathered three peerless sons—Ilos, Assarakos, and godlike Ganymēdēs who was born the best-looking mortal man of them all, and because of his beauty the gods wafted him aloft to be Zeus's cup-bearer and dwell among the immortals. 235 Ilos too sired a son, the peerless Laomedōn, and Laomedōn in turn sired Tithōnos and Priam, Lampos and Klytios, and Hiketaōn, scion of Arēs, while Assarakos begot Kapys, and Kapys Anchīsēs, and Anchīsēs begot me, and Priam noble Hektōr: 240 from this blood and lineage, then, I claim descent.
 But valor is something that Zeus increases or lessens in mortals as he is minded, being the mightiest of all.
 So come on then, let's stop arguing like children, standing here in the midst of the grind of battle. Insults 245 are to hand for us both to cast, the one at the other—so many, not even a hundred-benched ship could hold them!

 The human tongue's voluble, the words on it are many and of every sort, the range of man's speech is broad on all sides: any word you speak, you can also hear. 250
 But what need for us to exchange abuse and accusations, yelling one at the other like a pair of housewives who work themselves up over some gut-wrenching quarrel and end in a lengthy slanging match on the public highway with some true charges, some false—rage makes for lies! 255 It's not with words that you'll kill my urge to valor, not until we've fought face to face with the bronze—so come, let's make trial of each other, now, with our bronze-tipped spears.”

 With that he cast his great spear at Achilles' fearsomely daunting 260 shield, and loudly the shield clanged round the spear point.
 With one strong hand Pēleus's son was holding the shield out from him: alarmed, since he thought the far-shadowing spear of great-hearted Aineias would easily pierce through it—fool that he was, not knowing, by reason and by instinct, that it's far from easy for the splendid gifts of the gods 265 to be vanquished, or made to yield, by mortal warriors!
 So now the massive spear of warlike Aineas failed to break through the shield: the gold, the god's gift, stopped it.
 [Through two layers only he forced it; there still were three, since five in all the lame cripple had welded together, 270 two of bronze, two inner layers of tin, and one of gold, where the spear of ash was halted.]⁶

 Then Achilles in turn let fly his far-shadowing spear, and hit the nicely balanced shield of Aineias, below its outermost rim, where the bronze ran at its thinnest, 275 and thinnest, too, was the oxhide: clean through now passed the Pēlian spear, and the struck shield rang with the blow.
 Aineias, crouching down, held his shield out away from him in terror: the flung spear passed over his shoulder, stuck

6. These lines have been argued over, bracketed as dubious, or rejected as spurious from antiquity on. The layers as described make “no practical sense either for the purpose or the appearance of the shield” (Edwards 2011, 323): the gold is invisible and being a soft metal would be worse than useless for stopping a spear. Hēphaistos's selection of material [18.474–75] seems to have been borrowed, and the order of metals maintained, to produce “this improbable and impractical artifact.”

in the ground, after breaking through both layers 280 of the sheltering shield.⁷ Then he, having dodged the long spear, stood up, his eyes now showing measureless alarm, scared on account of the spear's near miss. But Achilles drew his sharp sword and sprang upon him in fury, with a terrible shout. Now Aineias hefted a rock in his hands— 285 a mighty feat, that would take two men and more such as men are today; but, alone, he easily wielded it, and would have thrown it to meet Achilles' onslaught, aiming at his helmet, or else at the shield that kept him from grim death, and Pēleus's son with his sword, closing in, would have slain

Aineias, 290
had not Poseidōn the Earth-Shaker quickly taken notice, and straightway spoken up among the immortal gods:⁸
"Alas, I feel grief for Aineias, the great-hearted, who too soon vanquished by Pēleus's son will go down to the realm of Hādēs after believing the tales of Apollo, the deadly archer— 295 the fool! And Apollo won't even save him from wretched death!
Why should this guiltless man now suffer calamity in vain, because of the troubles of others, he who always gives welcome gifts to the gods who hold the broad heavens?
Come then, let's snatch him away from death ourselves, 300 for the son of Kronos may well be wrathful, should Achilles slaughter Aineias here, who's destined to survive that his race may not perish unseen for lack of seed, the line of Dardanos, whom Kronos's son loved above all children who have ever been born to him of mortal women. So now 305 he's come to look with hatred upon Priam's line: now surely mighty Aineias will reign as king among the Trojans, he and his sons, and his sons' sons born in time to come."

To him the ox-eyed lady Hērē replied: "Earth-Shaker, you must decide yourself concerning Aineias— 310

-
7. Another physical improbability that suggests that this passage may be the work of an interpolator. How likely is a spear, even when flung by Achilles, not only to have its entire length pierce right through two layers of a shield but, despite the arresting shock, to then continue its flight?
8. Still more physical improbability: we are required to think of the two combatants suddenly freeze-framed, as it were, in the middle of their incipient duel, and waiting thus while the gods discuss their case, until Poseidōn comes and magically removes Aineias from the scene.

whether to rescue him, or let him be vanquished, brave though he is, by Achilles, Pēleus's son.
 The two of us have sworn a number of oaths in the presence of all the immortals, Pallas Athēnē and I, that we'll never ward off from the Trojans their day of evil— 315 not even when all Troy is ablaze with devouring fire, and the Achaians' warlike sons are those who lit the flames."

On hearing her words, Poseidōn the Earth-Shaker set off through the fighting and the tumult of spears, and came to where Aineias and far-famed Achilles were. 320 Swiftly he shed a mist over the eyes of Achilles, Pēleus's son, then pulled his well-bronzed ash-wood spear out from the shield of great-hearted Aineias, and set it at the feet of Achilles; but Aineias himself he picked up, lifted high off the ground, and flung him: over many ranks 325 of fighters Aineias soared, and many of horses, thrown in a great arc by the god's hand, till he landed at the outermost edge of the violent conflict, where the Kaukōnians were armed and ready for battle. Then Poseidōn the Earth-Shaker came up close beside him, 330 and addressed him with winged words, saying:

"Aineias,
 what god is it who's been urging you, in your rash folly, to measure yourself, face to face, in battle against the arrogant son of Pēleus, who's stronger than you, and better loved by the immortals? Withdraw, any time you encounter him, 335 lest you enter the realm of Hādēs before your fated time!
 But after Achilles meets his death and destined end then take heart and fight among the foremost: no other warrior of the Achaians will be able to take your life."

So saying, he left him there, when he'd revealed all this, 340 and at once from Achilles' eyes the marvelous mist dispersed; and then he at once, staring hard at what he saw, in amazement addressed his own proud spirit: "See now, what's this strange thing I behold with my own eyes?
 My spear lies here on the ground, yet he at whom I threw it, 345 determined to kill him, is nowhere to be seen!
 Aineias, too, must be dear to the immortal gods, although

I assumed that his boasting was the merest idle bombast.
 Ah, let him go: he'll not have the courage to confront me ever again: he's too happy to have dodged death now! 350
 So, after passing the word to the war-loving Danaäns, I'll go face the rest of the Trojans, and make trial of them."

With that he raced down the ranks, exhorting each warrior as he went:
 "No longer now hang back from the Trojans, noble Achaïans, rather let man go face man, be raging for the battle! 355 It's hard for me, strong though I am, to battle against such a mass of men, to fight them all single-handed:
 not even Arēs, immortal god, nor Athēnē, could toil and engage with the jaws of such a huge grinding conflict!
 Nevertheless, as far as I'm able, with hands and feet 360 and human strength, I promise you, in no way will I yield the slightest, but press right through their ranks, and no Trojan, I think, who comes near my spear will be happy."

So he spoke, urging them on, while illustrious Hektōr cried out to the Trojans, swore he'd go and confront Achilles: 365
 "You great-hearted Trojans, don't be scared of Pēleus's son!
 I too with words would battle even the immortals, though not with the spear, since they're mightier by far.
 Nor will Achilles accomplish everything he's promised:
 a part he'll fulfill, but a part he'll leave half-finished. 370 Yet I shall go forth against him, though his hands be like fire—though his hands be like fire, and his passion like red-hot iron."

So he spoke, urging them on, and the Trojans faced the foe, spears raised: the two sides' rage mingled, the war cry went up.
 Then to Hektōr came Phoibos Apollo, and spoke to him, saying: 375
 "Hektōr, no longer challenge Achilles out front: instead wait for him with the main body, in the tumult of battle, lest he spear you, or wound you at close quarters with his sword."

So he spoke, and Hektōr went back into the throng of troops alarmed, after hearing the speaking voice of the god. 380

But Achilles went for the Trojans, heart clad in prowess, yelling his terrible war cry. Iphitiōn first he killed, Otryteus's fine son, a commander of many men, born of a nymph, a Naiad, to Otrynteus, sacker of cities, under snowcapped Tmōlos, in Hydē's rich countryside. 385

As he charged, noble Achilles took him out with a spear cast square in the face: his head was split in two, he fell with a thud, and over him noble Achilles exulted:
"Lie there, son of Otrynteus, most fearsome of warriors!
Here you met your death, though it was by the Gygaian 390 lake you were born, on your ancestral estate, beside fish-rich Hyllos and eddying Hermos."

So he spoke,

vauntingly, but darkness now covered his victim's eyes, and the wheels of Achaian chariots tore him asunder in the first grinding onset: over him Dēmoleōn— 395 a fine battler, the son of Antēnōr—Achilles now speared in the temple, through the bronze cheek-piece of his helmet:
the bronze helmet was no protection, the flighted spear point tore into it, split the bone open, and all his brains were mashed up inside: he died while still attacking. 400 Hippodamas next, who'd just jumped down from his chariot and was trying to escape him, Achilles speared in the back.
As he breathed his last he bellowed, the way that a bull will bellow when it's dragged out by young men at the lord of Helikē's shrine⁹: the Earth-Shaker loves such things. 405
So did Hippodamas bellow as the proud spirit fled his bones.
Achilles now with his spear made for godlike Polydōros, a son of Priam. His father refused to allow him to fight, since among his children he was the latest-born, and his favorite as well, and beat everyone at running: 410 but then, in his childishness, to show how fast he could sprint, he went tearing down the front line, and lost his life there, speared square in the back by swift-footed noble Achilles as he dashed by, where the baldric's golden clasps were fastened, and the two ends of the corselet overlapped. 415 Clean through beside the navel went the spear point, and he sank on his knees with a groan: a dark cloud enshrouded him, and, collapsing, he grasped his innards in his hands.

9. The "lord of Helikē" was Poseidōn, who had a famous shrine at Helikē on the coast of Achaia.

But when Hektōr perceived his brother Polydōros, with his innards clutched in his hands, collapsing on the ground, 420 a mist was shed over his eyes, no longer could he bear to range over the battlefield, but made straight for Achilles, like a flame, brandishing his keen-edged spear. When Achilles saw him, up he sprang, and vauntingly declared: “Here comes the man who has most deeply vexed my spirit, 425 since he slew my much-beloved comrade: not for much longer shall we two avoid each other along the battle lines.”

That said, with an angry glance he called to noble Hektōr:
 “Come close, that you may the sooner enter destruction’s bounds.”

To this, untouched by fear, bright-helmeted Hektōr replied: 430 “Son of Pēleus, don’t try to frighten me like a child with mere words, since I know perfectly well myself how to frame the language of taunts and rancorous abuse.
 I know, too, you’re a great fighter, and that I rank well below you.

Yet it’s true that such matters rest on the knees of the gods— 435 whether I, though the lesser man, may still rob you of life when I cast my spear: it’s been sharp enough in the past.”

With that he swung and let fly his spear, but Athēnē blew it back, well away from glorious Achilles, with a light breath only: it returned to noble Hektōr, 440 fell right at his feet. Then Achilles sprang upon him, hot for action, determined to cut him down, with a terrifying shout. But Apollo snatched Hektōr away—very easily, as a god can, and hid him in dense mist.

Three times did swift-footed noble Achilles rush him 445 with his bronze spear; three times he only struck thick mist.
 But when for the fourth time he charged at him like a god, after his fearsome war cry he spoke winged words to him: “Now once more, dog, you’ve dodged death, though close indeed that bad thing came to you! But once more Phoibos Apollo 450 saved you, to whom it must be that you pray before entering the clash of spears—and for sure, when I meet you later, if there’s any god who’s my helper, I’ll finish you off!
 But for now I’ll go after the others, see whom I can catch.”

So saying, he struck Dryōps full in the neck with his spear, 455 and Dryōps slumped at his feet. He left him there, and Philētōr's son Dēmouchos, a big strong fellow, he hit with his spear on one knee, cut short his advance, then savaged with his great sword, deprived him of life.
 Next Dardanos and Laogonos, two sons of Bias, 460 he attacked, forcing both from their chariot to the ground, one speared, the other cut down by his sword, hand to hand.
 Then Alastōr's son Trōs—who'd come up to clasp his knees in the hope that he'd take him prisoner, let him live, out of pity for one of his age group, rather than kill him:
 the fool, 465
 unaware that there wasn't a chance of ever persuading him, since this was a man without kindness of mind or heart, but raging to kill—flung his arms now around Achilles' knees, tried to beseech him. A sword-stroke found his liver, the liver protruded, and black blood poured down from it, 470 filling his tunic's fold. Darkness shrouded his eyes as he lost hold of life. Achilles then closed in on Moulaios, hit one ear with his spear, and the bronze point drove clean through to the other ear. Agēnōr's son Eheklos he slashed square on the head with his hilted sword: 475 its whole blade was warmed with his blood, and both his eyes were invaded by scarlet death and all-mastering fate.
 Deukaliōn next, at the point where the elbow's tendons are joined, Achilles pierced through one arm with his bronze spear point: Deukaliōn faced him, arm weighed down, 480 seeing his death before him. Achilles' sword severed his neck, sent both head and helmet flying, while marrow spurted out from his spine, and the trunk lay spread-eagled on the ground.
 Then Achilles went in pursuit of Peirēs' blameless son, Rhigmos, who'd come from rich-soiled Thrace. Him now 485 Achilles speared in mid-torso: the bronze stuck in his belly, and he fell from his chariot. While his driver Areithoös was wheeling his horses around, he too was hit, in the back, by Achilles' sharp spear, and thrown out: the horses panicked.
 As devouring fire rages onward through the deep glens 490 of a dried-out mountainside, and the thick maquis flares up, and on all sides the blaze is fanned by a roiling wind, so Achilles, like some demon,¹⁰ raged everywhere with his spear, hard on the heels of his victims: the earth ran black with blood.

 As a man yokes broad-browed bulls for the treading out 495 of white barley strewn on a strong-based threshing-floor, and quickly the grain's unhusked by the feet of the bellowing bulls, so, urged by great-hearted Achilles, his whole-hoofed horses galloped over the dead and their shields; with blood all the axle below was splashed, and the rails round his chariot, 500 with the drops flung up by the wheels and the horses' hooves as Pēleus's son charged on, his invincible hands bespattered with flying gore, in his pursuit of glory.

10. The Greek word δαίμων (daimōn) is nuanced in a bewildering variety of ways. In essence it means a divine or superhuman power, a spirit: sometimes neutral, sometimes aggressive, occasionally kindly; sometimes personal, sometimes vaguely abstract; at times fate, or divinity, or heaven, or a god, or the gods collectively. For some reason the one thing the scholarly tradition shies away from ever translating it as is “demon,” the modern version of the word itself, perhaps feeling that this is too tarred with the post-Christian tradition. But a malevolent spirit is clearly at work at 9.600 and 15.468, and Achilles does indeed attack like a demon, in the extended English sense as well, both here and at 21.93, 227; in these cases I have translated accordingly.

Book 21

But when they came to the ford of the swift-flowing River, eddyding Xanthos, whom immortal Zeus engendered, Achilles now split the rout. Some he pursued across the plain towards the city, where the Achaians were fleeing in panic the day before, when faced with illustrious Hektōr's fury— 5 they'd broken, fled in disorder, and Hērē had spread a dense mist in front to confuse them—but half the Trojans were herded into the River, deep-flowing and silver-eddied.
In they splashed in with great outcry: the deep streambed resounded,
both riverbanks echoed the tumult as they went swimming 10 this way and that, still shouting, spun round by the eddies.
As when, with an onrushing fire, clouds of locusts will take wing in flight towards a river, and the never-wearying blaze in its sudden onset will scorch them, and they cringe in the water, so at Achilles' onset the stream of deep-eddyding Xanthos 15 was loud with a mingled confusion of men and horses.

Achilles, scion of Zeus, now left his spear on the bank, leaning against a tamarisk, and charged in like a demon, armed only with his sword, horrific deeds in mind.
He turned and struck at random, and ghastly cries went up 20 from those caught by his sword: the water ran red with blood, and as, fleeing a huge-mawed dolphin, the other fishes scurry to fill the bolt-holes of some sheltering harbor, terrified, since the dolphin devours all it catches—so these Trojans, caught in the current of the terrible River, 25 cowered under its banks. When his hands grew weary with killing, Achilles pulled twelve youths up alive from the water, to be blood-price for the death of Menoitios's son Patroklos.
He led them ashore, all dazed, like so many fawns, and bound their hands behind them with the well-cut belts 30 that they wore to cinch in their soft tunics, and then turned them over to his companions to take back to the hollow ships.
This done, he sprang back again, his mind hard set on slaughter.

There it was he encountered a son of Dardanian Priam fleeing from the River: Lykaōn, whom once before he'd caught 35 and snatched, struggling, out of his father's orchard during a night raid: he was busy cutting young branches from a fig tree with the sharp bronze, to make rails for a chariot, when on him—an unlooked-for disaster—came noble Achilles, who took him by ship to well-built Lēmnos and sold him 40 off as a slave: Jason's son had paid the price demanded, but a guest-friend then ransomed him, for a very large sum—Ēētiōn of Imbros, who sent him to noble Arisbē, from where, slipping off in secret, he reached his ancestral home.
 For eleven days he took pleasure among his friends 45 on arrival from Lēmnos; but on the twelfth some god threw him back into the hands of Achilles, who this second time would dispatch him to Hādēs' realm, loath though he was to go.
 When noble swift-footed Achilles noticed this man, unarmed, minus helmet or shield, no spear in his hand— 50 he'd thrown them all away, being tired and sweaty as he clambered out of the river, knees weak from exhaustion—in amazement he then addressed his own proud spirit:
 "Ah, me, what's this strange thing I see with my own eyes?
 Surely those great-hearted Trojans whom I've slaughtered 55 will rise once more from the murk of the underworld, seeing that this fellow is back, after dodging his day of doom, though sold into sacred Lēmnos; nor has the deep of the grey sea held him back, that stops many against their will.
 Well, now indeed he'll also get a taste of my spear, 60 so that I'll be able to see, and be sure in my mind, whether he'll come back likewise from that too, or rather be stopped by the life-giving earth, that holds down even the strong."

 So he reflected, waiting: Lykaōn now approached him, dazed, eager to clasp his knees, and desperate at heart 65 to escape an unpleasant end and the black death-spirit.
 Then noble Achilles lifted and poised his long spear, ready to kill: but Lykaōn ducked under it, embraced Achilles' knees. The spear passed over his back and stuck in the ground, still longing to glut itself with men's flesh. 70 Then Lykaōn besought Achilles—one hand clasping his knees, while the other kept a firm grip on his sharpened spear, not letting go—and addressed him with winged words:

 “By your knees, Achilles, I beg you, respect me, take pity on me!
 Zeus’s nursling, I’m your suppliant, I deserve your respect, 75 since you were the first with whom I tasted Dēmētēr’s grain¹ on the day you captured me in our well-planned orchard, and shipped me far away from father and friends, to sacred Lēmnos, for the price of a hundred oxen!
 To free me by ransom cost three times as much, and this 80 morning’s the twelfth since I returned to Ilion, after much hardship—and now my fatal destiny’s put me back in your hands: I must be hateful to Zeus the Father since he’s given me to you again! Too short the life my mother bore me to—Laothoē, old Altēs’ daughter—Altēs, 85 who rules as lord over the war-loving Lelegēs, from steep Pēdasos, his city on the Satnioeis river.
 His daughter Priam married—among many other women—and of her we two sons were born: now you’ll slaughter us both—one you’ve already done for among the front-line fighters, 90 Polydōros the godlike, laid low by your sharp spear; and now a bad end awaits me too, for I don’t imagine I’ll escape your hands: some god it was brought me to you.
 And another thing I’ll tell you, and you bear it in mind:
 I’m not born from the same womb as Hektōr, so don’t kill me: 95
 He it was that slew your comrade, so kindly and so strong.”

Thus Priam’s illustrious son addressed him, with words of entreaty, but there was no honey in the reply he heard: “Fool, don’t talk ransom to me, don’t make speeches!
 Before Patroklos encountered the day of his destiny, 100 till then I was more inclined to spare the lives of Trojans, and many I captured alive and sold; but of them now not one shall escape death, whomsoever before Troy’s ramparts a god puts into my hands of all Trojans—and least of all one of Priam’s sons! 105
 So, friend, you too must die: why then lament thus?
 Patroklos too is dead, a far better man than you are.

1. I.e., Achilles was the first Greek with whom Lykaōn broke bread after being captured. Richardson (60) quotes a scholiast’s explanation of Lykaōn’s hopeful argument: “It would be incongruous to offer food, the source of life, to someone, and then take away his life. And he mentions Demeter to evoke religious scruples.”

Can't you see what I'm like, how handsome and tall I am?
 A fine father sired me, the mother who bore me was a goddess—
 Yet over me too hang death and all-mastering destiny: 110
 A day will come when, at dawn, or noon, or evening, my life too will be forfeit to someone in battle, by a flighted spear or an arrow shot from the bowstring."

So he spoke, and Lykaōn's knees and heart were unstrung:
 he let go the spear, and sat there, both hands outstretched 115 in supplication. But Achilles drew his sharp sword, and plunged it in by the neck at the collarbone: the two-edged blade sank in its full length, and Lykaōn fell prone, lay stretched out there on the ground. His dark blood gushed, soaked the earth.
 Achilles now seized one foot, flung him into the river 120 as flotsam, and, vaunting, spoke winged words over him:
 "Lie there now with the fishes, that'll lick the blood from your wound, quite indifferent to you; nor will your mother

lay you out on a bier and wail over you: rather will Skamandros roll you away in its eddies to the wide gulf of the sea, 125 and fish darting through the waves will surface amid their black ripples to nibble Lykaōn's white lustrous fat!
 So die all, till we reach sacred Ilion's citadel, with you in full flight, and I in murderous pursuit!
 Not even the swift-flowing and silver-eddied River 130 will protect you, long though you've offered him bull after bull, and thrown whole-hoofed horses alive still into his eddies:
 you'll all suffer the same evil fate, till every one of you has paid for Patroklos's death, and the loss of those Achaians whom you slaughtered by the swift ships while I was absent." 135

So he spoke, and the River grew yet more enraged at heart, pondering in his mind how to make noble Achilles stop his war work, how to fend off calamity from the Trojans.
 Meanwhile the son of Pēleus, with his far-shadowing spear, went for Asteropaios, hungry to kill him—the son 140 of Pēlegōn, who was begotten by wide-flowing Axios on Periboia, the eldest of Akessamenos's daughters: with her the deep-eddying River mingled in love. Him now Achilles charged, as he came up from the water, holding two spears, making for him, fierce strength put in his heart 145

by Xanthos, irate on account of the young men slaughtered by Achilles along the River on his pitiless killing spree.

When they came close, advancing the one against the other, swift-footed noble Achilles was the first to speak:

“Who are you, from where, that you dare to come out and face me?

150

Unhappy are those whose sons confront my strength!”

To him then replied Pēlegōn’s illustrious son:

“Great-hearted son of Pēleus, why query my lineage?

I come from rich-soiled Paiōnia, a distant land, in command of Paiōnian lancers, and this is now the eleventh day since I arrived here in Ilion. As for my ancestry, I’m descended from wide-flowing Axios—

155

Axios, who sends forth the sweetest water on earth, who begot Pēlegōn, famed for his spear; and he, they say, was my father. So now, renowned Achilles, let’s fight!”

160

Menacingly he spoke, and noble Achilles raised his spear of Pēlian ash; but the hero Asteropaios let fly both spears at once, being double-handed, and with one spear he struck his opponent’s shield, but failed to break through: the gold layer, a god’s gift, held it off;

165

but the other spear struck Achilles’ forearm a grazing blow—his right one: dark blood gushed, but the spear point passed on, and stuck in the ground, still hungry to glut itself on flesh.

Then Achilles flung his true-flying ash-wood spear at Asteropaios, in fierce determination to kill him, 170

but missed the man and struck the high riverbank, sank the spear half its length, fixing it in the earth.

Pēleus’s son drew the sharp sword from beside his thigh, and sprang at him, hot to kill. Asteropaios failed to pull Achilles’ spear from the bank in his massive fist:

175

three times, trying to free it, he made it quiver, three time he gave up. The fourth time his heart was set on bending and breaking the ash spear of Aiakos’s grandson:

but, before he could do it, Achilles’ sword at close quarters took his life, struck into his belly, beside the navel: his guts

180

gushed out on the ground, and darkness shrouded his eyes as he lay there, gasping still, and Achilles jumped on his chest and stripped off his armor, and shouted exultantly: “Lie there! It’s hard to strive with the sons of mighty Kronos, even for someone sired by a River! You claim 185 a wide-flowing River for ancestor, whereas I declare myself of the lineage of mighty Zeus! The man who begot me is lord over the numerous Myrmidons—Pēleus, Aiakos’s son; it was Zeus who sired Aiakos.

 So, as Zeus is mightier than all seaward-flowing rivers, 190
 Zeus’s line likewise outranks a River’s ancestry!
 You may have a great River beside you—always supposing it can protect you: but still there’s no fighting Kronos’s son Zeus! With him not even the lord Achelōios contends, nor the vast might of deep-flowing Ocean, from whom 195 all rivers derive, and the whole mass of the sea, and every spring and deep well has its beginning;
 no, even he goes in fear of the bolt of mighty Zeus, and his awesome thunder, whenever it crashes out of the sky.”

With that he pulled his bronze spear out from the riverbank, 200 and left Asteropaios there, when he’d taken his dear life, sprawled out among the sand shoals, lapped by dark water, with the eels and fishes all busy about him, nibbling and tearing the fat surrounding his kidneys.
 Achilles moved on to harass the Paiōnians, chariot marshals, 205 who still lay in scattered confusion alongside the eddying River after seeing their best warrior in the grind of battle laid low by the might of Achilles and his sword.
 There he took down Thersilochos, Astypylos, and Mydōn, Mnēsos and Thrasios, Aínios, Ophelestēs— 210 and yet more Paiōnians would swift Achilles have slain, had the deep-eddying River, enraged, not now addressed him in the semblance of a man, voicing speech from a deep eddy: “Ah, Achilles, beyond all in strength, beyond all men in evil 215 acts, since the gods themselves are forever your protectors!
 If the son of Kronos is letting you kill every Trojan, at least drive these well away from me, do your vile work on dry land!
 My lovely streams are currently all awash with corpses;
 I can’t get to discharge my waters into the bright sea,
 I’m so choked with the dead, while you ruthlessly keep on killing! 220 Come, now, let me be: I’m dumbfounded, O High Commander.”

Then swift-footed Achilles answered him in these words:
 “All this, Zeus’s nursling Skamandros, shall be done as you request.
 But I’ll not cease from the slaughter of these arrogant Trojans till I’ve cooped them up in their city, and made trial of Hektōr, 225 man against man, and either he slays me, or I him.”

So saying, he charged at the Trojans like a demon, and then the deep-eddying River said to Apollo: “Look here, child of Zeus, lord of the silver bow, you’ve not honored the wishes of Kronos’s son, who strongly required you 230 to stand firm by the side of the Trojans, and help them until the late-setting sun goes down, and darkens the rich earth.”

So he spoke. Achilles, famed spearman, leapt to midstream from the high bank. But the River, now rushing onward in turbulent spate, stirred all his streams, swept up the countless 235 corpses that cluttered his channel, whom Achilles had killed:
 these he, bellowing bull-like, tossed up onto dry land, while the ones still alive he protected with his sweet streams, concealing them in his eddies, which were both large and deep.
 Fearsomely round Achilles surged his turbulent wave: its crest 240 crashing onto his shield forced him back, he could no longer stand firm on his feet, so reached out and grasped an elm, one full-grown and lofty, but it came away roots and all, tearing up the whole bank, and with its clustering branches dropped right across the fine streambed, damming the River himself 245

by falling its whole length within him. Achilles sprang clear of his whirling waters, ran swift-foot across the plain in some alarm. But the great god did not give up, pursued him, surging black-crested, to stop the actions of noble Achilles, fend off destruction from the Trojans. 250
 But Pēleus’s son leapt back the whole length of a spear cast with the swoop of a black eagle, the hunting falcon, that is the strongest and swiftest of all winged creatures:
 such was his speed, and the bronze strips on his torso rattled fearfully. He dodged aside from under the River 255 and kept running: the River’s huge bore roared on behind him.
 As a man who digs a channel from a dark-water spring to the plants in his garden will guide the water’s flow, mattock in hand to clear obstructions from the channel, and, as the rill flows on, all the pebbles that litter its bed 260 are swept along with it while it chuckles quickly down a slope in the channel, even getting ahead of its guide—just so did the River's bore keep overtaking Achilles, swift runner though he was: gods are mightier than mortals.

 Every time swift-footed noble Achilles attempted 265 to stand firm and confront the River, to find out if all the immortals who hold the wide heavens were his pursuers, the sky-fed River's huge crest would come crashing down on his shoulders, he'd jump away from it, much wearied in spirit, while the River's rough spate kept sapping the strength 270 of his knees beneath him, sucked the earth from under his feet.
 Then Pēleus's son cried out, looking up to the wide heavens:
 "Zeus, Father, not one god has undertaken to save me, pitiable as I am, from the River—after this, I could endure any trouble! Yet none of the Heavenly Ones is as much 275 to blame as my mother, who beguiled me with lies, saying that under the walls of the corseleted Trojans I'd perish, slain by the swift shafts of Apollo!
 If only Hektōr had killed me, the best-bred warrior here, then noble had been the slayer, noble the man he slew— 280 whereas now it's my wretched fate to perish miserably, trapped in a great river, like some swineherd's boy who's swept away by the torrent he tries to cross in winter."²

So he spoke; and very quickly Poseidōn and Athēnē came and stood by him, in the likeness of mortal men, 285 took him by the hand, and spoke reassuringly to him.
 Of them Poseidōn the Earth-Shaker now addressed him, saying:
 "Son of Pēleus, don't be too scared, no need for alarm when you have two such helpers as we are, from the gods, and with Zeus's approval—Pallas Athēnē and I! 290 Since it's not your destiny to be overcome by the River he'll very soon ease off—as you'll see for yourself.

2. It is generally assumed that Achilles would regret not having been killed by another champion warrior, and this thought is certainly present. But both ἀγαθός (agathos, "good") and ἀριστος (aristos, "best"), the epithets used here, while regularly in Homer denoting excellence in a warrior, also regularly denote nobility of birth. The reference to the swineherd's boy is significant: Achilles would most regret not having died, like a gentleman, in single combat with another such.

Now, if you will listen, we have good advice for you:
 Don't let your hands cease from the work of common warfare until you've cooped up inside Troy's famous ramparts 295 the whole routed Trojan army; when you've taken Hektōr's life return to the ships. This much glory we grant you."

So saying, they both went back to the immortals, but Achilles, greatly encouraged by the gods' behest, went on over the plain, now swamped with a flood of water, 300 and much fine armor and weapons of young slain warriors lay floating there with their corpses: his knees rose high as he charged, straight against the current. Now the wide-flowing river could not stop him, such strength he had from Athēnē.
 Yet Skamandros did not abate his force, but rather swelled 305 his wrath against Pēleus's son, brought his waters up to a crest, raising himself aloft, and shouted to Simoeis:

"Dear brother, to face this man's strength will need both of us if we're to stop him from sacking King Priam's great city any time now! The Trojans won't withstand him in battle, 310 so help me at once, go flood your streams with the flow from your springs, put all your torrents in spate, raise a huge wave, stir up a thunderous racket of driftwood and pebbles! We must halt this wild warrior, who now has the upper hand, wants to match the gods in action! 315
 For I tell you, neither his violence nor his good looks will save him, nor his fine armor, which in some flooded pool of mine will lie, all coated with mud; while the man himself I'll wrap in sand, pour over him an abundance of shingle.
 That way the Achaians will have no idea where to gather 320 his bones, under such a mass of silt I shall entomb him!
 Here will his grave be prepared, and he'll have no need of a burial mound, when Achaians perform his funeral rites."

With that he rushed at Achilles, turbulent, surging high, seething with foam and blood and slaughtered corpses. 325
 The dark and heaving wave of the sky-fed River towered above him, began to take down the son of Pēleus; then Hērē cried out in a loud voice, being scared for Achilles, lest the huge deep-eddying River should sweep him away, and at once called upon Hēphaistos, her own dear son: 330
 "Up with you, my lame child! You are the one, we thought, best matched in battle with Xanthos, the eddying River—so bring help at once to Achilles, create widespread fire, while I quickly stir from the sea a violent gale, its force fed by the west and the white-cloud southern winds, 335 that will burn up the Trojans—their selves and their battle gear—by spreading destructive flames. Along Xanthos's banks now go set his trees alight, ring him with fire, don't allow him in any way to dissuade you, with honeyed words or threats, and don't relax your pressure until the moment 340 when I call to you: only then should you curb your tireless fire."

So she spoke. Hēphaistos set up a marvelous conflagration:
 First on the plain the blaze was kindled, burning the dead, all the corpses thickly strewn there, slain by Achilles, and the whole plain was dried up now, the bright water halted. 345
 As when at harvest time the north wind quickly parches a fresh-watered threshing floor, and he who raked it rejoices, so now the whole plain was scorched, and the corpses completely consumed. Then against the River he turned his blazing flames:
 the elms caught fire, and the willows and tamarisks, 350 the celandine burned, the rushes, the galingale—everything that grew in abundance along the sweet course of the River, and the eels and fish in the eddies were sorely distressed, somersaulting this way and that along the sweet streams, tormented by the fire blast that wily Hēphaistos discharged. 355 Burned too was the mighty River, who now addressed the god:
 "Hēphaistos, no other god can match himself against you, nor am I minded to fight you, ablaze with fire as you are!
 So, stop your assault! The Trojans? Let noble Achilles drive them out of their city! Why should I help or hinder here?" 360

Ablaze with flames he spoke, his sweet streams bubbling up:
 as a cauldron will boil over when forced by a hot fire, that's rendering down the lard of a fattened porker, bubbling up all round, dry firewood stacked beneath it—so the River's sweet streams blazed, and their water bubbled, 365 and he stopped, with no will to flow further: the fiery blast of inventive Hēphaistos had stalled him, and now to Hērē he addressed an urgent prayer, speaking in winged words:
 "Hērē, why is your son giving me and my waters trouble above all others? I surely am not so much at fault 370

as all those who have acted as supporters of the Trojans!
 Even so, I'll desist, if that's what you want of me—but let this fellow desist as well! What's more, I'll swear an oath that I'll never ward off from the Trojans their day of evil, not even when all Troy is ablaze with devouring fire, and the Achaians' warlike sons are those who lit the flames!" 375

When the goddess, white-armed Hērē, heard these words, she at once addressed Hēphaistos, her dear son:
 "Hēphaistos, desist, famed child! It is not seemly to assail an immortal god thus on behalf of mortals." 380

So she spoke, and Hēphaistos quenched his astounding blaze, and the current went rolling back down the River's sweet streams.

When the might of Xanthos was vanquished, both he and Hēphaistos desisted, held back by Hērē, furious though she was;
 but upon the rest of the gods strife descended, both momentous 385 and agonizing: their spirits were blown in opposite directions, they engaged with a huge clatter, the wide earth reechoed, the great firmament trumpeted. Zeus heard it all from where he sat on Olympos, broke out in delighted laughter to see the gods all fighting with one another, 390 standing aloof no longer. First into combat was Arēs, piercer of shields, who began by assailing Athēnē, bronze spear in hand, with a stream of insulting words:
 "Why once more now, you dog fly, are you setting gods against gods—as your proud heart bids you, so fierce, so daring? 395 Don't you recall setting up Diomēdēs, Tydeus' s son, to wound me? You yourself, in full view, grabbed his spear and thrust it straight at me, tore open my handsome flesh!
 So now I think you'll pay me the price for all you did."

So saying, he hit her full on her tasseled aegis, 400 that fearsome thing, not subduable even by Zeus's bolts:
 there it was bloodstained Arēs struck home with his long spear.
 Athēnē started back, and hefted in one strong hand a rock that lay on the plain, black, jagged, enormous, set up by men in the past as the boundary mark of a field. 405
 With this she hit furious Arēs on the neck, unstrung his limbs.
 Seven furlongs he stretched in his fall, fouled his hair in the dust, and his armor rattled about him. Pallas Athēnē laughed, and vauntingly addressed him, speaking in winged words: “Fool! Have you still not learned how much more warlike than you 410

 I can claim to be, when you pit your strength against mine?
 This is how you’ll pay the price to the Furies of your mother, who’s planning trouble for you in her anger because you’ve left the Achaians, are supporting the arrogant Trojans!”

This said, Athēnē turned her keen gaze from Arēs, 415 whom then Aphrodītē, Zeus’s daughter, caught by the hand and led away, groaning deeply, still barely catching his breath.

But when white-armed Hērē, the goddess, noticed Aphrodītē, straight away she addressed Athēnē with winged words:
 “Well, now, unwearied child of Zeus of the aegis, 420 there’s that dog fly again, leading Arēs, ruin of mortals, out through the fighting, away from grim warfare! After her!”

Thus she spoke, and Athēnē was glad to set off in pursuit, caught up, and struck Aphrodītē a blow on the breast with her strong fist, unstrung both her knees and her spirit. 425
 So there Aphrodītē and Arēs lay on the nurturing earth, and Athēnē exulted over them, speaking winged words: “Let all suffer thus who lend support to the Trojans when they dare to confront the mail-corseleted Achaians!
 May they prove as daring and resolute as Aphrodītē, 430 who came out to rescue Arēs, and then faced my might—this way we’d have long since put an end to the war, by sacking Ilion, that well-founded citadel!”

So she spoke, and the goddess, white-armed Hērē, smiled.
 But Poseidōn, the lordly Earth-Shaker, now called out to Apollo: 435 “Why, Phoibos, are we two standing aloof? That’s not seemly when others have joined in! Too shameful, if without fighting we went back to Olympos, to Zeus’s bronze-floored abode!
 You begin: you’re the younger, it’s not proper for me to, since I was born before you, and have more wisdom. 440 You fool, what a witless heart you have! Don’t you recall all the ills that we two, alone of the gods, endured in Ilion, when we came to serve haughty Laomedōn, by Zeus’s command, for a year, as hired workers, at a fixed wage, and he was our taskmaster, gave us orders? 445
 I built for the Trojans a wall encircling their city—

both wide and splendid, to make the city unbreachable; while you, Phoibos, herded their sleek and shambling cattle among the foothills and woodlands of many-ridged Ida.
 But when the year's happy seasons brought round the due time 450 for payment, then we were defrauded of all our hire by that monster Laomedōn, who dismissed us with threats, saying he'd put us in fetters, bound hand and foot, and sell us both abroad, dispatch us to some far island—threatened, too, to cut off our ears with the bronze! 455 So home we both went, infuriated at heart because of the wages he'd promised, but not delivered—and now it's his people you're helping, you won't work with us to make sure these arrogant Trojans perish—and miserably, in utter ruin—they, their children, their honored wives.” 460

Lord Apollo, the deadly archer, made him this answer: “Earth-Shaker, you would not speak of me as one that's sound of mind, were I to fight you on behalf of those wretches—mortals, who, like the leaves, in one season are ablaze with life, and consuming the harvested fruits of the earth, 465 in another waste into lifelessness. So let us speedily desist from our combat, leave them to fight it out on their own.”

So saying, he turned back, since he felt embarrassed at the prospect of coming to blows with his father's brother.
 But he got a strong rebuke from his sister, the Lady of Beasts, 470
 Artemis, wild huntress, who addressed him in scathing words: “Running away, deadly archer? Conceding a total triumph to Poseidōn? Letting him boast of his effortless victory?
 You fool! Then why carry that bow? It's useless as wind!
 From now on don't let me hear you, in our father's halls, 475 boast—as you did a while back before the immortal gods—that you'd fight in single combat against Poseidōn!”

So she spoke, and Apollo, deadly archer, made no reply.
 But Zeus's revered bedmate, losing her temper, now upbraided the bow huntress in abusive language: 480 “You shameless bitch, how come you're so hot to make a stand against me now? I'm a tough one for you to take on, though you carry that bow: Zeus made you a lion, but against women—let you kill any one of them that you chose to!

Better, I'd think, in the mountains to be hunting beasts of prey 485 and wild deer, than to battle those stronger than yourself!
Still, if you're bent on war, you'll find out, the hard way, how much stronger I am, when you match your strength against mine."

This said, with her left hand Hērē gripped Artemis by both wrists, while her right hand snatched from her shoulders the bow and quiver, 490 and beat her about the ears with them, a smile on her face, as Artemis struggled, and her swift shafts were spilled. Then, weeping, the goddess broke from Hērē's grasp, fled like a dove that flies, pursued by a hawk, into some hollow rock's cleft, and escapes, since it's not her destiny to be caught— 495 so Artemis fled in tears, bow and arrows left where they fell.

To Lētō then spoke Hermēs the guide, the slayer of Argos:
"Lētō, I'll not fight you: it's a disastrous business, this exchanging of blows with the wives of Zeus the cloud-gatherer!
You can boast all you want among the immortal gods 500 that you vanquished me forcefully, by dint of your mighty strength."

So he spoke. Lētō picked up her daughter's back-bent bow, and the arrows that had been scattered amid the swirling dust, and retreated, taking them with her. But Artemis the maiden made her way to Zeus's brazen-floored home on Olympos, 505 where she sat down, weeping, on the knees of her father, and the ambrosial robe she wore quivered. Then her father, Kronos's son, hugged her to him, and, laughing quietly, asked:
"Which of the gods in heaven, dear child, has done this to you, without reason, as though you were openly misbehaving?" 510

Fine-garlanded Artemis of the loud chase answered him:
"Your wife it was beat me up, father, white-armed Hērē, because of whom strife and fighting are the lot of the immortals."
Such was their conversation, the one to the other.

Phoibos Apollo now went down into sacred Ilion, 515 concerned in his mind for the wall of the well-built citadel, lest the Danaäns sack it that day, before its destined time.
But the other immortal gods made their way to Olympos, some enraged, some greatly exultant, and took their seats in the house of the lord of the dark clouds. Now Achilles 520 was still slaughtering Trojans and their whole-hoofed horses; and as smoke goes up and reaches the broad heavens from a burning town, fanned on by the wrath of the gods, causing hard work for all and suffering for many,

 so Achilles brought hard work and suffering to the Trojans. 525

Old Priam was standing out on the god-built rampart, and watching huge Achilles, and the way that before him the Trojans scattered in headlong flight, without resistance.
 He groaned, and went down from the ramparts to ground level, instructing his trusty gatekeepers along the wall: 530 “Hold the gates wide open until our routed troops can make their way into the city—Achilles is right behind them, driving them on, I think disaster’s upon us!
 So the moment they’re inside the wall, still breathing hard, then slam shut the close-fitting gates, for I greatly fear 535 that calamitous warrior may rush in beyond the ramparts.”

So he spoke: they undid the fastenings, shot back the bars, and the gates were flung wide, brought deliverance, while Apollo sprang out to meet the rush, fend off ruin from the Trojans, who were fleeing straight for the city and its lofty ramparts, 540 parched with thirst and covered with dust from the plain, in rout, while Achilles herded them savagely with his spear, heart ever ruled by madness, ardent to harvest glory.

Then would the Achaians’ sons have taken high-gated Troy, had Phoibos Apollo not stirred up noble Agēnōr, 545 Antēnōr’s son, a warrior of unmatched power:
 in his heart he put boldness, and himself stood by him, ready to fend off from him the heavy hands of death:³ against the oak tree he leaned, enshrouded in thick mist.
 When Agēnōr caught sight of Achilles, the sacker of cities, 550 he stood still, and much his heart brooded on while waiting,
 and deeply stirred he addressed his own proud spirit: “Ah, me! If faced with mighty Achilles I should now retreat to where all the others are being driven in rout, even so he’d still catch me and slit my throat as a coward. 555

3. One MS and one ancient commentator read not “hands” (χείρας, cheiras) here but “[death]-spirits” (κῆρας, kēras). Like Leaf and Richardson (99), but unlike Monro and Allen, Lattimore, and some other translators), I prefer χείρας. The phrase is striking, and hands are more likely than spirits to carry weight, whether physically or metaphorically.

But suppose I leave these men to be chased and herded by Pēleus's son Achilles, and run from the wall in a different direction, towards the Ilian plain, until I reach the foothills of Ida, and take refuge in their thickets?
 Then, when evening came, I'd wash myself in the river, 560 clean off the sweat, and make my way back to Ilion.
 But why is my heart debating such matters with me?
 he might spot me taking off from the city towards the plain,
 and, being swift-footed, pursue and overtake me.
 No chance then of my avoiding death and the death-spirits, 565 so strong he is, far stronger than all other mortal men.
 But suppose that I go to confront him before the city?
 His flesh, too, can be pierced by the keen-edged bronze, and there's only one life in him—men say he's mortal—however much Zeus son of Kronos endows him with glory." 570

That said, he crouched awaiting Achilles, and in him his courageous heart was eager for warfare and battle.
 As a leopard will sally forth from the deepest thicket to confront a hunter, nor does her courage fail her, nor does she panic on hearing the baying of hounds, 575 for though the hunter may spear her or shoot her first, yet she'll still not abandon her prowess, even when spitted on the spear, till she either grapples with him or is slain—so the son of lordly Antēnōr, noble Agēnōr, would not retreat till he had made trial of Achilles, 580 but holding before him his trimly balanced shield, and pointing his spear at Achilles, now shouted aloud:
 "I'm sure you hoped in your heart, illustrious Achilles, that on this day you'd sack the proud Trojans' citadel—you fool! Much sorrow's to come still in the matter of Troy, 585 since within her we, her warriors, are many and strong, who, protecting our beloved parents and wives and sons, stand guard over Ilion. It is you who will meet your end here, however fearsome and daring a warrior you may be."

With that he let fly the sharp spear from his massive hand, 590 and did not miss, but hit Achilles' shin under his knee, and the greave of fresh-wrought tin that was fastened round it rang fearsomely when struck; but the bronze rebounded and did not pierce through, for the god's gift held it back.

Then Pēleus's son in his turn went at godlike Agēnōr, 595 but Apollo did not allow him to gain fresh glory:
 he snatched Agēnōr away, enshrouding him in thick mist, and sent him off quietly to take himself out of the fighting; but Pēleus's son by a trick was kept well clear of the troops by the deadly archer—assuming Agēnōr's exact likeness 600 he stood close in front of Achilles. Achilles rushed after him, and during the chase across the wheat-rich plain Apollo nudged him towards the river, deep-eddying Skamandros, while keeping a little ahead, tricked Achilles into thinking he was always just on the point of catching up with his quarry. 605 Meanwhile the rest of the Trojans, a routed mass, were happy to get to Troy, and the city was overflowing with them.
 They no longer dared to wait outside the city ramparts for one another, to learn which warriors had escaped and who had died fighting: instead they hurriedly crowded back 610 into the city, each one whose feet and knees could save him.

Book 22

So these throughout the city, after fleeing like fawns, were cooling their sweat and drinking and slaking their thirst, leaning against the fine battlements, while the Achaians advanced right up to the ramparts, shields resting on their shoulders.¹ But Hektōr's fatal destiny constrained him to remain 5 where he was, outside Ilion and the Skaian Gates.

Now to the son of Pēleus Phoibos Apollo spoke: “Why, son of Pēleus, are you scampering after me when you're a mortal, while I'm an immortal god? You've still not recognized me for a god, so ceaselessly do you rage! 10 Aren't you concerned to deal with the Trojans you've routed—who crowded into the city while you wandered off out here?
You'll never kill me: it's not in my destiny to die.”

Deeply incensed, swift-footed Achilles responded: “You've fooled me, deadly archer, of all gods the most lethal, 15 by diverting me here from the wall: else many more men would have bitten the dust before they ever reached Ilion!
Of great glory now you've robbed me, while these you've saved—an easy task, with no fear of retribution to come, though had I the power, I'd certainly be revenged on you.” 20

So saying he took off towards the city with high resolve, dashing along like some prize-winning chariot horse, one that easily gallops at full stretch across the plain—so speedily now did he exert his feet and knees.

The aged Priam was first to set eyes upon Achilles 25 as he swept on across the plain, agleam like the star that rises at harvest time, and brightly its rays shine out among the myriad stars in the darkness of night,

1. Apparently a reference to advancing under the cover of a shield held horizontally over one's shoulders, to protect against missiles from the walls of a besieged city: a practice better known from Rome, where legionaries locked shields together in this way and advanced collectively: a protection known, aptly, as the “tortoiseshell” (testudo), which, seen from above, it must indeed have resembled.

and men call it the Dog of Orīōn, the brightest star of all;
 yet nevertheless it's a warning of trouble to come, 30 and brings with it much fever to wretched mankind:
 so gleamed the bronze on Achilles' breast as he ran.
 Priam now groaned aloud, beat his head with his hands, lifting them high, and cried out in his distress, entreating his own son, who was standing outside 35
 the gates, dead set on battling it out with Achilles:
 to him the old man spoke pitiably, stretching out his arms:
 "Hektōr, dear child, for my sake don't stay there and face that man, alone, without backup: too soon you'd meet your fate, laid low by Pēleus's son, since he's by far the stronger, 40 and pitiless—how I wish he were as dear to the gods as he is to me! Soon, then, would dogs and vultures devour him as he lay there, and sore grief would vacate my spirit over one who's deprived me of many valiant sons by killing or shipping them off to far distant islands. 45
 Even now two sons of mine, Lykaōn and Polydōros, I can't see among those Trojans penned up in the city—sons that Laothoē bore me, that queen among women.
 If they're alive, in the enemy camp, then for certain we'll pay ransom with gold and bronze—there's plenty stored here, 50 all the gifts that far-famed old Altēs bestowed with his daughter.
 But if they're already dead, and down in Hādēs' realm, then there's grief for myself and for the mother who bore them!
 For others the pain will be briefer, so long as you too don't die now, slain by Achilles! So, my dear child, 55 come back here, inside the walls! Do that, and you'll save the Trojans and Trojan women—while denying great glory to Pēleus's son—and not lose your own dear life. Besides, pity me, the unhappy one, while I'm still alive—an ill-fated wretch, whom the Father, Kronos's son, will slay, 60 in a hard death, when I'm old, after seeing many horrors:
 my sons destroyed, my daughters forcibly taken, their chambers ransacked, and their infant children dashed to the ground, in warfare's savage conflict, my sons' wives dragged off as booty by cruel Achaian hands! 65 Myself last of all my dogs, by my own front doorway, will tear and eat raw, when some man with the sharp bronze—stabbing or shooting—has parted the spirit from my limbs:

dogs that I reared at my table, trained to guard my home, and now, turned wild by the drinking of my blood, 70 will lie out there in the forecourt. For a young man killed in battle it's seemly to lie dead, cut about by the sharp bronze:
 nothing, even in death, that's visible is repugnant.
 But when it's a slaughtered greybeard's grey head and private parts that dogs are shamefully worrying—that has to be 75 the most piteous thing that can happen to wretched mortals.”

So spoke the old man, and with his hands tore and plucked the grey hairs from his head, yet could not shift Hektōr's will;
 and his mother in turn lamented, shedding tears, opened her dress with one hand, in the other held out her breast, 80 as, weeping, she addressed him, speaking with winged words: “Hektōr, child, show this respect, have pity for me, if ever I gave you the breast to make you forget your pain!
 Think on these things, dear child, fend off this deadly man from inside our ramparts—don't face him alone out there, 85 an obstinate champion: if he kills you, I shall never mourn you laid on a bier, dear sprig that I, myself, bore, nor will your cherished wife: no, far, far from both of us beside the ships of the Argives brisk dogs will devour you.”

So the two of them, weeping, called upon their dear son, 90 with heartfelt entreaties, yet could not shift Hektōr's will, who stood firm while huge Achilles advanced towards him.
 As a mountain snake awaits a man beside its hole, well fed on poisonous herbs,² flush with bitter distemper, glaring terribly as it uncoils itself from its lair, 95 so Hektōr, his might unquenchable, would not give ground but stood, bright shield propped against a jutting bastion;
 and deeply stirred he addressed his own proud spirit:
 “Ah me! If I now retreat within the gates and the ramparts, Poulydamas will be first to heap reproaches on me, 100 having urged me to lead the Trojans into the city during this last cursed night, when noble Achilles took action.
 I would not obey him then—much better had I done so!

2. Snakes were apparently believed to derive their poison directly from the food they ate: Ael. NA 6.4, cf. Richardson 116. Pliny (HN 8.139) claims that they have no venom during hibernation, which, Richardson plausibly suggests, implies the same assumption.

Now, through my reckless folly I've ruined my own people, and feel shame before the Trojans and their long-robed women, 105 lest maybe some other fellow, baser than me, may say:
 'Hektôr destroyed his people through trust in his own might.'
 So they will say; for me far better to meet Achilles face to face, and return home only should I kill him, or else myself to die gloriously out in front of the city. 110
 But supposing I lay aside my embossed shield, and my weighty helmet, prop my spear up against the wall, and go out alone to meet with peerless Achilles, guarantee him that Helen, and with her all the possessions, every last item Aléxandros in his hollow ships 115 carried off Troywards—which was how this quarrel started—we'll return to the sons of Atreus to take home, and moreover will share out with the Achaïans all the goods this city contains;
 and I then have the Trojan elders swear me an oath that they'll hide nothing, will divide up all the treasure 120 that this elegant citadel contains within its walls—
 But why is my dear heart debating these matters?
 Heaven forbid I approach him as suppliant, he'll not pity or show me respect, but slaughter me when I'm unweaponed and out of my armor, as though I were some defenseless woman. 125 There's no way now, from oak tree or from rock,³ to sweet-talk him, oh, like a girl and her young man—a girl and her young man!—flirting with one another: better to meet and fight him as soon as I can—Let's learn to whom the Olympian will grant glory." 130 Thus he pondered, waiting, while Achilles approached him—the equal of Enyalios, that bright-helmed warrior!— above his right shoulder wielding his spear of Pêlian ash, so fearsome, while all about him the bronze now glinted like blazing fire or the rays of the rising sun. 135
 As Hektôr looked, trembling seized him, he no longer dared

3. If this was originally a proverbial phrase, its exact meaning has been lost: the scholia (Willcock 242–43) claim it had to do “with old stories about the origins of man.” Yet, as Richardson says (120) “to a modern reader the phrase conjures up a pastoral scene”, appropriate to the flirtation that follows, and (as so often with Homer) almost unbearably moving because of the grim context in which it is set. Willcock is right: “Hektor’s mind reverts to peacetime and the long private conversations of young lovers.”

to stand firm: the gates left behind him, he fled in terror, and Pēleus's son went after him, trusting his fleetness of foot.
 As up in the mountains a hawk, the fastest of winged creatures, swoops effortlessly in pursuit of a timorous dove: 140 she seeks to escape him, but he, screaming shrilly, and close, keeps swooping at her, heart driving him on to kill—so Achilles raged straight after Hektōr, who ran for his life beneath the wall of the Trojans, knees pumping, going flat out.
 Past the lookout post and the windswept fig tree they sped, 145 away from under the wall, and along the wagon track, to the two full-flowing springs, where gush up both the sources that feed the waters of eddying Skamandros.
 The one flows with warm water, and from it smoke goes up as though from a blazing fire, while the other, 150 even in summer, still flows as chilly as hail, or freezing snow, or the ice that crystallizes from water.
 There, close to these springs, are spacious washing tanks, fine and stone-built, where the wives and lovely daughters of the Trojans would formerly wash their glistening garments 155 in the days of peace, before the Achaians' sons arrived.
 Past these they ran, one in flight, the other hot on his heels: ahead, a fine warrior fleeing, a far better one in speedy pursuit—and neither for bull's hide nor for sacrificial beast were these now competing, a footrace's usual prizes: 160 the two of them were now running for horse-taming Hektōr's life.
 As prize-winning whole-hoofed horses gallop lightly around the turning-points of a racetrack, where some great prize is displayed—a tripod or woman, to honor a warrior slain—so these two, quick-footed, thrice circled Priam's city, 165 with all the gods watching them, amongst whom the first to express his thoughts was the Father of men and gods:
 "Alas, it's indeed a well-loved man that I see now being chased round the city's walls: my heart is sore grieved for Hektōr, who's burnt in my honor many thighs of oxen 170 on the heights of many-ridged Ida, and at other times on the lofty citadel; but now here's noble Achilles pursuing him on swift feet round and round Priam's city!
 So, gods, consider this matter, give me your opinion—shall we save him from death, or let him be laid low, 175 fine man though he is, at the hands of Achilles, Pēleus's son?"

Then the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē, answered him thus:
 “Father, lord of bright bolt and black cloud, what’s this you’re saying?
 Here’s a man, a mortal, his fate long since determined—
 Do you mean to reverse that, release him from woeful death? 180
 Well, do it; but know this: we other gods don’t all approve.”

 Replying to her then, Zeus the cloud-gatherer said: “Cheer up Trītogéneia, dear child: the things I just said were not meant seriously, and to you I’m kindly disposed.
 Act as your mind dictates, hold back no longer.” 185

 So saying he urged on Athēnē—already eager to go—
 and down she darted from the heights of Olympos.

 But swift Achilles kept on in relentless pursuit of Hektōr.
 As up in the mountains a dog will go after a hind’s fawn, starting it from its covert, chase it through glens and dells; 190 and though it may hide for a time, crouching low in a thicket, that dog will still track it down, running steadily, till it’s found—so Hektōr could not shake off swift-footed Achilles:
 whenever he made a rush for the Dardanian gates, and tried to slip in past the strongly built bastions, 195 hoping that those on the walls would cover him with their missiles, each time in anticipation Achilles would head him off, nudge him back to the plain, while himself pressing on by the city wall.
 As in a dream one can’t overtake the quarry one’s chasing—the fugitive can’t escape, nor his pursuer catch him— 200 so Achilles could not catch up, nor Hektōr get clear away.
 How could Hektōr then have eluded the death-spirits, had Apollo not come to his aid, for the last, the final time, standing close, to arouse his strength, put speed in his knees?
 To his troops, too, noble Achilles, with a shake of the head, 205 signaled they shouldn’t let fly their bitter shafts at Hektōr—a good shot might win the glory, leave himself as an also-ran!
 But when for the fourth time they came round to the springs, then Zeus, the Father, held up his golden balance and on it set two dooms of grief-laden death, 210
 one for Achilles, the other for horse-taming Hektōr.
 By the middle he grasped and raised it: Hektōr’s fated day sank, pointing down to Hādēs, and Phoibos Apollo left him.

To Pēleus's son now came the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē, stood at his side, and addressed him in winged words: 215
 "Now indeed I'm sure, Achilles, illustrious favorite of Zeus, we two will bring back to the ships great glory for the Achaians by killing Hektōr, great glutton for combat though he is!
 No longer can he escape us, not even were it to be that Apollo the deadly archer should suffer humiliation 220 by groveling on his behalf before Zeus of the aegis!
 So stay here, and get your breath back, while I myself go to Hektōr, and talk him into fighting you man to man."

So spoke Athēnē: he obeyed, and was glad at heart, and stood there, leaning upon his bronze-barbed ash-wood spear. 225 Athēnē now left him, and went over to noble Hektōr, in appearance and speaking voice resembling Deïphobos.
 She came up close, and addressed him with winged words, saying:
 "Honored brother, swift Achilles is pressing you really hard with this pursuit on foot all round Priam's city—so come, 230 let's make a stand, hold fast here and defend ourselves!"

Then great bright-helmeted Hektōr made her this answer:
 "Deïphobos, in the past you've been far the dearest to me of all my brothers, those born to Hekabē and Priam; and now I'm minded to do you yet greater honor, 235 since you dared, for my sake, when you saw me, to come out beyond the ramparts, while all the others are staying inside."

To him then replied the goddess, grey-eyed Athēnē:
 "Honored brother, indeed my father and lady mother begged and implored me in turn, as did my comrades, 240 to stay back, so greatly do all of them fear Achilles;
 but the heart within me was worn down by bitter grief.
 Now let's both attack him head-on, let us fight it out with no sparing of spears, and discover whether Achilles will kill us both, and carry our bloodstained armor back 245 to the hollow ships—or rather fall victim to your spear." Speaking thus, with her cunning Athēnē led him on.

When the warriors came within close range of one another, the first to speak was great bright-helmeted Hektōr:
 "No longer, son of Pēleus, will I run from you, as before, 250 when thrice around Priam's great city I fled, and never dared to await your attack! No, this time my heart tells me

I must stand and confront you, whether to slay or be slain.
So come, let's swear oaths by the gods, for they are the best witnesses and protectors of our agreements: 255

I'll not mistreat you vilely, should it be that Zeus grant me the endurance to win, and I deprive you of life;
but when I've stripped off your famous armor, Achilles, I'll return your corpse to the Achaians—or you likewise mine.”

To him, with an angry glance, swift-footed Achilles replied: 260 “Hektōr, don't, damn you, make me speeches about agreements!
Between lions and men binding oaths do not exist, nor are wolves and lambs ever like-minded at heart but ceaselessly plotting trouble, each against the other.
So there's no way for us to be friends, we can't exchange 265 sworn oaths: no, before that one or the other must fall, and glut Arēs, the oxhide-shield combatant, with his blood.
So summon up all your valor: you're going to need to be both spearman and doughty combatant. There's no longer any escape left for you—very soon will Pallas Athēnē 270 lay you low through my spear. Now you'll pay the full price for the loss of my comrades, speared in your wild attack.”

With that he poised and let fly his far-shadowing spear, but illustrious Hektōr, watching carefully, dodged it, crouching down, and the bronze spear flew over him, 275 fixed itself in the ground; but Athēnē snatched it up, gave it back to Achilles, unseen by Hektōr, the people's shepherd, and Hektōr now exclaimed to the peerless son of Pēleus:
“You missed! And you haven't, it seems, O godlike Achilles, yet found out my fate from Zeus, despite what you supposed! 280 Turns out you're just a glib talker, a tricky wordsmith, aiming to scare me, make me forget all my strength and valor!
Now it won't be my fugitive back that you plant your spear in, you'll have to aim for my breast as I charge you—if indeed some god grants you that much! Your turn now to avoid 285 my bronze spear—may you catch the whole of it in your flesh!
The war would certainty be much easier for the Trojans once you were dead, for you are their greatest trouble.”

With that he poised and let fly his far-shadowing spear, struck Pēleus's son's shield in the middle, didn't miss it. 290 Yet the spear bounced back off the shield, left Hektōr enraged because the swift missile had flown in vain from his hand.
 He stood there downcast, and, having no second ash-wood spear, called out, in a carrying voice, to white-shielded Deïphobos, demanding a lance; but he was nowhere near at hand. 295
 Then Hektōr knew the truth in his heart, and exclaimed:
 "Alas! The gods have indeed now summoned me to my death!
 I thought the hero Deïphobos was here by my side, but he's inside the wall—it's Athēnē who's been here deceiving me!
 A vile death now awaits me—no longer distant, but close, 300 and no escape: this must always have been what Zeus was after, he and his son, the deadly archer: at one time they were glad to protect me; but now my fate has caught up with me.
 So let me die—not ingloriously, or without a struggle, but having done some great deed for those unborn to learn of." 305 So saying, he drew from its scabbard the keen-edged sword that hung at his side, a huge and solid weapon, collected himself, and charged, like a high-flying eagle that swoops down plainward, plummeting through dark clouds to snatch up in its claws a young lamb or a cowering hare: 310 so Hektōr charged, his sharp sword flashing high, and Achilles rushed at him, heart full of wildly raging strength, with his shield—fine, intricately wrought—out in front to protect his body, while the bright helmet, four-plated, nodded above, and, waving all round it, 315
 the lovely gold plumes that Hēphaistos had set thick about its crown.
 Like that star that goes among other stars at nightfall, the star of evening, the loveliest star in the heavens, was the gleam that shone from the sharp spear that Achilles brandished in his right hand, planning trouble for noble Hektōr, 320 studying his sweet flesh to see where it might best yield.
 Now all the rest of his body had its bronze battle gear, the fine armor he'd stripped from Patroklos after his killing, but one spot showed, where the collarbones held apart shoulders from neck—the gullet, where life's most quickly ended. 325 Here, as Hektōr charged, was where noble Achilles speared him:
 clean through his tender neck drove the spear point, and yet the bronze-laden ash-wood spear never severed the windpipe, so he could still frame words, could make a response when down in the dust, with Achilles exulting above him: 330 “Hektōr, you doubtless thought, while stripping Patroklos, you’d be safe—I was elsewhere, to me you gave not a thought.

 You fool! His distant avenger, stronger by far, was left behind by the hollow ships: that was I, who have now unstrung your limbs! You the dogs and birds of prey 335 will tear apart vilely, while he will get burial from the Achaians.”

To him bright-helmeted Hektōr faintly replied: “By your life I implore you, by your knees, by your parents, do not let the dogs make a meal of me beside the Achaians’ ships!
 Rather take the bronze and gold, unstinted, that my father 340 and lady mother will give you, and return my body to be conveyed to my home, in order that the Trojans and Trojan wives may give me my share of fire in death.”

Then with an angry glance swift-footed Achilles said:
 “Don’t entreat me, you dog, by my knees or by my parents! 345
 I just wish there was a way for my raging heart to let me carve your flesh raw and eat it, in return for what you’ve done, as surely as there’s no man who’ll keep the dogs from your head, not though they bring here and weigh out ten or twenty times a fair ransom, and promise even more; 350 not even if they were ordered to pay me your weight in gold by Priam, Dardanos’s son: not even so will your lady mother lay you, the son she bore, on a bier and mourn you: no, dogs and birds will eat every last scrap of you.”

Then, dying, bright-helmeted Hektōr said to him: 355 “I know you too well, I foresee my fate: I could never persuade you. Truly the heart in your breast is of iron.
 Think on this, then: it may be I who provoke the gods’ wrath against you, that day when Paris and Phoibos Apollo kill you, for all your valor, before the Skaian Gates.” 360

When he’d spoken thus, death’s end enshrouded him, and the soul fled from his limbs, fluttered down to Hādēs, bewailing its fate, youth and manhood all abandoned.
 Yet noble Achilles still harangued him, even when dead:
 “Lie there, corpse! My own fate I’ll accept whenever 365 Zeus may determine it—he, and the other immortal gods.”

With that he tore out his bronze spear from the body, and laid it aside, and began to strip from Hektōr's shoulders his bloodstained armor. The other sons of the Achaians ran up round him, gazed at the build and amazing beauty 370 of Hektōr—yet not one failed to stab him as he stood there, and turning, would say to his neighbor as he did so: “Well, it's a great deal easier to deal with Hektōr now than when he burned up our vessels with blazing fire.”
 Thus a man would speak—then step up and stab the corpse. 375
 But swift-footed noble Achilles, after stripping him, stood up among the Achaians, and then addressed them in winged words: “My friends, you rulers and leaders of the Argives, since the gods have granted that we bring this man down who's done us more harm than all others put together, 380 come, let's now make trial in arms around the city, and so more clearly learn what the Trojans have in mind—will they leave their high citadel now this man is fallen, or hold out regardless, even though Hektōr is no more?
 But why is my heart debating such matters with me? 385
 There lies by the ships a corpse unwept, unburied—Patroklos! Him I'll never forget, while I'm still among the living, my limbs still quick and active!
 And though men forget the dead in the realm of Hādēs, yet even there I'll remember my dear comrade. 390 Come then, you young Achaians, chanting our victory paean let's go back to the hollow ships, take this fellow with us!
 We've achieved great glory: we've slain noble Hektōr, to whom the Trojans throughout their city prayed as to a god.”
 With that he devised vile treatment for noble Hektōr: 395 in both feet behind he pierced holes along the tendons from heel to ankle, and through them then strung oxhide straps that he tied to his chariot, leaving the head to be dragged.
 Then he mounted, taking the famous battle gear with him, and whipped up his horses. They, nothing loath, took flight, 400 and from the dragged body the dust rose up: on either side its dark hair was spread out, and all in the dust there lay the head that was once so handsome: now to his foes Zeus gave Hektōr for outrage on his own native soil.

So all his head was befouled with dust, and his mother tore at her hair, flung her glimmering veil far from her, and screamed out loud when she set eyes on her son, while his father groaned piteously, and the folk around them set up a great wailing and weeping throughout the city.
 This was what it was most like: as though all towering Ilion, top to bottom, were left smoldering with fire; and the people could barely restrain the old man, in his frenzy to break free and rush out through the Dardanian gates:
 he kept begging them all as he rolled about in the filth, calling out names, appealing to each man in turn: “Hold off, friends! If you care for me, leave me alone, to make my way out of the city, to the ships of the Achaians, where I’ll plead with that man—so violent, so ungoverned in act—if he’s any respect for my years, any pity for my old age!
 He too has a father, a man, surely, much as I am—Pēleus—who sired him and brought him up to work disaster upon the Trojans; me above all he’s saddened, so many the flourishing sons of mine he’s slaughtered!
 Yet for all these I mourn not so much, despite my sorrow, as for one, grief over whom will consign me to Hādēs’ realm—Hektōr! Ah, how I wish he’d died in my arms, for then we’d at least have had our fill of wailing and shedding of tears, the ill-fated mother who bore him, and I, myself.”

So he spoke,
 weeping: the citizens added their lamentation to his,
 and among the Trojan women it was Hekabē led the keening: “Ah, child, wretched me! How I’ve suffered! Why live on now you’re dead? For me, by day, by night, you were my pride and boast through the city, a comfort to all, both the men and the women of Troy, who would salute you like a god; for indeed to them you embodied great glory while you lived—but now death and your destiny have caught you.”

So she spoke, weeping. But Hektōr’s wife as yet knew nothing, for no honest messenger had so far arrived with the news that her husband had stayed on outside the gates.
 She was at her loom in a back room of their high house, weaving a red double cloak, with figured patterns on it.

Now she called out through the house to her neat-tressed handmaids to set on the fire a great cauldron, make sure that there was a hot bath for Hektōr when he came home from the fighting—unaware, in her folly, that far from all baths he'd been 445 slain, through Achilles' hands, by grey-eyed Pallas Athēnē; but then she heard screams and wailing from the wall, and her limbs trembled, the shuttle dropped from her hand, and once more she spoke among her neat-tressed handmaids:
 "Two of you come and attend me, while I see what's happened— 450
 It was my husband's revered mother whose voice I heard, and in my own breast the heart leaps into my mouth, my knees are paralyzed: some disaster's at hand for Priam's children!
 May my ears never hear such tidings! Yet I'm sore afraid that noble Achilles may have cut off daring Hektōr 455 alone, and have driven him from the city out to the plain, and by now may have put an end to the dangerous courage that always possessed him—he'd never stay back in the ranks, but always would charge out ahead, yield to none in his might."

 So saying, she rushed through the hall like a crazy woman, 460 heart beating wildly, accompanied by her handmaids.
 But when she reached the crowd of men at the ramparts she stood on the wall, and looked round, and then perceived him being dragged in front of the city: the galloping horses were ruthlessly hauling him off to the Achaians' hollow ships. 465 Then down came black night on her eyes, enshrouding them, and she sank backward, gasping out her vital breath, and far from her head she flung the shining headbands, the diadem, the hairnet, the plaited clasp, and lastly the veil that had been a present from golden Aphroditē, 470 on the day that bright-helmeted Hektōr led her out as his bride from Ēētiōn's house, after bringing bride-gifts past counting; and round her thronged Hektōr's sisters and his brothers' wives, who held her between them, in shock to the verge of death.
 But when she recovered, and the spirit returned to her breast, 475 then, between heaving sobs, she cried out before Troy's women:
 "Hektōr, how wretched I am! To one fate, then, we were born, both of us—you here in Troy, in the house of Priam, and I in Thēbē, down there under wooded Plakos, im the house of Ēētiōn, who brought me up from a baby— 480 luckless father, doomed child! Better he'd never had me!

 Now you're going to the realm of Hādēs, deep under the earth, but me you're abandoning to my hateful grief, a widow left in your halls! Our son's still an infant, the child you and I, so unlucky, created: you'll never, 485 now you're dead, be a help to him, Hektōr, nor he to you, since even should he survive the Achaians' baleful war for ever thereafter toil and sorrow will be his lot, since others will set their boundary stones on his land.
 The day an orphan is made cuts him off from his age group: 490 he goes with head downcast, tears moisten his cheeks.
 A needy child, he approaches his father's comrades, tugs at the cloak of one, the tunic of another.
 Some will pity him, briefly. One holds out his cup—long enough to wet his lips, yet not his palate. Then one 495 with both parents alive will kick him out of the feast, punching him up, and reviling him in harsh terms:
 'Out of here, quick! You've no father feasting with us.'
 Then the child runs back weeping to his widowed mother—he, Astyanax, who before, on his father's knee, 500 would eat nothing but marrow and the rich fat of sheep, and when sleep came on him, and he stopped his childish play, would sleep in a bed in the arms of his own nurse—in his own soft cot, his heart replete with good cheer. But now he may suffer much, being bereft of his dear father, 505 my Astyanax, 'lord of the city', whom the Trojans speak of thus since you alone, Hektōr, preserved their gates and their lofty walls.
 But now beside the curved ships, and far from your parents, coiling worms will devour you when the dogs have had their fill of your nakedness, while your bedclothes lie unused in your halls— 510 fine, closely woven, well-fashioned by women's hands.
 But all these things now I'll burn to ashes in blazing fire—they're no longer of use to you, you'll never lie on them—in honor of you, from the Trojans and from the women of Troy."
 So she spoke, weeping, and the women lamented with her. 515

Book 23

So these were mourning throughout the city; but the Achaians, when they all had made their way back to the ships and the Hellespont, now scattered, the rest of them, each man to his own vessel:
but Achilles would not permit the Myrmidons to disperse, and among his war-minded comrades thus he spoke up: 5 “Myrmidons! Lords of swift horses, most loyal of comrades, let’s not yet unyoke our whole-hoofed steeds from their chariots, but with horses and chariots let us now drive close to Patroklos, and mourn him: this is a dead man’s privilege.

Then, when we’ve had our fill of painful lamentation, 10
We’ll unyoke our horses and all take our evening meal together.”

So he spoke: they all cried out as one, and Achilles led them:
three times round the corpse they drove their fine-maned steeds, weeping, while Thetis stirred in them an urge for lamentation.
Damp with tears was the sand, and damp the men’s battle gear, 15 such a maker of rout was he whose loss they mourned.

The son of Pēleus now led them in their heartfelt lamentation,
laying his murderous hands upon his comrade’s breast: “Greetings, Patroklos, even in Hādēs’ realm: for now all I promised you earlier I’m bringing to fulfillment— 20 that I’d drag Hektōr here, give him raw to the dogs to rend, and in front of your pyre would cut the throats of a dozen noble Trojan youths, so enraged I was at your killing.”

With that he devised vile treatment for noble Hektōr, stretching him out face down by Menoitios’s son’s bier, 25 there in the dust; each man took off his arms and armor of gleaming bronze, unyoked his neighing horses. Then they sat down beside the ship of Aiakos’s swift-footed grandson in their thousands; he gave them a heart-warming funeral feast.
Many sleek oxen now struggled around the iron knife 30 while being slaughtered, many sheep and bleating goats;
and many a white-tusked hog, bulked up with lard, was stretched out there to be singed in Hēphaistos’s flame, and around the corpse blood ran thick, by the cupful.

The swift-footed lord, son of Pēleus, was now escorted 35 to noble Agamemnōn by the Achaians' princes—although they'd barely convinced him, so incensed he was for his comrade.
 But when their procession arrived at Agamemnōn's hut, they issued instructions at once to the clear-voiced heralds to set on the fire a great cauldron, hoping they'd persuade 40 Pēleus's son to wash himself clean of the clotted gore.
 But he adamantly refused them, and swore an oath besides:
 "No, by Zeus, who's the highest and best of all the gods, it isn't right that water should come anywhere near my head till I've burned Patroklos's body, and raised him a burial mound, 45 and have cut my hair—since never again will such grief possess my heart, while I'm numbered among the living!
 For now, then, feast if we must, though the thought revolts me;
 but tomorrow at dawn, Agamemnōn, you lord of men, have the troops forage for firewood, make ready all that's proper 50 for the dead man to have when he goes down into darkness:
 so the unwearying fire may burn him away, may quickly remove him from our sight, and the troops return to their work."

 So he spoke, and they listened attentively, did as he asked.
 Each man quickly made ready his evening meal, and then 55
 they feasted, and no one's heart lacked a fair share in the feasting.
 But when they had satisfied their desire for food and drink, they went, each to his own hut, to get their rest;
 but Pēleus's son lay on the shoreline of the thunderous sea, heavily sighing, with all his Myrmidons around him, 60 in a clear space, where the combers came crashing on the beach.
 But when sleep laid hold of him, soothing the cares of his heart, sweetly descending—since his bright limbs were exhausted from harrying Hektōr as far as windy Ilion—then there came to him the spirit of unhappy Patroklos, 65 like his live self in all aspects—his stature, his fine eyes, his voice; and even the clothes he had on were the same.
 He stood over Achilles' head and addressed these words to him:
 "You sleep, and you've proved forgetful of me, Achilles.
 While I lived you didn't neglect me—now I'm dead you do! 70
 Bury me with all speed, let me pass through Hādēs' gates—
 The spirits, the shades of the dead, are keeping me out, won't let me cross the river to mingle with them, so here

I uselessly wander outside Hādēs' wide-gated realm.
 And give me your hand, I beseech you, for never again 75 will I come back from Hādēs, once you give me my share of fire.
 Nevermore, as in life, will we sit apart from our comrades making plans together: the dread death-spirit assigned me from birth has now opened her jaws to swallow me down!
 And for you too your lot is destined, godlike Achilles— 80 to perish beneath the ramparts of the noble Trojans.
 One more thing I'll say, and ask of you, if you'll agree:
 Don't have my bones interred apart from yours, Achilles, but together, the way we were both brought up in your house after Menoitios brought me, a child still, from Opoeis 85 to your home, because of that wretched manslaughter business, the day that I lost my temper and killed Amphi-damas's son, through childish folly, not meaning to, over a game of dice, and then Pēleus the horseman took me into his own house, and brought me up caringly, and named me to be your squire. 90
 So have the same vessel enclose our bones together—golden, two-handled, the one your lady mother gave you."

 In answer to him swift-footed Achilles then said:
 "Why, dearest comrade, have you come here to me thus?
 Why all these detailed instructions? Of course I shall make sure 95 that everything's done, and exactly as you want it.
 Come closer, I beg you: if only for a brief moment let's embrace, and get our full measure of painful lamentation."

 So saying, he reached out to him with his hands, but failed to clasp him: Patroklos's spirit disappeared like smoke 100 beneath the earth, crying thinly. Achilles, stunned, sprang up, clapped both hands together, and said, sadly wondering:
 "Well, so there really is something, even in Hādēs' realm—a spirit, a phantom—though with nothing substantial to it; for all night long the spirit of poor Patroklos 105 stood over me, weeping and wailing, making requests for all he wanted done—looking marvelously like his living self."

 So he spoke, and stirred in them all the urge for lamentation, and Dawn, the rosy-fingered, revealed them weeping still around the piteous corpse. Now the lord Agamemnōn 110 sent out mules and men from all the huts in camp to bring back firewood: they had a fine warrior in charge—Mērionēs, who was squire to kindly Idomeneus.

 Off they went, hands clutching axes for felling timber and well-braided ropes, with the mules going ahead of them: 115 back and forth, uphill and down they went, across and aslant—and when they reached the spurs of spring-rich Ida, at once they briskly set to, began felling tall leafy oaks with the keen-edged bronze, and a mighty crash they made on falling, after which the Achaians split them apart 120 and hitched them behind the mules. These churned up the earth with their feet, straining plainwards through the thick undergrowth.
 The woodcutters all carried logs, having been so ordered by Mērionēs, the squire of kindly Idomeneus: on the shore in a row they stacked them, at the point where Achilles 125 was planning a great burial mound for Patroklos and himself.

When they'd amassed great piles of timber all around they sat down in a group and waited. Then Achilles promptly issued his orders to the war-loving Myrmidons to gird on their bronze gear, and for each man to yoke his horses 130 to their chariot. Up they all got, and donned their equipment, then mounted their chariots, both warriors and drivers.
 The chariot teams went ahead; a cloud of infantry followed, thousands strong: in their midst his comrades bore Patroklos, his body clothed with the hair they'd cut off and laid upon it. 135 Behind them noble Achilles in sorrow cradled the head of the peerless comrade he now was sending to Hādēs' realm.

When they came to the place that Achilles had indicated they laid down the body, and quickly stacked wood in plenty for it.
 Then swift-footed noble Achilles thought of something else: 140 standing away from the pyre he cut a lock of his fair hair that he'd let grow long to offer to the river Spercheios; and said, deeply troubled, looking out at the wine-faced deep:
 "Spercheios, all in vain did my father Pēleus assure you that when I came back home to my native land, for you 145 I'd cut off my hair and make a fine sacred offering—fifty ungilded rams I'd sacrifice on the spot into your waters, beside your precinct and fragrant altar.
 Such the old man's vow, but you failed to fulfill his purpose.

Now, since I'll not be returning, ever, to my own country, 150 let me give this lock to the hero Patroklos, to take with him."

So saying, in the hands of his dear comrade he placed the lock, and thus stirred in them all the urge for mourning; and indeed the sun's light would have set on their sorrow, had not Achilles at once approached Agamemnōn, saying: 155
"Son of Atreus—since it's your word that the Achaian troops will most readily obey—one can have one's fill of wailing.
Dismiss them now from the pyre, bid them ready their meal.
We, to whom the dead man was closest, will take care of all matters here; but let the commanders stay with us." 160

On hearing this, the lord of men, Agamemnōn, at once dispersed the troops among their trim ships;
but the close mourners remained, and stacked the timber, making a pyre with each side one hundred feet in length, and upon it, silently grieving, set the dead body. 165

Then many fattened sheep and sleek shambling oxen they flayed and dressed by the pyre; and from all these great-hearted Achilles took fat, and covered the corpse from head to foot, piled the flayed carcasses round it, and two-handled jars of honey and oil he set down, 170 resting against the bier.¹ Then four horses with arching necks he hastily, sobbing aloud, flung onto the pyre.

Nine dogs there had been that were fed from their master's table:
two of these he tossed on the pyre after cutting their throats;
and twelve noble sons of the high-spirited Trojans 175 he slew with the bronze: vile actions were in his mind.²

Then to the pyre he set fire's iron might, to consume it, and groaned aloud, and called on his dear comrade by name:
"Greetings, Patroklos, even in the realm of Hādēs!
See, now I'm fulfilling all that I promised you earlier: 180 twelve noble sons of the high-spirited Trojans—all these, with you, the flames will devour; but Priam's son Hektōr I'll not give to fire, but to dogs to feed on."

1. These jars are clearly the kind of amphora (or, later, funeral lēkythos) with a pointed foot, that was meant to be stuck in the ground, and could not stand unsupported on the logs of the pyre: Leaf, 2: 392; Richardson 189.

2. Thus fulfilling the promise he had earlier made to the dead Patroklos: cf. 18.336–37.

So he spoke, threatening; yet no dogs were getting at Hektōr, for the daughter of Zeus, Aphrodītē, kept him safe from them 185 by day and by night, anointed his body with rose-scented ambrosial oil, so the dragging would not lacerate his flesh, and Phoibos Apollo upon him projected a dark cloud, from the heavens down to the plain, enshrouding the whole site that the dead man occupied, to stop the strength of the sun 190 from shriveling the flesh that embodied his sinews and his limbs.

But the pyre of the dead Patroklos would not catch fire.
 So now swift-footed Achilles had another idea:
 standing away from the pyre, he prayed to two of the winds, the north and west—Boreas, Zephyros—promised fine offerings, 195 implored them, while pouring libations from a golden goblet, to come, help set the body quickly ablaze with fire, by speeding the wood to its kindling. Iris, hearing his prayers, lost no time, but carried his message on to the winds.
 They were all met at the home of blustery Zephyros, 200 in the midst of a banquet. Iris came running, stopped on the stone threshold. When they caught sight of her they all jumped up, and each one wanted her by him.
 But she wouldn't sit and join them, explained herself thus:
 "I can't stay—I have to go back to the streams of Ocean, 205 to the land of the Aithiōpians: they're making fine sacrifices to the immortals, and I am to share in their sacred feast!
 But Achilles is praying that Boreas and blustery Zephyros will come—and promising them fine offerings if they do—to fan the flames of the pyre on which there lies 210 Patroklos, for whom the Achaians are all making loud lament."

So she, having thus spoken, went on her way; they rose with a marvelous clamor, stampeding the clouds before them, and quickly reached the deep sea, blowing on it: the waves surged up before that shrill blast. They came to rich-soiled Troy, 215 and swooped on the pyre: loud roared a wondrous conflagration!
 So the whole night through they fanned the flames of the pyre, blowing shrilly; the whole night through swift Achilles, clutching a two-handled cup, took wine from a golden bowl and poured it out on the ground, till the earth was drenched, 220 calling upon the spirit of the unlucky Patroklos.
 As a father mourns for a son while he's burning his bones—

a son just wed, whose death has shocked his unlucky parents—so Achilles wept for his comrade as he burned his bones, dragging himself round the pyre, and ceaselessly sobbing. 225

At the hour that the morning star goes heralding light on earth, followed by Dawn, saffron-clad, spreading over the deep,
then the funeral pyre died down, and ceased to flame.
Now the winds set out back on their homeward journey, over the Thracian sea—at their coming it surged and thundered— 230 and the son of Pēleus withdrew from the smoldering pyre and lay down, exhausted, and sweet sleep swept over him.
But when Atreus's son and his people all assembled together, the clamor and noisy tread of their coming awoke him:
He sat up and called out to them, saying: "Son of Atreus, 235 and you other lords and chieftains of all the Achaians, first quench the still-smoldering pyre with fire-bright wine, in each part that the fire's force reached. When that's accomplished, let us collect the bones of Patroklos, Menoitios's son, sorting them carefully—they're easy enough to distinguish: 240 he lay at the heart of the pyre, while the rest had to burn at its edges, horses and men all mingled together—then lay them up in a golden bowl, with a double layer of fat as cover, until I too am vanished to Hādēs.
But you're not to toil at raising a huge grave mound now, 245 just one that's befitting: though afterwards you Achaians can make it broader and higher—those of you, that is, still left among the benched vessels when I myself am gone."

So he spoke, and they heeded Pēleus's swift-footed son.
They quenched the still-smoldering pyre with fire-bright wine 250 in each part that the fire's force reached, where the ash had settled.
Weeping, they gathered their kindly comrade's white bones into a golden bowl, with a double layer of fat:
this they laid up in his hut, put a soft cloth to cover it.
They marked out the grave-mound's circle, laid a base of stones 255 upon it around the pyre, then piled on loose earth, and, the mound once raised, began leaving; Achilles however kept them all where they were, made them sit in broad assembly, fetching out prizes then from his ships: cauldrons and tripods, horses and mules and sturdy heads of oxen, 260 and women with elegant sashes, and ingots of grey iron.

First, for swift charioteers he set out splendid prizes:
 a woman to take away, one skilled in fine handiwork, an eared tripod of twenty-two measures—these for the winner;
 for the runner-up, he provided a six-year-old mare, 265 unbroken, and pregnant with a mule foal; for third place he set out a cauldron as yet untouched by fire, a fine one, four measures capacity, new, bright, polished;
 for the fourth, two talents of gold was the prize allotted, for the fifth, a two-handled bowl, as yet untouched by fire. 270
 Then he stood up and spoke as follows among the Argives:
 “Son of Atreus, and all you other well-greaved Achaians, here are the prizes awaiting the horsemen in this contest.
 If we Achaians were now competing in honor of someone else, then I’d surely win first prize, and bear it away to my hut; 275 for you know by how much my horses surpass all others, being immortal: Poseidōn bestowed them as a present on Pēleus, my father; and he bequeathed them to me.
 But I shall remain here: I, and my whole-hoofed horses.
 So great the renown of the charioteer that they’ve lost— 280 a kindly man too, who’d frequently work soft oil into their manes, when he’d washed them with shining water!
 Now both of them stand and mourn him: low on the ground their manes are trailing; they stand still, grieving at heart.
 But you others in camp here, get ready—any Achaian 285 with confidence in his horses and his dovetailed chariot!”

 So spoke Pēleus’s son, and the horsemen quickly gathered.
 The first of all to come forward was Eumēlos, lord of men, Admētos’s dear son, a man highly skilled in horsemanship.
 Next there stood up Tydeus’s son, the mighty Diomēdēs, 290 leading beneath the yoke Trōs’s horses,³ that he’d earlier taken by force from Aineias (himself rescued by Apollo).
 Next up was Atreus’s son, the fair-haired Menelaös, scion of Zeus, who yoked a speedy team of horses—Agamemnōn’s mare Aithē, and his own Podargos. 295 Echepōlos, son of Anchīsēs, gave Agamemnōn the mare as a bribe, to avoid going with him to windy Ilion, so he’d get to stay home and enjoy life—since he’d been granted

3. On these horses, see 5.222–23 and note, 263–74, 319–27; on the rescue of Aineias, 5.344–46, 443–50.

vast riches by Zeus—in broad Sikyon, where his home was.
 This mare Menelaös now yoked: she was straining to race. 300 Antilochos was the fourth to ready his fine-maned horses—the splendid son of Nestör, that high-spirited king, and grandson of Nēleus: Pylos-bred were the swift-foot steeds that drew his chariot. His father stood there beside him, with well-meant advice for a son who knew plenty himself: 305 “Antilochos, young though you are, you’ve been befriended by Zeus and Poseidōn, who’ve taught you every aspect of horsemanship—no great need, then, for me to instruct you—you know just how to wheel your horses round the turn mark!
 But since yours are the slowest, I think you’ll have some trouble. 310 Still, their horses may be swifter, but your competitors can’t match you in clever planning, so it’s up to you, dear boy—get your mind round every kind of cunning contrivance, don’t let those prizes slip away out of your grasp!
 Shrewdness serves woodcutters better than mere brute force; 315 it’s through shrewdness a steersman, out on the wine-faced deep, can control a swift ship when it’s battered by gale-force winds;
 shrewdness is what lets one driver edge out another.
 Some are content to rely on their horses and chariot, will carelessly take turns wide on this side and that, 320 let their team swerve over the track, not keep them in hand; but the man who knows every trick, though driving worse horses, will keep his eye on the turn, hug it close;—he never forgets, from the start, to maintain taut control of his oxhide reins, but steadily holds them in hand, one eye on the team ahead. 325
 Now I’ll tell you about a clear marker: you cannot miss it.
 There’s the dried wooden stump of a tree, about six feet high—of oak or pine: it doesn’t rot in the rain—with two white stones set against it, on either side, at the track’s turning point, with smooth driving all round it. 330
 A memorial, maybe, of some mortal long since dead, or perhaps set up as a race mark by men in olden times—and now swift-footed Achilles has made it his turning post.
 Steer tight round this, driving horses and chariot close, and yourself, at the taut leather rail, lean a touch to the left 335 of your team, while you also cheer on your offside horse, give it the goad, let the rein run loose in your hand!
 But have the nearside horse run close to the turning post—so close, that the crafted wheel's hub seems to graze its surface yet doesn't in fact touch the stone: do that, and you risk 340 having your horses maimed and your chariot wrecked!

A delight for your competitors that would be, but for you a disaster. So, my dear boy, use your wits, be on your guard; for if at the turning post you get ahead of the others, there's no one who'll catch or pass you in a final spurt, 345 not even were he to chase you driving noble Arīōn, Adrēstos's swift horse, divinely sired, or the team of Laomedōn, fine thoroughbreds brought up in these parts."

With that, Nestōr, Nēleus's son, sat down again in his place, having instructed his son how to master every last detail. 350

Mērionēs was the fifth to ready his fine-maned horses.
Then they mounted their chariots, threw in their lots.⁴
Achilles shook them: out flew the lot of Nestōr's son Antilochos. Lord Eumēlos drew the place next to him, followed by Atreus's son, famed spearman Menelaös. 355
The next starting place fell by lot to Mērionēs; last place went to Tydeus's son, far the best of them all.
So they lined up, and Achilles showed them the turning post far off on the level plain: he set an observer by it, the godlike Phoinix, his father's old deputy, 360 to umpire the race, give a true report of its outcome.

Then they all at once raised their whips above their horses, started them with the reins, drove them on with urgent commands, and they swiftly advanced across the plain, at full gallop, moving away from the ships; and from under their breasts 365 the dust, kicked up, rose high, like a cloud or a whirlwind, and with the blast of the wind their manes streamed out.
At times the wheels would run smoothly over the nurturing earth, but at times were bumped into the air, while their drivers, standing, held on, and each man's heart beat fast with excitement 370 as they all strove to win, and kept urging their horses on, and the horses flew forward, raising the dust on the plain.

4. Lots are drawn to determine the starting position in the lineup: presumably the luckiest competitor in the draw would, like Antilochos, choose the "inmost place on the left, giving an advantage at the turn" (Richardson 213). For the practice of shaking the lots out of a helmet, see 7.175–83.

But when the swift teams were completing the final stretch, back towards the grey sea, then each one's true quality became clear, as the horses were stretched to the limit. The racing 375 mares of Pherēs' grandson, Eumēlos, moved into the lead, and, next, Diomēdēs' stallions, the horses of Trōs, were not far behind—indeed, so close upon their heels that they seemed on the point of mounting Eumēlos's chariot, and with their breath his back and his broad shoulders 380 grew warm, so close they bent their heads as they sped; and now Tydeus's son would have passed or dead-heated him, had he not stirred up resentment in Phoibos Apollo, who struck the shining whip clean out of his hand.
 Then from his eyes there started tears of fury 385 as he saw Eumēlos's mares going still faster than before, while his own pair were handicapped, running without a goad.
 But the trick played on Tydeus's son by Apollo had not escaped Athēnē: quickly she chased after the shepherd of men, returned his whip to him, put power into his horses; 390 then in her fury she went for the son of Admētos: his team's yoke was smashed by the goddess: the mares both bolted off-track, and the yoke pole slipped to the ground. Eumēlos was flung headlong out of the chariot, by the wheel, 395 stripping skin from his elbows and mouth and nose, and leaving his forehead above the eyebrows all bruised, while both his eyes were brimming with tears, and his strong young voice was stilled.
 Tydeus's son then swerved his whole-hoofed horses round him, and led the field, far ahead of the rest—for Athēnē had put strength in his horses, bestowed on him great glory— 400 with Atreus's son, fair-haired Menelaös, the next behind him.

Antilochos now called out to his father's horses:
 "You two, get moving as well! Put your full strength into it!
 I'm not asking you to compete with those up front there—Tydeus's warlike son's horses, those to which Athēnē 405 has just given strength, and on him bestowed great glory—no, overtake Atreus's son's team, don't be left behind!
 So, move it! Unless you both want to be put to shame by Aithē, and her a mare? You champions, why so slow?
 For I'll tell you this, and it will certainly be fulfilled: 410

No care will you get from Nestōr, the people's shepherd—rather he'll kill you at once with the keen-edged bronze—if through your lack of spirit all we win is a lesser prize!
 So get in pursuit, gallop after them at full stretch, and what I'll contrive and work to achieve is this: 415 we'll pass them where the track narrows—I'll not miss it!"

So he spoke; and they, terrified by their master's reproof, quickened their pace for a little. Then, almost at once, steadfast Antilochos sighted the narrow point where the road ran hollow: a gully had formed, where winter floods, collecting, 420 had torn away part of the track, deepened the whole stretch—and here steered Menelaös, to avoid teams jostling abreast.
 But Antilochos now took his own whole-hoofed pair off-track, and began to overtake him, driving close in, side by side, and Atreus's son, in alarm, shouted out to Antilochos: 425
 "This is crazy driving, Antilochos! Rein in your horses!
 Here the track's narrow: it'll soon be wider for passing—
 This way you'll run into my chariot, wreck us both!"

So he spoke; but Antilochos pressed on still more fiercely, urging his team with the goad, as though not hearing. About 430 as far as the range of a discus swung from the shoulder, that a young man throws when making trial of his strength, so far they ran thus—but then the mares of Atreus's son dropped back, as he decided he'd race them hard no longer, to avoid their whole-hoofed horses colliding on the track 435 and upsetting the well-strapped chariots, and themselves being thrown out in the dust, through their great lust to win.
 Then fair-haired Menelaös cried out in stern reproof:
 "Antiochos, no other mortal's more malignant than you!
 Keep on, then—we Achaians were mistaken to think you wise! 440
 Even so, you won't get the prize without a challenge on oath."⁵

So he spoke, and then called out to his horses, saying:
 "Don't hold back, don't stop now, through grief at heart! Their feet

5. Menelaös indeed has it in mind to challenge Antilochos to take an oath that he has not cheated by using an improper trick to secure the victory, and in fact does so at 581–85. Antilochos (with good reason) prefers to yield gracefully, youth respecting age, rather than to take an oath that would in fact involve him in perjury.

and laboring knees will tire out long before yours do—old nags, age deprives them of their youthful vigor.” 445

So he spoke; and they, terrified by their master’s reproof, quicken their pace, and soon came up close behind the others.

Now the Argives were sitting assembled, watching out for the horses as they flew onward, raising the dust on the plain; and Idomeneus, Krētan chieftain, perched away from the crowd, high up on a lookout point, was the first to glimpse them. 450

When he heard a man’s distant voice urging his horses on he recognized that, and spotted a horse way out ahead, all chestnut in color, except for its forehead, and there it had a round white blaze resembling the full moon. 455

Up he stood, and addressed the Argives in these words:
“My friends, rulers and leaders of the Argives, am I the only one who can actually see these horses, or can you see them too? Other horses now seem to leading, and a different driver’s in sight! The mares that were in front on the first stretch, must have tripped up at some point: 460

I certainly saw them reach the turning post in the lead, but now I can nowhere discern them, although my eyes have searched for them everywhere, all over the Trojan plain.
Did the driver perhaps drop his reins, was he unable 465 to hold his course well round the post? Did he fail on the turn?

He must, I fear, have been thrown there, his chariot wrecked, and his mares, in a wild frenzy, must have bolted from the track.
But stand up and look for yourselves—I myself cannot recognize anything clearly; to me, the man looks as though he is 470 an Aitōlian by birth, a ruler among the Argives—Tydeus the horse-breaker’s son, the mighty Diomēdēs.”

Oileus’s son, swift Aias, now shamefully rebuked him: “Idomeneus, always the big-mouth! Those high-stepping mares are still a long way off, racing over the broad plain! 475 You’re nowhere near the youngest among the Argives, nor are the eyes in your head by far the sharpest, yet your big mouth’s forever yapping! You’ve no right to be such a blabbermouth—others here are better than you!

The same mares are in the lead now as were before—those of Eumēlos, and he's the driver, holding the reins." 480

Growing angry at him, the Krētan leader retorted:
"Aias, peerless at insults, dim-witted, in all other ways you lag far behind the Argives: your mind is so rigid!
Come on then, let's wager a tripod or a cauldron, 485 and both accept Atreus's son Agamemnōn as the judge of which horses are in the lead: you'll learn that when you pay!"

So he spoke; and swift Aias, Oīleus's son, at once jumped up, in a fury, to answer him with hard words; and their quarrel would certainly have gone still further, 490 had not Achilles himself stood up and made this speech:
"No more of these angry insults to and fro between you, Aias, Idomeneus! This is bad talk, most improper—You'd reprimand anyone else who behaved that way!
Sit down now in the assembly, both of you, keep a watch 495 for the horses—they're going flat out to win, they'll be here any moment now! Then you'll know, each one of you, which Argives' horses are lagging, and which are in the lead."

While he was speaking, Tydeus's son drove up at speed, plying his whip from the shoulder; and his horses, 500 high-stepping, came lightly skimming down the track, while the raised dust kept blowing against their charioteer, and the chariot itself, decorated with gold and with tin, ran behind the swift-footed team, and barely a trace of the wheel rims' passage was left behind in the powdery 505 dust as the pair sped onward. Then at last he pulled up in the midst of the place of assembly, the sweat still coursing down from his horses' necks and chests to the ground.
To the ground he too sprang from his gleaming chariot, and propped his whipstock against the yoke. Nor did sturdy 510 Sthenelos waste any time, but briskly claimed the prize—the woman, the eared tripod—which he gave to his high-hearted comrades to carry off, and himself unyoked the horses.

Next to bring in his team was Antilochos, Nēleus's grandson, having outstripped Menelaös not by speed, but by cunning guile. 515 Yet even so Menelaös had his own pair right behind him—as near as a horse to the wheel, a horse that draws its master over the plain, straining hard at his chariot, with the outermost hairs of its tail just brushing the wheel's rim, since it runs very close in front, and there's only the narrowest space 520 between horse and wheel as it gallops over the wide plain—by so little was Menelaös behind peerless Antilochos now—though at first it had been as far as a discus throw—having quickly caught up with him, since Agamemnön's mare, fine-maned Aithê, kept finding and using yet greater power; 525 and if the course for the two of them had been much longer, then he'd have passed him, and not left the outcome in dispute.

 Mërionês, Idomeneus's excellent henchman, came in a spear's flight behind illustrious Menelaös, for his fine-maned horses were the tardiest of them all, 530 and he himself the least skillful at racing a chariot.
 The son of Admêtos arrived long after the rest, dragging his splendid chariot, driving his team before him.
 At the sight of him swift-footed noble Achilles felt pity, and stood up among the Argives, and spoke winged words to them: 535
 "Driving his whole-hoofed horses now comes in, last of all, by far the best man: so let's give him a prize, as is proper—for second place: the first let Tydeus's son carry off."

So he spoke, and they all approved his proposal; and now, with the Achaians' backing, he'd have given Eumêlos the mare, 540 had Nestôr's high-spirited son, Antilochos, in response not risen to lodge an appeal with Pêleus's son Achilles:
 "Achilles, you'll anger me deeply if you persist with this proposal: you'll be robbing me of my prize through dwelling on his misfortune—horses and chariot wrecked, 545 and him too, for all his skill. But if he had made a prayer to the immortals, he wouldn't have ended last in the race!
 Look, if you feel sorry for him, if he's so dear to you, back in your hut there's gold in abundance, there's bronze, and sheep too, and handmaids, as well as whole-hoofed horses! 550 Choose from among these later, and give him a better prize—or right now, if you want some applause from the Achaians—but the mare I will not give up: let any man who wants her make trial of me now in a hand-to-hand engagement."

So he spoke, and swift-footed noble Achilles smiled,⁶ 555 enjoying Antilochos, since he was his dear companion, and in response addressed him with winged words: “Antilochos, if you want me to find from my own possessions some extra gift for Eumēlos, I’ll be glad to do so.
 I’ll give him the corselet I stripped off Asteropaios— 560 it’s of bronze, with an inlay of shining tin all round it in circles: this will be a most valuable gift for him.”

 With that he commanded his dear comrade Automedōn to fetch it out of the hut: he went off and came back with it, and presented it to Eumēlos, who received it with pleasure. 565

 Now there also stood up among them Menelaös, sore at heart, with implacable rage at Antilochos. A herald placed the scepter in his hand, and called out for silence among the Argives.
 Then Menelaös, that man of godlike mien, addressed them:
 “Antilochos, once so sensible, consider what you’ve done! 570
 You insulted my manhood, and you thwarted my horses by driving your own ahead, though they’re far inferior.
 Come now, you leaders and rulers of the Argives, make a fair judgment between us, not favoring either man, lest one day some bronze-clad Achaian may declare: 575 “Menelaös defeated Antilochos with his lies, went off taking the mare, because, while his own horses were nags, he himself carried all the weight in prestige and power.”
 I myself will offer a ruling, and I don’t think any other Danaän will find fault with it: it will be rightful. 580
 As is the proper custom, Antilochos, Zeus’s nursling, come here, and, standing before your horses and chariot, take the lithe whip with which you were lately driving, and, touching your horses, by the Earth-Encircling Earth-Shaker swear that you never meant to block my chariot by deceit.” 585

 To him then astute Antilochos offered this response: “Wait a moment! Remember that I’m a good deal younger

6. Richardson notes (229) that this is the only time in the whole of the Iliad when Achilles is reported as smiling. He is, we are led to believe, delighted by his young aristocratic friend’s frankness. What are we meant to infer from this unique instance? More, surely, than pleasure at the smart discomfiture of Agamemnōn’s brother? But just what remains obscure.

than you, my lord Menelaös: you're my elder and better, you know what a young man's transgressions are likely to be—his mind's over-hasty, his judgment lacks real substance. 590
 So bear with me in your heart: the mare that I won I'll willingly give you, and if you want something better from my house, I'd be only too glad to provide that as well, here and now, Zeus's nursling, rather than spend my life out of favor with you, and at fault in the eyes of the gods." 595

With that, great-hearted Nestör's son now led up the mare, and gave her to Menelaös, whose heart grew warm and melted like morning dew that coats the ears of grain where the plowland bristles with its ripe crop of tall wheat:
 just so, Menelaös, did the heart melt in your breast. 600
 Then he addressed him, speaking in winged words:
 "Antilochos, now I myself will yield, and freely abandon the anger I felt, since you were neither deranged nor foolish before, though this time your youth outweighed your sense.
 From now on take care to avoid outwitting your betters! 605
 Indeed, no other Achaian would so soon have won me over, but you've suffered much and done a great deal of work—you, your excellent father, your brother—on my behalf;
 so I'll yield to your entreaties—and, though the mare is mine, I'll give her to you, so those present may recognize 610 that my spirit is never arrogant or unbending."

With that he gave the mare to Noëmôn, Antilochos's companion, to lead away, and then himself took the gleaming cauldron, while Mërionēs, for fourth place, picked up the two gold talents, just as he'd driven. But the fifth prize went unclaimed— 615 the two-handed bowl: this Achilles gave to Nestör, took it over to him through the Argive assembly, and said:

 "Something, old sir, for you too: let this bowl be your keepsake, a memento of the funeral of Patroklos, whom nevermore will you look on among the Argives. I give you this prize 620 without contest, for never again will you box or wrestle in competition, or hurl the javelin, run a footrace, since oppressive old age now weighs heavily upon you."

So saying, he gave it to Nestōr, who received it with pleasure, and addressed him, speaking with winged words: “Yes, indeed, 625 all you just said, my child, was right and proper:
 my limbs are no longer strong, friend, nor can my arms still thrust out lightly and fast from either shoulder.
 Would I were as young again, my strength still undiminished, as on that day when the Epeians were burying lord Amarynkeus 630 at Bouprasion, and his sons gave prizes in the king’s honor!
 Then no man was my equal, neither of the Epeians, nor of the great-hearted Aitōlians, nor of the Pylians themselves.
 In boxing I beat Klytomēdēs, the son of Ēnōps, and at wrestling Ankaïos of Pleurōn, who stood against me; 635 in the footrace I outran Iphiklos, fine athlete though he was,
 and at spear throwing I defeated both Phyleus and Polydōros.
 In the chariot race alone did Aktōr’s two sons⁷ defeat me, overtaking by force of numbers, begrudging me victory because the best prizes were kept for this last contest. 640 Twin brothers they were: the one held the reins full-time—held the reins full-time!—while the other drove with his whip.
 That’s how I once was; now it’s time for younger men to take on such tasks, while I must resign myself to wretched old age, though then I stood out among the heroes. 645
 So now honor your comrade too with funeral rites and contests!
 This gift I accept with pleasure: my heart rejoices that you think of me still as a friend, and do not forget the honor that’s proper for me to receive among the Achaians.
 May the gods in return for this grant you bountiful favors.” 650

So he spoke. Back through the great crush of the Achaians Pēleus’s son now went—after hearing out this discourse by the son of Nēleus—to set out prizes for painful boxing.
 He brought to the place of assembly a working mule, tethered it there, an unbroken six-year-old hinney, the toughest kind to break, 655 and for the loser set out a two-handled cup. This done he stood up and spoke as follows among the Argives:

7. These were the twins Kteatos and Eurytos: officially Aktōr’s offspring, but in fact sired by Poseidōn. They are also sometimes identified as descendants of Molos, their maternal grandfather (11.709 and note, 750—again, in a reminiscence of Nestōr’s). In late tradition (HE 1: 28), they were pictured as Siamese twins.

“Son of Atreus, and all you other well-greaved Achaians, we call on two men, the best, to compete for these prizes, putting up their fists: the one whom Apollo endows 660 with strength to endure—something all the Achaians recognize—can then return to his hut leading off the hardy mule, while the loser will carry away the two-handled cup.”

So he spoke;
 and at once there stood up a tall and powerful man, well skilled in boxing, Panopeus's son Epeios, 665 who, one hand on the working mule, now addressed them, saying: “Come on then, the man who'll collect that two-handled cup!
 But the mule, I declare, no other Achaian will carry off by defeating me with his fists, since I tell you, I'm the greatest!
 Does it not suffice that I fall short in battle? There's no way 670 a man can make himself expert in every activity!
 For this I declare, and it will certainly be fulfilled: Utterly will I both mangle his flesh and shatter his bones!
 So it would really be best if his kinsmen all remain here, to carry him out after he's been broken up at my hands.” 675

So he spoke, and they all fell silent: in the hush only Euryalos rose, a godlike man, to confront him—the grandson of Talaös, the son of king Mēkisteus, who long ago came to Thēbē when Oidipous had fallen,⁸ for his funeral, and there defeated all the sons of Kadmos. 680 As his second Euryalos had Tydeus's son, the famous spearman, to cheer him on, very keen that he should win.
 First he laid out a loincloth for him, and then produced some well-cut leather thongs⁹ from the hide of a field ox.
 So the two of them girded themselves, stepped out in the center 685 of the place of assembly, put up their mighty fists, and went at each other: their strong hands intermingled,

8. That Oidipous (Oedipus) died at Kolōnos, outside Athens, seems to have been an Athenian invention, perhaps by Sophoklēs; other sources, including the Odyssey (11.275–80) have him living on in Thēbē after the suicide of his mother and wife Epikastē (Jocasta) and dying a wealthy landowner (Hes. WD 162–63). Most of the best-known stories about him are of late occurrence. See HE 2: 594, Richardson 243.

9. Such supple leather thongs were worn by ancient boxers well into the classical period to protect their hands. Later they were replaced by sphairai, a harder type of glove, more liable to cause damage to one's opponent; thus the thongs (ἱμάντες, himantes) were known as “softer” or “gentle” (Richardson 244).

and fearsome the grinding of jaws, while the sweat streamed down everywhere from their limbs. As Euryalos looked for an opening, noble Epeios moved in, uppercut him. No time did he stay on his feet: there and then his bright limbs gave beneath him. 690

As, caught by the ruffling north wind, a fish will leap up from the wrack-strewn shallows, and then a dark wave hides it, so, when struck, he jerked skyward; but great-hearted Epeios grabbed him, set him upright. His comrades crowded round him, led him off through the place of assembly dragging his feet, spitting out blood clots, head lolling on one side. 695

They brought him, still dazed, sat him down there in their midst, and themselves then went off to collect the two-handled cup.

Peleus's son now displayed other prizes to the Danaäns, for a third contest, that of painful wrestling. The winner would get a great tripod, made to stand on the fire—twelve oxen's worth, the Achaians figured amongst themselves; while for the loser Achilles set in their midst a woman, well skilled in much handiwork. Four oxen they priced her at. 700 705

Then he stood up among the Argives, and addressed them, saying: "Up now, those who'd compete in this contest too!" So he spoke, and thereupon there arose huge Aias, Telamōn's son, and resourceful Odysseus also, that expert in crafty skills.

So these two girded up, strode out into mid-assembly, and gripped each other's arms with their brawny fists, like crossbeams that some skilled carpenter dovetails together in a high house, with a view to resisting the gale-force winds. 710

Their backbones cracked under the violent to-and-fro tugging of their powerful hands, their sweat poured down in streams, clustering welts sprang up along their ribs and shoulders, reddened with blood. They never let up the pressure as they battled for victory and the well-wrought tripod: Odysseus could not trip Aias and pin him to the ground, nor Aias him, for Odysseus's great strength held firm. 715 720

But when this began to weary the well-greaved Achaians, then to Odysseus huge Aias, the son of Telamōn, said: "Zeus-sprung son of Laertēs, resourceful Odysseus, you lift me, or I you: for the rest, let Zeus decide."

With that, he tried to lift him; but Odysseus had not forgotten his cunning, and struck him sharply behind the knee joint, 725 loosened his limbs, threw him backward, and dropped on his chest, so that those watching were struck with amazement; and then much-enduring noble Odysseus attempted to lift him, raised him just off the ground, yet couldn't heft him up. 730

 He hooked his knee inside Aias's, and the two dropped back, close-entwined, on the ground, and all begrimed with dust.
 Then for the third time they'd have sprung to their feet and wrestled, had Achilles himself not got up and restrained them:
 "Break it up now! Don't strain till you hurt yourselves! 735 You're both the victors. You'll both get the same prizes.
 Off with you now—so that other Achaians can compete."
 So he spoke, and they listened, and were glad to obey:
 they wiped off the dust, and got back into their tunics.

Pēleus's son now set out other prizes, for speed of foot: 740 a finely worked silver mixing bowl, of six measures only, yet for beauty it far exceeded every last one on earth, having been cunningly fashioned by Sidonian craftsmen.
 Phoenician merchants ferried it over the misty deep, and brought it to harbor, and made a present of it to Thoas; 745 and as ransom for Priam's son Lykaōn it was surrendered by Eunēos, the son of Jason, to the hero Patroklos.
 This bowl Achilles set out, in honor of his comrade, for whoever might prove the speediest in the footrace.
 For the runner-up he provided a big ox, rich with fat, 750 and for the contestant in last place a half-talent of gold.
 Then he stood up and spoke among the Argives, saying:
 "Up now, those who are ready to compete in this contest too!"
 So he spoke: there then arose swift Aias, the son of Oileus, and resourceful Odysseus, and after them Nestōr's son 755 Antilochos, who as a runner beat all the youngsters.
 They all lined up, and Achilles showed them the turning point.
 Right from the start they ran at full stretch, but quickly Oileus's son moved ahead, with noble Odysseus behind him, very close—as close as a weaving rod comes to the breast 760 of a fine-sashed woman, who deftly draws it tight with her hands, pulling the spool past the warp, and holding the rod right by her breast—so close ran Odysseus: his own feet trod in Aias's footsteps before the dust had settled on them, while down on Aias's head came Odysseus's panting breath 765 as he kept up the fast pace: all the Achaians were cheering his struggle to win, urged him on to yet greater efforts.

 But when they were running the final stretch, then Odysseus made a quick prayer in his heart to grey-eyed Athēnē: “Hear me, goddess! Come as a good helper to my feet!” 770
 So he spoke in prayer, and Pallas Athēnē heard him, and lightened his limbs, both his knees and his arms above them.
 But as they went into their final sprint for the prize, then Aias slipped as he ran—for Athēnē tripped him—where the dung was spread from the slaughter of the bellowing 775 oxen killed for Patroklos by swift-footed Achilles, and his mouth and nostrils were filled with this cattle dung.
 So the bowl was won by noble and much-enduring Odysseus, who came in first, and the field ox went to illustrious Aias.
 He stood there, with one hand clutching his beast by its horn, 780 and spat out the dung, and addressed the Argives, saying: “Oh, my, that goddess for sure tripped my feet—she always stands by Odysseus and helps him, just like a mother.”

 So he spoke, and they all had a hearty laugh at him.
 Antilochos then collected the prize for the last contestant, 785 smiling, and spoke among the Argives, saying: “Something, my friends, you all know, but I’ll say it now just once more: even today the gods honor older men!
 Aias may be only a little older than I am, but Odysseus here belongs to an earlier generation— 790 men call his a green old age—yet it’s hard for any Achaian to match him at running, save only Achilles.”

 So he spoke, with a flattering word for Pēleus’s swift-footed son.
 To this Achilles responded, addressing him as follows:
 “Antilochos, not in vain shall your praise have been expressed! 795
 I shall add to your prize another half-talent of gold.”

 So saying, he handed it to him, and he took it with pleasure.
 Then Pēleus’s son brought out a far-shadowing spear, set it down in the place of assembly, with a shield and helmet—the battle gear of Sarpēdōn, that Patroklos took from him— 800 then stood up among the Argives, and addressed them, saying:
 “We call on two men, the best, to compete for these prizes, to put on their armor, to take the flesh-cutting bronze, and make trial of each other in front of the troops assembled.

 Whichever one's first to touch the other's handsome flesh, 805 gets through armor and black blood, pricks the body within,¹⁰ to him shall I give as prize this silver-studded sword, a fine Thracian weapon I took from Asteropaios.
 As for the armor, let the two men share it between them, and we'll give them a splendid banquet here in the huts." 810

So he spoke. There then arose huge Aias, Telamōn's son, and the son of Tydeus stood up, the mighty Diomēdēs;
 and after arming themselves, on either side of the throng, they converged at the midpoint, eager to start their fight, exchanging fearsome glances: the Achaians were astonished. 815
 So when, advancing, they closed in, the one on the other, three times they attacked, three times fought hand to hand.
 Then Aias, faced with that balanced buckler, thrust hard, yet missed the flesh, for the corselet protected it, while Tydeus's son kept aiming over Aias's great tower shield 820 with his gleaming spear point, going for his opponent's neck.
 At this point the Achaians, in great alarm for Aias, commanded them to break off, accept equal prizes.
 But to Tydeus's son the hero presented the great sword, complete with its matching scabbard and its well-cut baldric. 825

Next Pēleus's son set out a great mass of pig iron, that Ēētiōn, with his great strength, once used as a throwing weight;
 but him swift-footed noble Achilles had killed, and carried this lump off aboard his ships with his other possessions.
 Now he stood up and spoke as follows among the Argives: 830 "Up now, those who'd compete in this contest too! Even if the winner's rich fields are far distant, he'll still enjoy five full revolving seasons to satisfy his requirements—

10. The word I translate as "the body within" (ἐνδίνων, endinōn) occurs only here in surviving Greek literature, and from antiquity on there has been debate as to whether it means this, or, more specifically, the vitals or innards: see Richardson 260. Was there in fact a time when such a competitive fencing match was determined by a potentially fatal wound? Both Leaf (2: 429) and, more hesitantly, Richardson, think so. I am inclined to doubt this, not least since both verbs used, ὀρέγω (oregō) and ψάω (psauō), are limited to touching, or at most pricking the surface. What we have here is a very slight modification (blood must be drawn) of the normal fencing "hit": so one scholiast. I translate accordingly.

it won't be for lack of iron that his shepherd or plowman will need to go to the city: this will provide for them." 835

So he spoke: up jumped Polypoitēs, that staunch fighter, and godlike Leonteus, a man of mighty strength, and Aias, Telamōn's son, and noble Epeios.

They stood in line: noble Epeios first took up the weight, swung it round, and let fly. The Achaians all laughed at him.¹¹ 840

Leonteus, scion of Arēs, was the next to take his shot, and third to throw was huge Aias, Telamōn's son:
with his brawny fist, he got beyond both their marks.

But when Polypoitēs, staunch fighter, got the mass in his hands, then—as far as an oxherd can fling his throwing stick,¹² 845 and away it flies, whirling, over the heads of his cattle—so far, beyond the assembly, he cast it, to great cheering, and the comrades of strong Polypoitēs rose to their feet and bore off the prize of their king to the hollow ships.

Then for the archers Achilles offered dark iron: 850 ten double axes he brought and set out, and ten single, and some way off set up the mast of a dark-prowed vessel in the sand, and tethered a fluttering pigeon to it by a thin cord attached to its foot, then told them that this was their target. "Whoever hits the fluttering pigeon 855 will get all the double axes to take back home as prizes, while the man who misses the bird, but hits the cord, will win the single axes, since his shot's the less accurate."

So he spoke: up sprang lord Teukros, great in his strength; up, too, Mērionēs, Idomeneus's worthy henchman. 860

They took the lots, shook them up in a bronze helmet, and Teukros drew first place. He promptly let fly a powerful shot, but had not promised to offer a fine sacrifice of firstling lambs to the lord Apollo, so missed the bird—Apollo begrudging him that— 865

11. From 670–72 it seems clear that shot-putting was yet another area in which Epeios's strength was not equaled by his skill.

12. Richardson (265) cites ancient commentators for the information that such a throwing stick "was equipped with a string for holding it, and a weight at the other end." A modern comparison (J. L. Myres, cited in JHS 27 [1907]: 5) is with "the bolos, a weapon consisting of a string with one or more stones attached to it, which is used in Spanish America for throwing at and catching cattle."

but struck the thin cord by the bird's foot, where it was tethered, and the bitter shaft cut it clean through. The pigeon fluttered high up into the sky, with the cord still hanging loosely earthward, and all the Achaians gave a loud cheer.
 Mēriōnēs then quickly snatched the bow from Teukros's hand— 870 he'd been holding an arrow ready while Teukros aimed—and vowed on the spot to Apollo the deadly archer that he'd make him a fine sacrifice of firstling lambs.
 High up under the clouds he spotted the fluttering pigeon, and as she circled he hit her in mid-breast under the wing. 875
 The shaft passed clean through, dropped earthward, fixed itself in the ground in front of his feet, while the bird alit on the mast of the dark-prowed vessel, and huddled there, her head hanging down. Her beating wings now drooped as the life left her limbs, and then, far from the mast 880 she fell, as the crowd, in rapt amazement, watched.
 So Mēriōnēs collected all ten of the double axes, while Teukros took the single ones back to the hollow ships.

 Then Pēleus's son brought out a far-shadowing spear, and a flower-embossed cauldron, unfired still, worth an ox, 885 and set them by the arena, as javelin throwers stood up, the son of Atreus among them, wide-ruling Agamemnōn, along with Mēriōnēs, Idomeneus's worthy henchman.
 Then swift-footed noble Achilles spoke up among them:
 "Son of Atreus, since we know how far you excel us all, 890 how much stronger you are, as a spear thrower without rival, take this prize now, bear it off to the hollow ships;
 and the spear let us give to the hero Mēriōnēs—that is, if you wish it: this is my suggestion only."

 So he spoke: no dissent from the lord of men, Agamemnōn. 895
 To Mēriōnēs the hero then gave the bronze spear; but his own splendid prize he handed to the herald Talthybios.

Book 24

Then the assembly broke up. The troops now scattered, each man off to his own swift ship, their minds on the evening meal and the joy of a full night's sleep. But Achilles wept and wept, thinking of his dear comrade, so that sleep the all-subduing got no hold on him: he kept tossing this way and that, 5
missing Patroklos—his manhood, his splendid strength, all he'd been through with him, all the hardships he'd suffered,
facing men in battle and the waves of the cruel sea.
Recalling these things he shed large tears, lying now stretched out on his side, but, restless, sometimes again 10 on his back, or prone. Then again he'd rise to his feet and wander, distraught, by the seashore: the rising dawn never brought light to sea and to beaches but he was there.
Then he would yoke his swift horses to the chariot, and tie on Hektōr behind it, to be dragged; and when 15 he'd trailed him three times about Menoitios's dead son's mound he'd go back and rest in his hut, leaving Hektōr's body stretched out prone in the dust. But Apollo, pitying Hektōr, preserved his flesh, though mortal, from all unseemly decay even in death, wrapped the golden aegis round his whole body 20 to save the dragged corpse from disfigurement by Achilles.

So Achilles in his fury aimed to mutilate noble Hektōr;
but the sight of him stirred compassion among the blessed gods, and they urged Argos's sharp-sighted slayer, Hermēs, to steal the corpse.
This plan pleased the rest of them, but neither Hērē 25 nor Poseidōn liked it, nor the grey-eyed virgin goddess,¹

1. This is the sole reference in the Iliad to the famous, or notorious, Judgment of Paris (Aléxandros) in the beauty contest between Hērē, Athēnē, and Aphroditē. By giving the prize to Aphroditē, Paris earned her reward to him: she made Helen irresistible to his advances, and by so doing precipitated the events that led to the Trojan War. The genuineness of the passage was long debated, but it is now (and rightly, I think) accepted. Even so, problems remain: if this was the casus belli, why delay its mention so long, and then make it so brief? Embarrassment at such petty motivation? But similar examples of personal divine spite are frequent in Homer: I suspect the reason may simply have been that the incident was so well known that any ancient audience would take it for granted. See Richardson 278–80 for a good survey of the debate.

who still nursed the hatred they'd conceived for sacred Ilion, and Priam, and Priam's people, through Aléxandros's blind delusion:
 for when these goddesses came to his courtyard he despised them, but had praise for the one who furthered his fatal lust. 30
 So now, on the twelfth morning after Hektōr's death, Phoibos Apollo spoke his mind among the immortals:
 "A hard-hearted lot, you gods, and destructive! Did Hektōr never burn for you thighs of oxen, then, or of unblemished goats?
 Yet you couldn't be bothered to save him, dead though he is, 35 for his wife to look on, his mother and his child, his father Priam, the Trojans—who would all promptly burn his corpse in the fire, give him proper funeral rites.
 No, gods: it's the ruthless Achilles you're bent on supporting, though his mind's out of proper order and the will in his breast 40 inflexible—his nature's turned savage, like a lion that in thrall to its huge might and its daring spirit makes for the flocks of men to capture itself a feast:
 so Achilles has lost all pity, and has no respect in him—a great source to a man of both harm and benefit. 45 Any man may well have lost someone even dearer than he has—a full brother, say, or even a son; yet when he's wept and lamented the loss, he lets him go, for it's an enduring heart the Fates have given to mortals.
 But this man, after robbing noble Hektōr of his life, 50 ties him behind his chariot and then drags him about his dear comrade's mound: nothing fine or decent there.
 Great though he is, he should watch out for our anger:
 through this fury of his he's outraging the silent earth."² Then angrily white-armed Hērē addressed him, saying: 55
 "What you say might even be true, lord of the silver bow, if indeed you all grant equal honor to Achilles and Hektōr.
 Hektōr is mortal, was suckled at a woman's breast; but Achilles is the offspring of a goddess, one whom I myself nurtured and reared, and gave to a mortal as his wife— 60

2. Both Leaf (2: 440) and Richardson (282) assume that the reference is solely to the mutilation of Hektōr's body, now dumb or senseless clay—as both point out, a traditional metaphor; but surely (and still more strikingly) what we have here is the sense of the earth itself (which cannot complain) being outraged by what is taking place, very directly, on its surface?

to Pēleus, a man who was dear to the hearts of the immortals; and all of you gods were guests at their wedding—yes, you too³ sat at that feast, lyre in hand, ever faithless, friend of the wicked!”

Then Zeus the cloud-gatherer responded to her, saying:
“Hērē, no need to rage so vehemently at the gods! 65
The honor of these two will not be the same; yet Hektōr was more dear to the gods than all other mortals in Ilion!
To me at least, for he never failed me with gifts I enjoyed—
Not once did my altar lack its fair share of the feasting, the libations, the burnt fat, our accepted privileges! 70 We’ll forget about stealing bold Hektōr—no way to do it with Achilles not finding out: his mother is constantly around him both day and night. In fact I wish that one of you gods would tell Thetis I want her here, to give a wise message to her, to make Achilles 75 accept ransom from Priam, and give Hektōr’s body back.”

So he spoke: storm-footed Iris hastened to take his message.
Midway between Samothrakē and rocky Imbros she plunged into the dark sea with a loud splash of water, and plummeted down to the depths like a lead weight 80 attached to the horn of a field ox on a fisherman’s line that brings death in its descent to the ravenous fishes.
Thetis she found in her hollow cave, and round her other sea goddesses gathered, while she in the midst of them wept for the fate of her peerless son, who was destined 85 to perish in rich-soiled Troy, far off from his own country.
Standing beside her, swift-footed Iris now said:
“Move yourself, Thetis: Zeus, the eternal planner, wants you.”
Then the goddess, Thetis the silver-footed, answered her:
“What does that great god want with me? I’m embarrassed, 90 going among the immortals, with this endless grief at heart.
Still, I’ll go. Whatever he says, it won’t be pointless.”

So saying, she, brightest of goddesses, put on her blue-black veil, than which no garment she had was darker, and set out to go, wind-footed swift Iris ahead of her 95

3. Apollo played at the wedding feast of the future Achilles’ parents, but went on (as a fragment of Aeschylus, spoken by Thetis, alleges: Richardson 283) to be responsible for their famous son’s death.

leading the way: the sea's waves parted before them.
 They stepped out onto the beach, then darted up skywards and found Kronos's far-seeing son, with all the other blessed gods who exist forever around him. Thetis sat down by Zeus the Father—Athēnē yielded her seat— 100 and Hērē put in her hand a splendid golden cup, with a friendly greeting. Thetis drank, and returned it.
 The Father of men and gods now began their discussion:
 "Thetis, goddess, you've come to Olympus, despite your distress, and the ceaseless grief in your heart: this I know myself. 105
 Even so, I shall tell you the reason I brought you here.
 For nine days there's been a quarrel among the immortals about Hektōr's corpse and Achilles, sacker of cities.
 They're urging Argos's sharp-eyed slayer to steal the body, but this is an honor that I'm reserving for Achilles, 110 to preserve your respect and friendship in the days ahead.
 Go quickly, then, to the camp, and give your son this message:
 Say that he's angered the gods, that I, above all other immortals, am filled with rage, because in his maddened heart he's kept Hektōr by the curved ships, won't give him up. 115
 It may be, through fear of me, he'll return Hektōr's body; but I'll send down Iris to great-hearted Priam, who must offer ransom for his dear son, go to the Achaians' ships in person, with gifts for Achilles that will soften his heart."

So he spoke,
 and Thetis the silver-footed, the goddess, did not ignore him, 120 but went on her way, darting down from the peaks of Olympus, and arrived at her son's hut. It was there that she found him, making ceaseless lament, while round him his dear comrades were busy about their tasks, preparing their morning meal:
 a big shaggy ram had been killed for them, there in the hut. 125
 So now his lady mother sat down close by Achilles' side, caressed him with her hand, then spoke to him, saying:
 "My child, how long will you go on eating your heart out with weeping and lamentation, thinking neither of food nor of bed? A good thing it is to lie with a woman, 130 to make love: for you've not long to live—even now, already, death and all-mastering destiny are there beside you.
 But now listen well: I bring word to you from Zeus.

He says that you've angered the gods, that he, above all other immortals, is filled with rage, because in your maddened heart you've kept Hektōr by the curved ships, won't give him up.
So come now, let him go, accept ransom for his corpse." 135

In answer to her swift-footed Achilles declared:
"So be it: he who brings ransom can take the corpse—if indeed the Olympian himself, of his own free will, so orders." 140

Thus they, where the ships were drawn up now, mother and son, conversed together, exchanging many a winged word;
and Kronos's son meanwhile dispatched Iris to sacred Ilion:
"On your way now, swift Iris, leave the seat of Olympos for Ilion, take this message to great-hearted Priam. He must 145 offer ransom for his dear son, go to the Achaians' ships, in person, with gifts for Achilles that will soften his heart—alone: no Trojan warrior should accompany him, just a herald, well on in years, to drive the mules and a smooth-running wagon, to carry back to the city 150
the corpse of the man whom noble Achilles killed.
Let death not be on his mind, nor any such fear, such a guide we'll provide him with, the slayer of Argos, who'll be his leader, convey him safely to Achilles;
and when he's brought him into Achilles' hut, 155 Achilles himself will not kill him, and will restrain all others, being neither senseless nor careless nor malicious:
with compassion, rather, he'll spare a man who's a suppliant."

So he spoke: storm-footed Iris sped off with his message.
She reached Priam's house, and found there wailing and sorrow: 160 sons sitting around their father in the courtyard, tears marring their garments, the old man in their midst wrapped tight in his cloak, and round him an abundance of dung all smeared on his aged head and neck that he'd scraped up in his hands as he rolled on the ground. 165
In the house were his daughters and his sons' wives, keening, their thoughts on the warriors, so many and so warlike, lying dead now, those who'd lost their lives to the Argives.
Zeus's messenger stood close to Priam now, and addressed him, speaking softly, yet shivering still invaded his limbs: 170
"Take heart, Priam, scion of Dardanos: no need to be scared—

I've not come here to foretell some disaster for you, but rather with good intent. I'm a messenger from Zeus, who, remote though he is, both pities and cares for you greatly.
 The Olympian commands you to ransom noble Hektōr, 175 taking gifts to Achilles that will soften his heart—alone: no other Trojan warrior should accompany you, just a herald, well on in years, to drive the mules and a smooth-running wagon, on which to take back to the city
 the corpse of the man whom noble Achilles killed. 180
 Let death not be on your mind, nor any such fear, such a guide we'll provide you with—the slayer of Argos, who'll be your leader, convey you safely to Achilles;
 and when he's brought you into Achilles' hut, Achilles himself won't kill you, and will restrain all others, 185 being neither senseless nor careless nor malicious;
 with compassion, rather, he'll spare a man who's a suppliant."

So speaking, swift-footed Iris went on her way, and Priam ordered his sons to make ready the smooth-running mule wagon, and strap the wickerwork basket on it. 190 He himself went down to his storeroom—fragrant it was with cedar wood, and high-ceilinged—where many treasures lay, and sent for his wife Hekabē, and spoke to her, saying:
 "Dear wife, an Olympian messenger's reached me from Zeus—I'm to go to the ships, offer ransom for my dear son, 195
 in person, with gifts for Achilles that will soften his heart.
 So tell me, what's your reaction to this, how does it strike you—since my own whole passionate instinct is terribly set on going to the ships, to the broad camp of the Achaians."

So he spoke: but his wife cried out aloud, and responded: 200
 "Oh my lord, what's become of that good sense for which you were famous once, both abroad and with those you rule?
 How can you want to go to the Achaians' ships, alone, into the sight of the man who's slaughtered so many of your noble sons? You must have a heart of iron. 205
 For once you are in his power, once he sets eyes on you, that treacherous raw flesh eater will show you no pity, nor any respect! Let us rather lament far from him, sitting here in our own home. All-mastering Destiny surely spun a thread at his birth, when I myself bore him, 210 that far from his parents he'd glut quick scavenging dogs after meeting a stronger man—whose whole liver I wish I could get in my jaws and devour! A fair requital, that, for my son, who was not playing the coward when he killed

him,

but in defense of Troy's men and deep-bosomed women, 215 standing firm, with no thought of panic, or of fleeing the foe."

In answer to her the old man, Priam the godlike, said:
"Don't try to stop me when I want to go; do not yourself prove a bird of ill omen here in our home: you won't persuade me.
If anyone else on earth had been urging me thus— 220 whether seers divining from sacrifices, or priests—we'd call it a lie and have nothing to do with it!
But now, since I heard the goddess and saw her face myself, I'm going—her word won't be wasted. And if it's my fate to end up dead beside the bronze-clad Achaians' ships, 225 I'm ready. Achilles is welcome to slaughter me there and then once I've held my son in my arms, and had my fill of mourning."

With that he opened up the fine lids of the clothes chests, and from them took out a dozen most elegant robes, a dozen plain cloaks, the same number of rugs and blankets, 230 and of white linen mantles, as well as tunics to match them; and of gold he weighed out and took ten talents in all,
with four cauldrons, and two brightly gleaming tripods, and an exquisite cup, that was given him by some Thracians when he went there on a mission, a great treasure: not even this 235 did the old man keep in his home, so strong was his passion to ransom his dear son. Then he drove all the Trojans away from his colonnade, upbraiding them with abusive insults:
'Get out, you worthless no-goods! Do you not have your own mourning to do at home, that you've come here to double mine? 240 Or is the grief nothing to you that Zeus the son of Kronos has laid on me: the loss of my best son? You too will learn—you'll be that much easier for the Achaians to slaughter now that he's dead! As for me, before I'm forced to see the downfall and sacking of this city 245 with my own eyes, may I go down into Hādēs' realm."

That said, he went after the men with his staff, and they ran off from the old man's assault. Then he yelled at his own sons, abusing them—Helenos, noble Agathōn, Paris, Pammōn and Antiphōn, Politēs of the great war cry, 250
 Deiphobos and Hippothoös and illustrious Dios:
 To these nine the old man now shouted his harsh orders: “Get moving, you wretched children, you downcasts—how I wish all of you, rather than Hektōr, had been killed at the swift ships!
 Alas, I'm wholly ill-fated—I sired sons who were the best 255 in the broad land of Troy, yet of them not one, I tell you, is left—neither godlike Mēstōr, nor Trōilos, charioteer, nor Hektōr, a god among men, who never did seem a mortal man's son, but the offspring of a god!
 These Arēs destroyed: what's left are all the no-goods— 260 the liars, the dancers only expert at matching the beat, the lifters of lambs and kids from those in your own country!⁴
 So at least make me ready a wagon, and do it quickly, and load all this stuff aboard it, so we can be on our way.”

 So he spoke, and they, alarmed by their father's reproof, 265 went and brought out for him the smooth-running mule wagon—a fine one, newly made—strapped the wickerwork basket to it, and down from its peg took the yoke for the mules, of boxwood, with a boss on it, well equipped with guide rings for the reins.
 Then they fetched the nine-cubit yoke strap, and the yoke itself, 270 which they settled down firmly upon the well-polished pole at its front end, set the ring on the peg, then fastened the strap three times each side of the boss, made it tight in a series of turns, and twisted it under the hook. They brought from the storeroom and stacked up aboard the polished wagon 275 the boundless ransom to offer for the head of Hektōr;
 they yoked the strong-hoofed mules, broken to work in harness, that the Mysians had given to Priam, a splendid gift; while for him they harnessed up the horses that the old man kept on for his own use, and cared for, there in his polished stalls. 280

4. As Thucydides observed (1.5.1) and Richardson duly notes (300–301), “robbing livestock outside one's community was no disgrace in heroic society.” Modern Greece and the Scottish Highlands offer good parallels.

So these two⁵ in the high palace, while their teams were harnessed, the herald and Priam, had much to meditate on;
 and Hekabē now approached them, heavy-laden at heart, carrying in her right hand wine sweet to the mind in a golden cup, for libation before they departed. 285 Standing in front of the horses, she spoke to Priam, saying: “Here, pour a libation to Zeus, the Father, and pray that you get back home safe from these hateful men, since your heart impels you to go to the ships, even though I’m set against it.
 Then pray to Kronos’s son, lord of the dark clouds, 290 who from Ida looks down on all the country of Troy.
 Ask him for a bird of omen—the swift messenger that’s the dearest of birds to him, and its power is the greatest—on your right hand, so that, after seeing it for yourself, and trusting it, you can go to the swift-horsed Danaäns’ ships. 295
 But if far-seeing Zeus does not grant you his messenger, then I at least would not encourage you to go out to the ships of the Argives, however much you may want to.”
 In answer to her, godlike Priam then declared:
 “My wife, in this I shall not disregard your wishes: 300 it’s good to raise hands to Zeus: he always might show pity.”
 So saying, the old man asked a servant, the housekeeper, to pour pure water over his hands; the servant stood beside him, with in her hands both ewer and wine jug.
 When he’d washed his hands he took the cup from his wife, 305 and stood in the forecourt and prayed, poured out the wine eyes upturned to heaven, and spoke aloud, in these words: “Zeus, Father, ruling from Ida, most glorious, greatest, grant that Achilles receive me with both friendship and pity—and send me a bird of omen—the swift messenger that’s 310 the dearest of birds to you, and its power is the greatest—on my right hand, so that, after seeing it for myself, and trusting it, I can go to the swift-horsed Danaäns’ ships.”

5. This is the first we are told of a herald actually being found (at short notice, at night) and brought to the palace. It is only later (325), and equally casually, that we learn that his name is Idaios (cf. 3.248, 7.276, and elsewhere).

So he spoke in prayer, and Zeus the Counselor heard him.
 He at once dispatched an eagle, of winged life the surest omen, 315 dark hunter, sometimes known to men as the black falcon.
 Wide as the door is built to fit some wealthy man's high-ceilinged treasure chamber, a door well-equipped with bars, so wide the spread of its wings on either side. It appeared on their right, swooping over the city, and seeing it they 320 rejoiced, and the hearts in the breasts of all were cheered.

Briskly now the old man stepped into his chariot, and drove out through the forecourt and the echoing colonnade.
 In front of him went the mules, that drew the four-wheeled wagon driven by skillful Idaios, and following after them 325 the horses, that the old man smartly whipped on at speed through the city, his kinsfolk all following behind with great weeping and sorrow, as for one going to his death.
 When they'd come down out of the city, and reached the plain, these last turned and went back into Ilion—Priam's sons, 330 and his daughters' husbands. Far-seeing Zeus did not fail to notice the two as they entered the plain, and, seeing Priam, felt pity, and spoke at once to Hermēs, his own dear son:
 "Hermēs, it gives you much pleasure to act as a man's companion; you're glad to listen to those whom you enjoy! 335
 So, off with you now, escort Priam to the Achaians' hollow ships—but make sure he's not seen or recognized by the other Danaāns before you get to Pēleus's son."

So he spoke: the guide, Argos's slayer, did not ignore him, but at once strapped under his feet the beautiful sandals, 340 golden, immortal, that carried him over water or boundless land, as swift as the wind's blast, and took the wand with which he bewitches the eyes of those he chooses, while others he rouses from their sleep.
 With this in his hand the mighty slayer of Argos 345 took to the air, quickly reaching the Hellespont, and Troy, where he set off to walk in the likeness of a young prince with the first down on his chin, youth's most charming age.

When the two had driven past the great burial mound of Ilos, they halted their mules and horses to let them drink 350 at the river: by this time darkness had fallen over the land.

Looking around, the herald caught sight of someone nearby—Hermēs—and turning to Priam said: “Think quickly, scion of Dardanos—we need a smart decision!
 I see a man—I’m afraid we may soon be cut to pieces! 355 Let’s run for it in the chariot, or else perhaps clasp his knees and entreat him—he might take pity on us.”

So he spoke: the old man was terrified, his mind in turmoil, on his bowed limbs the hairs rose up, and he stood in a daze: but the Helper himself approached, 360 took the old man’s hand in his, and questioned him, saying: “Where are you off to, father, driving horses and mules through the fragrant night, when other mortals are sleeping?
 Aren’t you scared of the Achaians, your implacable enemies, whose breath is fury, who are very near around you? 365 Should one of them see you coming, through the swift dark night,
 conveying all that treasure, what answer would you have then?
 You’re not young yourself, and your attendant here’s old too:
 how stand off any man who decides to attack you? Myself, I shan’t harm you in any way, in fact I’d defend you 370 against anyone else: you’re so like my own dear father.”

Then the old man, Priam the godlike, made him this answer:
 “These things, dear child, are indeed correct as you state them—but one of the gods must still have had a protective hand over me, to have put a traveller like you in my path, 375 so happily met, so handsome, of so fine a demeanor, and sensible too: your parents are truly blessed!”

Then the guide, the slayer of Argos, gave him this reply:
 “All this indeed, old sir, you have fittingly spoken.
 But tell me now, please, and make a true declaration: 380 all these splendid treasures—are you shipping them out to foreign people abroad, to be kept in safety for you?
 Or is it that you’re all abandoning sacred Ilion out of fear now, since your finest warrior’s perished—your son? He never shrank from battling the Achaians.” 385

Then the old man, Priam the godlike, made this answer to him:
 “Who are you, most noble sir, and who, pray, are your parents, that you speak so well of the fate of my unlucky son?”

Then the guide, the slayer of Argos, made him this reply:
 “You’re testing me, old sir, when you ask about noble Hektōr. 390 Him I have often seen, in battle, where men win honor, with my own eyes, and when, after driving them to the ships, he would slay Argives, cut them down with the sharp bronze.
 We would stand there and marvel, because Achilles would not let us fight, being embittered at Atreus’s son. 395
 His henchman am I: the same well-built ship brought us here.
 From the Myrmidons I am sprung; my father is Polyktōr, a wealthy man—and an old one, just as you are.
 Six other sons he has, and I myself am the seventh.
 We cast lots, and I was chosen to serve out here; 400 and now I’ve come to the plain from the ships, for at first dawn the sharp-eyed Achaians are going to attack around the city.
 Sitting idle has made them impatient: the Achaians’ princes can no longer restrain them, so eager they are for battle.”

 Then the old man, Priam the godlike, made him this answer: 405
 “If you indeed are a henchman of Pēleus’s son Achilles, then please recount to me the whole truth of the matter:
 does my son remain by the ships, or has Achilles already hacked him to pieces, and thrown them out for his dogs?”

 Then the guide, the slayer of Argos, made him this reply: 410 “Old sir, not yet have dogs or birds of prey devoured him;
 the man is still lying there beside Achilles’ ship, among the huts, just as he was; though this is the twelfth day he’s been there, his flesh has not rotted, nor have maggots devoured it—the kind that feed on mortals killed in battle. 415 Achilles indeed now drags him around his dear comrade’s tomb, ruthlessly, daily, as soon as the light of dawn appears—yet does not disfigure him: go look, and you’d be amazed how dew-fresh he lies there, washed quite clean of blood and nowhere befouled. All the wounds that he was given 420 have closed—and many there were who thrust the bronze into him!
 This is how the blessed gods take good care of your son, corpse though he is, since he was dear to their hearts.”

 So he spoke: the old man rejoiced, and answered in these words:
 “My child, it’s a good thing indeed to make proper offerings 425 to the immortals: my son—if he ever truly existed—never forgot in his halls the gods who possess Olympus, so now they've remembered him, even in his destined death.

 But come, accept from me this beautiful drinking cup, and be my protector, and in company with the gods 430 escort me, until I arrive at the hut of Pēleus's son."

Then the guide, the slayer of Argos, made this reply:
 "You're testing my youth, old sir, but you'll not persuade me, when you ask me to take gifts from you behind Achilles' back!
 Him I fear and respect too much at heart to ever 435 defraud him—I wouldn't want to get into trouble later!
 But as your guide I'd go with you as far as famous Argos, protecting you carefully, in a swift ship or on foot, nor would any man, scorning your escort, dare to attack you."

So saying, the Helper took charge of chariot and horses, 440 quickly got his hands on the whip and the reins, and breathed potent strength into horses and mules alike; and when they reached the ditch and the battlements protecting the ships, where the guards were still busy preparing their evening meal, on all these the guide, the slayer of Argos, shed sleep, 445 then opened the gates, drew back the bars, and brought Priam inside, along with the splendid gifts on the wagon.
 But when they arrived at the hut of Peleus's son—that high cabin built by the Myrmidons for their king, with rough-cut fir-wood beams, and a roof set up over it, 450 made of bristling thatch that they'd harvested from the meadows, and around it enclosed a large courtyard for their king with a close-set palisade, the entrance to which was secured by one single fir beam: to close it took three Achaians, and three to haul open this huge cross-bar on the doors 455 (except for Achilles, who'd ram it home single-handed)— then Hermēs the Helper opened the entrance for the old man, and fetched in the splendid gifts for Pēleus's swift-footed son, and stepped down to the ground from the chariot, and declared:
 "Old sir, I who have come to you am an immortal god, 460
 Hermēs, sent here to escort you by my father.
 But now I must hasten back, and not come in where Achilles can see me: it would be most improper for an immortal god to be entertained by mortals, face to face! But you must go in there now, embrace the knees of Pēleus's son, 465 and in the name of his father and of his fine-haired mother—and of his child⁶—entreat him, attempt to touch his heart.”

Having so spoken, Hermēs then departed to high Olympos, while Priam stepped from his chariot to the ground, leaving Idaios there, to stay behind and look after 470 the horses and mules. He himself went straight to the dwelling where Achilles, dear to Zeus, was sitting; entered, and found the man himself, but his comrades were sitting elsewhere—two only, the hero Automedōn, and Alkimos, scion of Arēs, were in busy attendance on him. He was through with his meal, 475 with eating and drinking: the table still stood by him.
Unnoticed, great Priam came in, approached Achilles, embraced his knees, and kissed his hands—those terrible murderous hands, that had killed so many of his sons.
As when blind delusion possesses a man to murder 480 someone in his own country, and he flees to an alien people, to some wealthy man’s house, and wonder grips those who see him—so Achilles was amazed at the sight of godlike Priam, and the rest were likewise amazed, and looked at one another.
Then Priam addressed Achilles, entreating him in these words: 485 “Remember your own father, godlike Achilles, whose years equal mine, on old age’s deathly threshold:
him too, it may well be, those dwelling on his frontiers are harassing, with no one to ward off ruin from him.
But he at least, while he hears that you’re still living, 490 is happy at heart, and hopes from day to day that he’ll see his dear son returning from the land of Troy—whereas I am wholly ill-fated: of the best sons I sired, in the broad land of Troy, not one, I tell you, is left:
fifty I had, when the Achaians’ sons first came; 495 nineteen were born to me from one single womb, the rest other women bore in my halls. But most of these, though many, had their limbs unstrung by impetuous Arēs. The one true son I had left me to guard the city and its people

6. Achilles’ only son, by Deidameia, was Pyrrhos, also known as Neoptolemos. There is grim irony here, since according to one tradition (Little Iliad fr. 18 = West 2003 [A]: 136–37), it was Neoptolemos—one of the warriors in the Wooden Horse—who during the sack of Troy killed Priam, while the latter was seeking sanctuary at the altar of Zeus. For this outrage Neoptolemos was later slain at Delphi (HE 2: 569).

you slew untimely as he fought in defense of his country— 500 Hektör! It's for his sake I've come, now, to the Argives' ships, to recover him from you. I bring with me ransom past counting.
 Revere the gods, Achilles, and to me show pity, remembering your own father: but I'm the more pitiable, for I've borne what no other mortal on earth has yet endured: 505 I've brought to my lips the hand of the man who killed my son."

So saying, he stirred in Achilles the urge to weep for his father:
 he took the old man by the hand, gently pushed him away.
 Both had their memories: Priam of Hektör, killer of men, as, bitterly weeping, he crouched at Achilles' feet, 510 while Achilles wept, now for his own father, now again for Patroklos: their joint mourning resounded throughout the hut.
 But as soon as noble Achilles had had his fill of weeping, and the urge for it had departed from his heart and limbs, he rose from his chair, took the old man by the hand, 515 and raised him up, pitying his grey hair, his grey beard, and then addressed him, speaking with winged words:
 "Unhappy man, your heart's indeed endured many sorrows!
 How could you bear to come to the Achaians' ships, alone, to look me straight in the face, the man who slaughtered so many 520 of your noble sons? You must have a heart of iron.
 Come then, sit down on this chair, and let's allow our distress to lie at rest in our hearts, for all our grieving, for there's no profit accrues from numbing lamentation:
 that's how the gods spun life's thread for unhappy mortals— 525 to live amid sorrow, while they themselves are uncaring.
 There are two great jars, sunk down in the floor of Zeus's abode,⁷ full of gifts he hands out, one of ills, the other of blessings; and the man who gets a mixed handout from thundering Zeus will sometimes encounter trouble, and sometimes good luck; 530

7. The jars (πίθοι, pithoi) of Zeus are generally treated as a moral allegory, but there is something more practical, more physical and earthy, about the image (Leaf, 2: 467; Onians 395–97, 404, 409; Richardson 330). These are the great clay pithoi familiar from Minoan and Mycenaean excavations, which were indeed sunk in the floor of the storeroom. Like words, that are winged, and escape the barrier of one's teeth, evils were in the beginning thought of as physical entities, to be stored, like anything else, in jars. As Leaf says, what we have here is early thinking applied to what we (and indeed already Plato, who for "gifts" substituted κῆρες (kēros), "fates", Rep. 2.379D) think of as a moral abstraction.

whereas he who gets only ills Zeus renders an outcast, driven by evil hunger to wander across the face of the sacred earth, with respect from neither gods nor mortals.
 So the gods bestowed on Pēleus the most splendid gifts from his birth onward, for he outstripped all mortal men 535 in wealth and prosperity, ruled as lord of the Myrmidons, and though he was mortal they married him to a goddess.
 Yet even on him the god laid evil: no family of lordly sons was born to him in his halls, but only the one short-lived male child. Nor am I able 540 to care for him as he ages, but sit here, far from my country, in Troy, bringing grief to you and to your offspring.
 Yet you too, old sir, were once, we hear, fortunate.
 Everywhere southward as far as Lesbos, seat of Makar, or Phrygia inland, with the vast Hellespont—here, they say, 545 through your wealth and sons, old sir, you were preeminent.
 But since the heavenly gods brought this trouble upon you, round your city the fighting, the killings have never stopped.
 Bear up then, don't nurse unending grief in your heart:
 you'll gain nothing by mourning your son, you won't 550 bring him back to life; before that you'll have other troubles."

Then the old man, Priam the godlike, answered him, saying:
 "Zeus's nursling, you'll not make me sit, so long as Hektōr lies uncared-for among the huts! So, waste no time, release him—let me see him myself—and accept the ransom, 555 the very great ransom, we bring you! Enjoy it, and go back home to your own country, now that you've spared me [to live myself, and to gaze on the light of the sun].⁸

Eyeing him angrily, swift-footed Achilles exclaimed:
 "Provoke me no further, old man: I myself am minded 560 to give you back Hektōr, since a messenger's reached me from Zeus—the mother who bore me, daughter to the Old Man of the Sea.
 What's more, I am well aware, Priam—you do not deceive me—that it was some god brought you here to the Achaians' ships:
 no mortal man would dare, however youthful and strong, 565

8. Line 558 is missing in some MSS, and the scholiasts do not refer to it. It may have been interpolated in the belief that "spared" (ἔασας, eāsas) needed an explanatory phrase to complete the predicate (Richardson 335), though it stands on its own elsewhere in the same book (569, 684).

to enter the camp, or could make his way past the guards, or easily thrust back the great bar on our gateway.
 Stop working on my emotions amid my sorrows, old sir, lest I might not spare even you, while you're here in my hut, suppliant though you are, and break Zeus's ordinances." 570

So he spoke: the old man was frightened, and heeded his words.

Now the son of Pēleus strode out of the hut like a lion:
 not alone, but two of his henchmen accompanied him, the hero Automedōn and Alkimos, those whom Achilles most honored of all his comrades now Patroklos was dead. 575

Together they unyoked both the mules and the horses, brought in the herald, the old man's public crier, sat him down on a chair, and from the smooth-running wagon took the boundless ransom for Hektōr's head, but left there two robes and a fine-woven tunic, in which Achilles 580 would wrap the corpse before yielding it to be carried home.

Then he summoned the handmaids, told them to wash and anoint it—having first moved it away, to stop Priam seeing his son, lest, heartbroken, he failed to restrain his wrath at the sight, and Achilles' own heart should be stirred to fury, so that 585
 he murdered Priam, thus breaking the ordinances of Zeus.

So when the handmaids had washed it and anointed it with oil, and shrouded it in a fine robe and a tunic besides, Achilles himself raised the body and placed it upon a bier, which he and his comrades lifted onto the polished wagon. 590
 Then he heaved a sigh, and addressed his dear comrade by name:
 "Don't be angry with me, Patroklos, if you chance to hear, even in Hādēs' realm, that I've given back noble Hektōr to his dear father: the ransom he offered was not unfitting—and of this I'll allot to you all that's your proper due." 595

That said, noble Achilles went back inside his hut, sat down on the richly worked chair from which he'd arisen, against the opposite wall, and then addressed Priam, saying:
 "Your son, old sir, has been released to you as you wanted, and is lying on a bier: at daybreak you shall yourself 600 see him as you take him, but for now let's turn to supper—for even fair-haired Niobē was minded to eat, though all her twelve children had perished there in her halls, six daughters and six sons in the prime of their youth!

 The sons were slain by Apollo with shafts from his silver bow, 605 out of anger against Niobē; the daughters by Artemis the huntress—Niobē had praised herself over fair-cheeked Lētō, who, she said, bore two only, whereas she was mother to many.
 Her brood Lētō's twins then slaughtered, every last one.
 Nine days they lay in their blood, nor was there anyone 610 to bury them: Kronos's son turned their people to stones.
 But on the tenth day they were buried by the heavenly gods, and Niobē's mind turned to food, since she'd tired of weeping.
 Now somewhere among the rocks, in those lonely mountains, on Sipylus—where, they say, goddesses have their abodes: 615 the nymphs who move nimbly, dancing round Achelōios—there, though stone, she broods on the woes that the gods dealt her.
 So come, let the two of us likewise, noble old sir, take thought for food: after that you can mourn your dear son, when you've returned him to Ilion: much wept over he will be.”⁹ 620

With that swift Achilles sprang up, and cut the throat of a white sheep: his comrades skinned it, butchered it neatly, cut up the meat with skill, threaded the bits on skewers, grilled them with care, then drew them all off. That done, Automedon brought bread and put it on the table 625
 in handsome baskets, while Achilles shared out the meat.
 So they reached out their hands to the good things ready for them;
 but when they'd satisfied their desire for food and drink, then Priam, scion of Dardanos, gazed in wonder at Achilles, his stature and beauty, how like the gods he appeared; 630 while at Priam, scion of Dardanos, Achilles gazed in wonder, observing his noble features, listening as he spoke.

9. Achilles suggests a meal even though he has himself recently eaten (475–76): as Graziosi 2011 says (449) “he is now imparting a lesson he has only just learned” (cf. 19.205–14 and 314–55). The use of the myth of Niobē as a recommendation for this is odd, since Niobē was an example of never-ending sorrow, even when petrified (a vaguely human-looking rock formation on Mt. Sipylus dripping with tear-like water gave rise to this aspect of the myth). Other details, not extant elsewhere, seem to have been introduced in the Homeric narrative for symbolic effect: the nine days before burial match both the time Hektōr's body lies in Achilles' hut and the mourning period in Troy (664–65, 784–87; Richardson 340), while the gods' personal care for the burial of Niobē's offspring foreshadows divine concern for Hektōr's obsequies. The Achelōios is a local river: there were several of that name, and Achelōios can be “a generic name for rivers or water in general” (Richardson 342).

But when they'd had their pleasure of looking at one another, then the first to speak was the old man, Priam the godlike:
 "Let me bed down now, Zeus's nursling, so that at last 635
 we may take our rest and get our fill of sweet slumber:
 for never yet have my eyes closed under my eyelids since at your hands my son was bereft of life—I've been lamenting ceaselessly, nursing my countless sorrows, rolling about in the dung in my courtyard's enclosure. 640
 But now I've tasted food, permitted fire-bright wine to pass down my throat: before that I'd taken nothing."

Thereupon Achilles instructed his comrades and the handmaids to set bedsteads under the colonnade, and lay upon them fine purple wool throws, and over these to spread blankets, 645 topped off with fleecy cloaks to serve as coverlets.
 Out from the hall went the handmaids, each holding a torch, and quickly made up two beds. In a teasing voice swift-footed Achilles then had this to say to Priam:
 "Best sleep outside, good old sir! Some Achaian counselor 650 might come over here—they're always having sessions with me, seeking advice in their planning, a common practice—but if one of them saw you, during the swift black night, he might go and tell Agamemnōn, the people's shepherd, and then there'd be, ah, delay in the release of the body. 655
 Now, tell me this, and be honest: how many days do you have in mind for the funeral of noble Hektōr, so I hold off that long, and restrain the troops as well?"

Then the old man, Priam the godlike, answered him, saying:
 "If you truly mean that I can complete noble Hektōr's burial, 660 you'd be doing me a great kindness by acting thus—you know how we're shut up inside the city, and firewood has to be fetched a long way from the mountains, and the Trojans are really scared.
 Nine days we would mourn him in our halls, and then on the tenth we'd inter him, and there'd be public feasting; 665 on the eleventh we'd raise the funeral mound over him—and on the twelfth, if we have to, we'll join battle once again."

Then noble swift-footed Achilles answered him, saying:
 "All these things, aged Priam, shall be as you propose:
 I shall hold back the attack for the time that you've requested." 670

So saying, he took hold of the aged man's right hand by the wrist, to allay any fear that might be in his heart.
 Then they lay down to sleep there, in the dwelling's forecourt, the herald and Priam, with a great deal to think about;
 but Achilles himself slept at the back of the well-built hut, with the fair-checked Briseïs now lying there by his side.¹⁰ 675

All others, both gods, and mortals, chariot marshals,
 slept the night through, overcome by gentle slumber;
 but on Hermēs the Helper sleep could get no hold as he pondered on how he was going to escort King Priam 680 away from the ships unseen by the watchful gate guards.
 So he stood close, above his head, and addressed him, saying:
 "Ah, old sir, you're not bothered by danger, still fast asleep among enemies as you are, since Achilles has spared you!
 Now you've ransomed your son, and a great deal you gave for him; 685
 yet to get you back alive would cost your surviving sons three times that amount in ransom, were Atreus's son Agamemnōn or all the Achaïans to learn you were here."

He spoke,
 and the old man, badly frightened, made the herald get up, while Hermēs himself yoked the mules and the horses for them, 690 and briskly drove them out of the camp. No one noticed them.
 But when they came to the ford of the swift-flowing river, eddying Xanthos, begotten by immortal Zeus, then Hermēs went on his way to lofty Olympos, as saffron-robed Dawn was spreading across the entire earth, 695 and the others, weeping and wailing, drove the horses to the city, while the mules drew the dead body. Once more no man, nor any fine-sashed woman, recognized them now, save only Kassandrē, as lovely as golden Aphroditē, who'd gone up onto the citadel, and recognized her dear father 700 as he stood in the chariot, and the herald, the city's crier—and him she saw stretched on a bier in the mule-drawn wagon.
 Then she shrieked aloud, and went screaming throughout the city:
 "Go look, men and women of Troy! Go now and see Hektōr,

10. Achilles, having eaten, now fulfills the second part of his mother Thetis's advice: see above, 128–32.

if ever while he yet lived you were happy to see him coming home from the battle, great joy to our city and all its people!” 705

So she spoke: not one man was left behind in the city, nor any woman: upon them all came sorrow past bearing.
It was near the city gates they encountered the dead man’s escort.
His dear wife and his lady mother were the first to fling themselves 710 aboard the smooth-running wagon, tearing their hair, to cradle Hektōr’s head: the thronged bystanders all wept, and from then all day long until sunset, there by the gates, they’d have gone on shedding tears and mourning for Hektōr had the old man not called out to the crowd from his chariot: 715 “Make way for the mules to come through! You’ll get your fill of lamenting later, as soon as I’ve brought him home.”

So he spoke: they stood to one side, made way for the wagon.
When Hektōr’s body reached Priam’s famed palace, they moved it to an inlaid bedstead, and by his side placed minstrels, 720 leaders of dirges: these chanted the song of lamentation while the women in chorus added their lament to the dirge.
Of these it was white-armed Andromachē led the mourning, cradling in her arms the head of Hektōr the killer: “Husband, perished too young, you’re leaving me a widow 725 here in our home, and the son’s still only an infant that we, both ill-fated, made: nor do I believe he will ever come to the years of manhood—before then this city will be leveled, since you, its guardian, have perished, who protected it, kept safe its devoted wives, its children. 730 Soon enough these’ll be cargo aboard the hollow ships, and I among them; and you, my child, will go with me to a place where you must labor at unseemly tasks, slaving for a rough master, or else some Achaian will strong-arm you down from the battlements, a grim death, 735 angered maybe because it was Hektōr killed his brother—or father, or son, since there are so many Achaians have bitten the boundless dust at Hektōr’s hands, for in grim warfare your father was far from gentle.
So there’s public mourning for him throughout the city— 740 and unspeakable grief and sorrow you’ve brought on your parents, Hektōr: to me, above all, there’s left this bitter loss, for you never, dying, reached out to me from your bed,

you never uttered for me some enduring last word that I could have recalled, night and day, as I shed my tears.” 745

So she spoke, weeping: the women added their own lament, and among them now Hekabē led the passionate mourning: “Hektōr, of all my children far the dearest to my heart, while you still were living you were beloved of the gods, they cared for you even in your destiny of death: 750 those other sons of mine swift-footed Achilles, whenever he took one, would sell abroad, beyond the unharvested sea, to Samos or Imbros or mist-enshrouded Lēmnos;
but you—though he’d robbed you of life with the keen-edged bronze, and often dragged you around the tomb of his comrade, 755 Patroklos, whom you slew—yet never could bring him back to life—you lie now in my halls as though new-slain, dewy-fresh, like one whom lately Apollo, he of the silver bow, has assailed with his gentle shafts, and put to death.”

So she spoke, weeping, and stirred up unending lamentation. 760
Then, third in line, to lead the mourning came Helen:
“Hektōr, most dear to my heart of all my husband’s brothers!
Yes, indeed, my husband is Aléxandos the godlike, who brought me hither to Troy—ah, would that I’d died first!
This is now the twentieth¹¹ year that’s passed since I 765 ran off from home, abandoning my own country; yet from you I’ve never had one mean or degrading word, and if anyone else reviled me here in these halls, one of your brothers or sisters, or a brother’s well-dressed wife, or your mother—your father could have been mine, he was 770 always so gentle—then you’d talk them round and restrain them with your personal gentleness and the gentle things you said.
So I weep, sad at heart, for both you and my ill-starred self,

11. This is the tenth year of the war, and whatever allowances we make for such things as the time taken to assemble the expedition, the delay of the Greek fleet setting out from Aulis, or Paris’s travels with Helen en route to Troy, the figure Helen gives is simply incompatible with the accepted chronology (e.g., with the return of Odysseus, likewise placed in the twentieth year). It is now generally argued (e.g., by Richardson 358) that “twenty” is a rough Homeric equivalent for any time more than “ten”, thus eliding both Helen’s and Odysseus’s dates to a vague extension beyond the canonical ten years of the war; but how likely is it that any poet or rhapsode would, at this point, choose a figure so certain to provoke dissent? For the same reason, textual corruption is highly unlikely. The problem remains.

for no more in all broad Troy is there anyone left who's gentle or loving to me: all regard me with horror." 775

So she spoke, weeping, and the countless throng lamented.
Then the aged Priam addressed his people, saying:
"Fetch in firewood now to the city, don't be scared at heart lest the Argives set up some smart ambush: for Achilles, when sending me back from the black ships, guaranteed 780 that he'd do us no harm until the twelfth day's dawn from now."

So he spoke, and at that they harnessed both oxen and mules to wagons, and quickly assembled outside the city.
For nine days they carted back timber in abundance;
But when the tenth dawn came, bringing light to mortals, 785
Then, shedding tears, they carried out bold Hektōr, laid his corpse on top of the pyre, and set it ablaze.

But when Dawn appeared, lately born, with her rosy fingers, then a crowd collected around illustrious Hektōr's pyre, and when they were all assembled and gathered together, 790 first they quenched the still-smoldering pyre with fire-bright wine in each part that the fire's force reached, and next his brothers and comrades gathered up the white bones, still mourning, with great tears streaming down their cheeks, took them and laid them away in a golden casket,¹² 795 wrapped in a soft purple cloth, and at once after that, put the box in a dug-out grave, and covered it over with great close-set stones, and last, very quickly, heaped up the burial mound, with lookouts all round it, in case the well-greaved Achaians attacked them before the stated time; 800 and when they'd raised the mound, they all went back, then sat down together and shared a glorious feast in the palace of Priam, the king who was Zeus's nursling.

Such were the funeral rites for Hektōr, breaker of horses.

12. There is a remarkable parallel to this golden container (λάρναξ, larnax) in the actually surviving gold larnax from the Macedonian royal tomb at Vergina, with the bones of the tomb's occupant still in it.

Synopsis

BOOK 1

1–7: The theme of the work stated: the destructive wrath of Achilles, and its effects, including the fulfillment of Zeus's plans for mankind.

8–42: Chrysēs, priest of Apollo, comes to the ships of the Achaians offering ransom for the return of his daughter Chryseïs, at present the captive prize of the commander in chief, Agamemnōn, who—against the general wishes of the assembled Achaians—rebuffs him discourteously. Dismissed, Chrysēs prays to Apollo.

43–100: Apollo hears his prayer and visits the Achaian army with plague. After nine days of his deadly arrows, an emergency Achaian assembly is called, and Achilles invites the priest Kalchas to offer an explanation of why Apollo is offended. Kalchas claims that it is because of Agamemnōn's act in refusing to ransom Chryses' daughter.

101–305: Agamemnōn, furious with Kalchas, nevertheless offers to release Chryseïs, but only if he is awarded a comparable woman as prize to replace her loss. How, asks Achilles, can we do this? The prizes have been distributed. Give her up, and we'll recompense you three- or fourfold when Troy falls. No, cries Agamemnōn, it must be now, and if the Achaians don't find me another woman, I'll take yours, or Aias's, or that of Odysseus, by force if necessary. He then makes arrangements for the return of Chryseïs. At this Achilles announces he will withdraw from the fighting and take his troops home. Agamemnōn remains obdurate: Achilles can go, but he, Agamemnōn, will take his woman Briseïs regardless. Achilles is about to draw his sword and kill Agamemnōn, but is restrained by the invisible goddess Athēnē. Old Nestōr of Pylos tries to calm both of them down in a long rambling speech, telling Achilles to respect his sceptered king, and Agamemnōn to give over his wrath against their best warrior. Both stand firm, and the assembly breaks up.

306–427: The ship with Chryseïs aboard leaves. The Achaian troops purify themselves. Two heralds are sent by Agamemnōn to remove Briseïs from Achilles' hut, and they do so without incident. Achilles prays to his mother, the sea nymph Thetis, telling her of the incident. She comes up from the sea to comfort him, and he relates the whole story. He then begs her to seek solace for him by persuading Zeus to favor the Trojans and to pen up the Achaians by their ships to teach Agamemnōn a lesson. Thetis bemoans the short life that is her son's destiny, but promises to do what she can with Zeus—"and I think I shall persuade him." On that note she leaves him.

428–92: Meanwhile Chryseis is returned to her father by Odysseus, a rich sacrifice is made to Apollo, and Chrysēs prays Apollo to call off the plague on the Achaians. Apollo takes note. A celebratory feast of offering meat follows. Odysseus and his crew sleep by their ship. Next morning they have a fair wind sailing back to the Achaian camp. Achilles meanwhile settles into a miserable withdrawal from the action.

493–611: The gods have been absent feasting with the remote Aithiōpians but now return. Thetis fulfills her promise to Achilles by petitioning Zeus to favor the Trojans until the Achaians make proper amends to him. Although admitting this will get him in trouble with his sister-wife Hērē, Zeus bows his head in avowal that he will do as Thetis asks. Zeus then returns to his palace, where the other gods are. Hērē has indeed noted his conference with Thetis, guesses its substance, and challenges him with it. A barbed exchange ends with a threat of violence from Zeus, and Hērē backs off in fear. Her lame son Hēphaistos, the smith god, smooths things over, warns Hērē to behave, and pours out drinks all round. The other gods laugh at him hobbling about. The day ends in feasting. Finally all retire to their own dwellings, and Hērē duly sleeps beside Zeus.

BOOK 2

1–34: Zeus is insomniac with worry (the war, Achilles), and sends Agamemnōn a destructive Dream, with the message that the gods are now in agreement and the Achaians will conquer Troy. The Dream duly comes to Agamemnōn and delivers this message.

35–83: Convinced that he can indeed take Troy, Agamemnōn gets up and orders the Achaians to assembly. But first he calls a meeting of the elders, to report the Dream's message, and to propose testing the spirit of the troops by telling them to board their ships and pull out: the elders are to stop those who might fall for the ruse. Tactful Nestōr gets up and says that if anyone else had reported this dream, he wouldn't have been believed, but since it was the commander in chief, they should set about arming the Achaians. No reference to the testing of the troops.

84–210: The troops gather, urged on by Rumor. Agamemnōn addresses them, saying that Zeus has told him to pull out the troops and go home. He agrees. They've been at it nine years, have lost men, have got nowhere. Their ships are rotting. They will never take Troy. So, he says, let's go home. The result is a stampede for the ships, like the Aegean whipped up by the wind, and the men begin knocking the props from under the hulls prior to launching.

For the first time, the Achaians seem to be doing something "beyond what was fated", and this stirs action on Olympos. To stop the flight, Hērē sends down Athēnē, who delegates the job to Odysseus. Grabbing Agamemnōn's scepter, he sets about it, arguing politely with the officers, but savagely upbraiding the rank and file. The rout stops, and the men return to their seats, noisily, like waves thundering on a beach.

211–393: Thersitēs, an ugly, rabble-rousing soldier, gets up and urges them to go, leaving Agamemnōn, who’s dishonored a better man in Achilles, behind with his prizes. Odysseus rebukes Thersitēs for gross insubordination and strikes him with the scepter. The men all laugh at the sight and praise Odysseus, who now addresses them.

Yes, it’s been a long war, he says. But to go on so long and then return empty-handed would be shameful. He reminds them of the omen at Aulis, the snake that ate the sparrow and her eight chicks, but was then turned to stone by Zeus—meaning, a nine-year war and victory in the tenth!

Loud cheers from the troops. Next Nestōr speaks: Yes, Zeus promised us victory. And don’t let’s forget our oaths! And you, Agamemnōn, sort the troops by tribe and clan: that way you’ll know who’s brave and who’s a coward. Yes, says Agamemnōn, all true—but Zeus has brought me trouble, led me into a quarrel with Achilles over a girl. Once we all agree, the Trojans are done for. All right, break for now: prepare arms, have a bite to eat, and death to shirkers!

394–483: The Argives eat a meal, and sacrifice to the gods, as does Agamemnōn, praying for success in battle. (Zeus accepts the sacrifice, but plans to increase the hazards of war.) He and the leaders then feast. Nestōr proposes that they go through the ranks encouraging and marshaling the troops. Agamemnōn agrees. The troops are drawn up and march out to the plain.

484–759: The poet appeals to the Muses to list the commanders and princes of the Achaian forces, while conceding that the main mass of troops is a multitude beyond reckoning. What follows, city by city, is the so-called Catalogue of Ships. Here and there the strict Catalogue is interspersed with personal details: e.g., Aias son of Oileus (529–30) is described as being short but a great spearman; Menelaōs (589–90) is hot to revenge himself for all the trouble and sorrow over Helen; Achilles (689–91) won Briseis at the sack of Lyrnessos; Prōtesilaōs (700–702), who would be the first Achaian killed when he jumped ashore at Troy, had left behind a bride and a half-built house.

760–877: The best horses are those of Eumēlos; the best warrior, while Achilles continues withdrawn in his wrath, is Aias son of Telamōn. Zeus sends Iris (in the likeness of a son of Priam) to alert the Trojans, and instruct Hektōr, similarly, to marshal Troy’s own great international host, which is listed far more briefly.

BOOK 3

1–75: The Trojan and Achaian armies approach each other, and Paris Aléxandros struts out ahead, challenging the Achaians to single combat. Menelaōs springs down from his chariot to take up the challenge, but Paris starts back at the sight of him, and retreats to the ranks, where he gets a contemptuous scolding for his conduct from his brother Hektōr. Paris says, Yes, right, but don’t despise the gifts of Aphrodītē, she’s a goddess. And if you want me to fight, I’ll take on Menelaōs now in a duel—winner gets the woman and her goods, ends the war.

76–244: Hektōr, speaking between the two armies, announces this offer. Menelaōs takes it up and calls for a sacrifice and a solemn oath, to be sworn by Priam in person, agreeing to the terms. In the likeness of Priam's daughter Laodikē, Iris meanwhile goes to Helen and invites her to come and watch the duel from the ramparts. She goes and is asked by Priam to identify some of the Achaian leaders below. Self-pitying, modest, and sorrowful, Helen nevertheless points out Agamemnōn (her husband's brother), Odysseus, and Aias, with vivid touches.

245–447: Down below Priam is briefed, brought to the sacrifice, and swears the oath, but cannot bear to watch the duel, and returns to the city. The two contestants arm themselves and engage. Menelaōs's sword shatters on Paris's helmet: he then leaps and grabs the helmet, choking Paris on the leather chin strap, and starts dragging him off the field. But Aphrodītē, invisible, first breaks the chin strap, so that the helmet comes off in Menelaōs's hand, then wraps Paris in a magical mist and wafts him away to Helen's boudoir; next she disguises herself as an old wool carder and lures Helen away from the ramparts to join him. Helen sees through the disguise and is angry. Aphrodītē threatens her, terrifies her into submission. Helen confronts Paris, furious but conflicted, wanting him to fight, scared that he'll be killed. Paris decides the issue by calling her to bed, and she follows him.

448–61: Menelaōs searches everywhere for the vanished Paris but cannot find him. None of the Trojans or allies can help him (and they wouldn't have kept quiet had they seen him, says Homer, since they all detested Paris). At this point Agamemnōn announces that the victory clearly goes to Menelaōs and demands the return of Helen and her property. The Achaians cheer his words.

BOOK 4

1–73: On Olympos, the gods are drinking and observing the scene in and around Troy. Zeus, needling Athēnē and Hērē, agrees that Menelaōs has won the duel, but points out that while he's supported by these two goddesses, the unnamed Paris Aléxandros always has Aphrodītē on his side. What's to be done? Should the Olympians stir up war again or make a lasting peace? Do that, and Troy survives, while Menelaōs gets Helen back.

How, Hērē demands, can Zeus undo all the work she's put in to make trouble for Priam and his city? All right, says Zeus, I'll give in on this one: clearly you'd eat Priam raw if you could. But Troy has done well by me, and there's no city I honor more, so next time I want to ruin a city, let me be! Right, says Hērē: my favorite cities are Argos, Sparta, and Mykēnai: sack any of them when you feel like it. But I'm a god too, and our Father's eldest daughter; so let's agree. And tell Athēnē to go down and see if she can get the Trojans to be the first to break their oath over the truce.

74–219: Zeus gives the order, and Athēnē darts down. Both sides see her. Is it to be peace or war? She finds Pandaros the archer, Lykaōn's son, and persuades him to launch an arrow at Menelaös. Pandaros does so, but Athênē makes sure it only grazes its target. Nevertheless, it draws blood, greatly alarming Agamemnôn, who fears for his brother's life. Menelaös assures him that the wound is not a serious one, however, and Agamemnôn sends for Machaôn, son of Asklēpios, god of medicine, who sucks out the (perhaps poisoned) blood and applies healing herbs.

220–421: The Trojans advance, and Agamemnôn in person descends from his chariot and goes through the ranks exhorting the troops, praising the eager and chastising those hanging back. He lauds Idomeneus and his Krētans, the two Aiases (their dark forces like a gathering storm cloud), and old Nestōr (too old to fight, but mustering the Pylians, mounted and infantry, both in good order), but rebukes Menestheus and Odysseus, who are not yet engaged (Agamemnôn withdraws a reproof after a stinging response from Odysseus). Diomēdēs is treated to a harangue about the superior fighting ability of his father, Tydeus, but wisely says nothing, and shuts up his charioteer, Sthenelos, when he calls Agamemnôn a liar.

422–544: The Achaians move silently forward into battle rank upon rank. The Trojans and their various-tongued foreign allies are noisy: like bleating ewes waiting to be milked, says Homer. They are urged on by the war god Arēs, while the Achaians are encouraged by Athênē. Strife (Eris) roams the battlefield making trouble. Various encounters are depicted in detail, with wounds inflicted by spear or sword vividly described, as well as the struggles to strip a fallen enemy of his gear. This is the first of many such battle scenes. Antilochos and Aias show their prowess as warriors. Apollo calls on the Trojans to rouse themselves, while Athênē remains vigilant on behalf of the Achaians.

BOOK 5

1–94: Diomēdēs, strengthened and encouraged by Athênē, begins his aristeia (display of excellence as a warrior: in effect a killing spree).

Athênē leads Arēs out of the fighting and sits him down by the river, saying they should both stay out of the battle and let Zeus decide the issue. Menelaös, Idomeneus, and Mēriōnēs distinguish themselves, and Diomēdēs storms like a winter torrent that bursts walls and embankments.

95–317: Lykaōn's son Pandaros hits Diomēdēs in the right shoulder with a well-aimed arrow, and boasts over the shot. This does not stop Diomēdēs, who has his charioteer Sthenelos pull out the arrow (presumably against the barbs, which is why the blood spurts out: Diomēdēs shows no sign of pain, all part of the aristeia). He prays to Athênē, who says, go to it, just don't tangle with any god—except Aphroditē. Now he attacks the Trojans. Aineias sees him and teams up with Pandaros, who chatters on about himself till told to stop. Sthenelos warns Diomēdēs about them; Diomēdēs ignores the warning, kills the still-boasting Pandaros, and knocks Aineias out, shattering his hip with a huge rock. But Aphroditē protects Aineias—he is, after all, her son—and starts carrying him off the battlefield.

318–453: Diomēdēs pursues Aphroditē and wounds her in the wrist. She screams and drops Aineias. Apollo scoops him up and hides him in a dark cloud. Iris takes Aphroditē out of the fighting. She borrows Arēs’ chariot and horses, returns with Iris to Olympos, and runs, pain-racked, to her mother Diōnē, who hears her story, tells her to endure, and regales her with stories of other goddesses who’ve been similarly hurt. She then wipes off the ichor, and Aphroditē, being divine, is at once healed and as good as new. Athēnē and Hērē go to Zeus and tattle maliciously about Aphroditē’s little accident. Zeus summons her and tells her to stick to love, marriage, and such, and to leave warfare to Arēs and Athēnē.

Diomēdēs meanwhile goes for Aineias three times, only to be beaten back by Apollo. On his fourth attempt, the god tells him to remember he’s mortal, not a god, and to back off. He does. Apollo wafts Aineias away to Pergamon, where Lētō and Artemis heal him in their shrine. Meanwhile Apollo creates a phantom image of Aineias for Achaians and Trojans to fight over.

454–667: Apollo urges Arēs to take out Diomēdēs, but sits out the fight himself. Arēs, in the likeness of a Thracian leader, Akamas, urges on the Trojans. Sarpēdōn, leader of the Lycians (and a son of Zeus) accuses Hektōr of lackluster performance. Hektōr starts rallying the Trojans. Like blown chaff from a threshing floor, the dust from the horses’ hooves whitens the Achaians, and Arēs brings darkness to aid the Trojans. Apollo brings the healed and fit Aineias back from Pergamon, and he rejoins the battle. Both Aiasēs, Odysseus, and Agamemnōn urge on the Achaians, who hold firm. Aineias’s victims fall like felled firs. Hektōr enters the fray, accompanied by Arēs: Diomēdēs shudders and calls for a retreat: the man has a god with him, we can’t fight gods. Tlēpolemos challenges Sarpēdōn (grandson of Zeus against Zeus’s son). Much exchange of insults and rival genealogies and achievements: Tlēpolemos spears Sarpēdōn in the thigh; Sarpēdōn kills Tlēpolemos. Sarpēdōn is carried out of the battle with the spear still trailing from his thigh.

668–766: Odysseus attacks the Lycians. Hektōr (ignoring Sarpēdōn’s appeal for assistance) advances, with Arēs, against the Achaians. Sarpēdōn’s comrade Pelagōn pulls out the spear from his thigh. The Achaians, seeing Arēs, steadily give ground, and have many casualties. Hērē and Athēnē seeing this, decide to intervene themselves. Hērē readies the chariot; Athēnē arms herself, takes the aegis and a spear, and they drive out to Zeus, sunning himself on the mountain, and enquire whether he’ll mind if they knock Arēs out of the fighting. No, says Zeus, let Athēnē do it; she’s used to dealing with him.

767–908: Hērē and Athēnē drive to Troy, leave their chariot (hidden in a magical mist), and strut off, says Homer, like a brace of wild pigeons, to aid and encourage the Achaians, which Hērē does in the likeness of loud-voiced Stentōr to get maximum audibility. Finding Diomēdēs nursing his wound, Athēnē, like Agamemnōn earlier, compares him, to his disadvantage, with his father Tydeus (though assuring him of her support). Why, says Diomēdēs, I’m obeying your order: no fighting against gods (except for Aphroditē)! We saw Arēs in action, so we pulled back. No problem, says Athēnē. Arēs promised me and Hērē he'd help the Achaians, but he's gone back on his word and is fighting with the Trojans! So let's at him! She takes over from Sthenelos as charioteer, and the chariot creaks under her great weight. They charge. Athēnē deflects Arēs' spear; Diomēdēs drives his own spear into Arēs' nether belly, and the god roars as loud as nine or ten thousand men. Like a black cloud he goes up into the sky to Zeus on Olympos, where he complains loudly about his treatment. Zeus, though contemptuous of Arēs, nevertheless tells Paičōn the divine physician to heal his wound (he's family), and Paičōn duly does so. Zeus's daughter Hēbē bathes and dresses him, and he returns to sit by Zeus, magically healed, self-confidence restored. Hērē and Athēnē, having stopped his pro-Trojan activities, now return to Zeus's abode themselves.

BOOK 6

1–118: Free of gods now on both sides, the battle rages on. Aias, Diomēdēs (despite his wound), Odysseus, and others press forward, killing as they go. Menelaōs takes Adrēstos alive when his fleeing horses get entangled in a bush, and is on the point of agreeing to his prisoner's offer of ransom when his brother Agamemnōn storms up, calling for relentless slaughter, and kills Adrēstos himself. Old Nestōr calls for a continued advance—no stopping for armor-stripping or other booty!

On the Trojan side, Helenos the diviner tells Aineias and Hektōr to rally the troops for a stand, but also recommends that the women of Troy, en masse, petition Athēnē with sacrifice and prayer to hold back the raging Diomēdēs. Hektōr calls on the Trojans to hold firm while he returns to Troy to deliver this message.

119–236: Encountering Glaukos, a companion of the Trojan ally Sarpēdōn, on the battlefield, and fearing that he might be up against a god again, Diomēdēs asks him who he is (presumably Glaukos is wearing a helmet that conceals his identity). In reply, Glaukos begins with the famous simile comparing the generations of men to the generations of leaves and then proceeds to give an account of himself and his lineage at great length. On learning his identity, Diomēdēs realizes that through their respective families in Argos and Lycia, he and Glaukos are ancestral guest-friends and must not fight each other. Instead, they exchange armor in token of true friendship, but Homer says, in a rare authorial comment, Zeus must have stupefied Glaukos, for in exchange for bronze, he gave gold armor worth over ten times more.

237–311: Hektōr returns to Troy by way of the Skaian Gates, with no word for the women asking for news except that they should pray to the gods. In Priam's house he meets his mother, Hekabē, who asks why he's there, and offers him wine, which he refuses. He tells her to take the women to pray to Athēnē for respite from the fury of Diomēdēs, and indicates that he himself is going to see Paris Aléxandros, to shame him into fighting. Hekabē gathers the women and leads them to Athēnē's shrine, where the goddess's priestess, Theanō, wife of the Trojan elder Antēnōr, offers up the prayer and promise of sacrifice.

312–68: Hektōr finds Paris looking over his bow and armor, while Helen assigns tasks to her handmaidens. He upbraids his brother for his seeming lack of martial spirit. Paris explains the reason as sorrow (presumably for his poor showing in the duel, and subsequent magical disappearance). Helen, he says, has been urging him back to the fighting, and he thinks she's right. So, he says, either wait until I put on my battle gear, or go, and I'll catch you up later. Hektōr says nothing to this, but engages in conversation with Helen, who reproaches herself bitterly for the trouble she's caused, while at the same time inviting her brother-in-law in to sit and talk. No, says Hektōr, just stir up this man here to join in the fighting: I'm going to see my wife and son, perhaps for the last time.

369–493: Hektōr finds his wife Andromachē away from the house, on the walls, and meets her near the Skaian Gates, with his baby son Astyanax. She is scared of his being killed and leaving her a widow, and begs him to stay on the ramparts himself and station a defensive force by the wild fig tree, where three previous assaults have been attempted. Hektōr knows very well what her fate will be in the event of defeat, and he therefore insists on going out and fighting. He picks up his son, who is scared by the great crest on his helmet, so he takes it off, and prays for his son's future. Then he caresses his wife, tells her what's fated will be, and sends her back home.

494–529: Andromachē returns home, and she and her women mourn for Hektōr as though he were already dead, lamenting that he will never again return from battle. Meanwhile Paris Aléxandros, having armed himself, hurries down through the city, laughing and handsome, like some thoroughbred stallion in pursuit of mares, Homer says, and overtakes Hektōr, apologizing for being late. Hektōr grudgingly concedes his valor, but still complains of his hanging back. Finally he drops the argument, saying they can thrash problems like this out over drinks after victory.

BOOK 7

1–42: Hektōr and Paris Aléxandros charge out from the Skaian Gates and begin killing their enemies. Athēnē notices this, and hurries down from Olympos, to be met by Apollo, who suggests a time-out. They confer on how to stop the fighting. Apollo proposes encouraging Hektōr to challenge the Achaians to a one-on-one formal duel.

43–199: Helenos the seer senses this plan and encourages Hektōr to do it, reminding him that his fated time is not yet come, so he's safe. Athēnē and Apollo perch on the great oak tree disguised as vultures to watch. Hektōr makes his offer of a duel between the two armies: winner to give back the body of his opponent. There is a nervous silence. Finally Menelaös gets up and proposes himself, but is stopped by Agamemnōn, who knows he'd be slaughtered. Nestōr then makes a rambling speech about how things were in his day, and shame on everyone now. Nine men then stand up, and lots are drawn: Aias is chosen. All are much relieved. If anyone can take down Hektōr, he's the man.

200–312: The combatants arm, make challenging speeches to one another, and go to it. Evenly matched, they fight first with spears, then with rocks: it seems clear that Aias has the advantage (his spear draws blood, he beats Hektōr down with a huge rock like a millstone, though Apollo at once raises him up again), but the umpires (one Achaian, one Trojan) say it's getting dark, and stop the duel. The two shake hands and exchange gifts. Honor is served. Aias, not surprisingly, rejoices in what he sees as his victory.

313–78: A feast is held, and Aias gets the winner's portion. Nestōr speaks again, recommending a truce to collect and bury the dead with proper funeral rites. He also proposes that the Achaians build a wall, with gates, and a deep ditch, to defend their ships. Meanwhile an assembly is also being held in Troy. Now that we've broken our oath [Pandaros shooting Menelaös], Antēnōr says, we should give Helen and her goods back to the Achaians. Paris Aléxandros is willing to return the goods, but not Helen. Priam proposes sending an envoy to the Achaians, reporting Paris's offer and asking for a truce to bury the dead.

379–482: Next day the envoy delivers the message. Diomēdēs says no, don't just accept the goods: everyone knows the Trojans are as good as beaten. Agamemnōn then accepts the request for a truce. Both sides at once go in search of wood to build funeral pyres; but the Achaians also busy themselves with constructing their wall, gates, and ditch. The gods observe this. Poseidōn points out that Achaians are not making proper sacrificial offerings, and complains that everyone will now forget the wall that he and Apollo built for Priam's father, Laomedōn. Don't worry, says Zeus, once the Achaians are gone, you can sweep everything here into the sea. Meanwhile both sides feast again, wine is brought in by sea for the Achaians, Zeus thunders enough to scare everyone into making drink offerings to him, the feasting ends, and all retire to sleep.

BOOK 8

1–52: Zeus calls an early morning assembly of the gods, issues a ban on their aiding either Trojans or Achaians, and makes graphic threats as to what any god who offends against it will suffer. Athēnē says, yes, we know you have the whip hand, and we won't aid the Achaians, but there's nothing to stop us giving them advice. To which Zeus gives the surprising answer, Don't worry, dear, I don't really mean it, and you I'm fond of (cf. 22.182–84). He then takes off in his chariot to Ida and settles himself on a mountaintop to watch the war.

53–166: Battle is joined in the morning and the outcome remains uncertain until midday, when Zeus put each side's fate (kēr) in his scales, and the Achaians' fate sinks down. Zeus thunders from Ida and sends lightning down into the Achaian army, causing terror. General retreat, except for Nestōr, who's had a horse shot by Paris Aléxandros. Diomēdēs comes to his rescue in his chariot. They attack Hektōr and kill his charioteer. Zeus spots this and thunders, sending a white-hot bolt down in front of Diomēdēs' horses. Nestōr, seeing that Zeus is against them, calls on Diomēdēs to retreat. Diomēdēs agrees, although knowing Hektōr will make mock of him if he does. Never mind, says Nestōr: the other Trojans know better—especially the wives of those you've killed. They turn and retreat, pursued by a shower of missiles and, sure enough, insults from Hektōr.

167–252: Diomēdēs thinks of going back and fighting Hektōr, but Zeus thunders, signifying a turn in the tide of battle, and Hektōr calls on Trojans and allies to breach the wall and fire the ships. He then calls on his horses to help him bring down and strip Nestōr and Diomēdēs. At this Hērē tells Poseidōn that although the Achaians honor and sacrifice to him, he's not doing a thing for them, that if all the gods who were pro-Achaian took action, they could drive the Trojans back, and Zeus would be left sitting miserably on Ida. Poseidōn is shocked and says don't tangle with Zeus, he's stronger than any of us!

Meanwhile, troops are crowding into the space by the ditch and the wall, and there's a real danger of Hektōr firing the ships. Hērē puts it into Agamemnōn's mind to rally the Achaians, and, weeping, he makes an impassioned speech. Zeus takes pity on him and sends an eagle as an omen that at least he and his army will not perish. The Achaians take heart and rally.

253–334: The Achaians, led by Diomēdēs, storm across the ditch, killing as they go. Teukros the archer advances behind Aias's great tower-like shield, popping out to pick off targets, then scuttling back like a child to its mother. Encouraged by Agamemnōn, he twice, unsuccessfully, shoots at Hektōr, the second time killing his charioteer.

Enraged, Hektōr hits him with a rock near the collarbone, snapping his bowstring and paralyzing his arm. Teukros collapses and is carried out of the battle.

335–437: Hektōr goes after Achaians like a hunting hound after a lion or boar. But they halt and make a stand before their ships, hard pressed by the Trojans. Hērē calls on Athēnē to join her in stopping Hektōr. She agrees. Hērē gets the chariot ready while Athēnē arms herself. The two of them drive out from Olympos, ready for action. But Zeus sees them, and sends Iris to stop them, with fearful threats of punishment. When she gets the message, Hērē backs down. Let the mortals fight on, she says. Zeus will decide the issue. Back they go, and sit with the other gods, dispirited.

437–565: Zeus now returns from Ida. What's wrong with you two? he asks Hērē and Athēnē. You couldn't have won, you were scared stiff before you got anywhere near the fighting, and I'd have flattened you anyway. Hērē says, Yes, we know you're too strong for us, but we're sorry for the Achaians. Like Athēnē earlier, she proposes to offer them good advice. So what, Zeus replies: tomorrow you can watch me wreaking havoc on the Achaians, and Hektōr won't stop until Achilles rejoins the battle when they're fighting over dead Patroklos: that's how it's fated, that's how it will be. I don't give a rap for your anger. Night falls, the fighting stops, and Hektōr calls an assembly. Tomorrow we'll make a great assault, he says. We'll leave the women to burn watch fires and look out for a surprise attack while we fight Diomēdēs and the Achaians at the ships! So they feast and sacrifice—but the gods reject their offering. They sit around their fires, and their horses stand by their chariots, waiting for morning.

1–88: The Achaians are now fearful and depressed, despairing of ever taking Troy. Agamemnōn calls an assembly. Weeping, he proposes that they give up the struggle and go home.

Diomedēs responds: Agamemnōn, you questioned my courage. But Zeus made you a king without courage, the true source of authority! The Achaians aren't such cowards as you think. If you want to leave, go! They'll stay and fight. And even were they to go, Sthenelos and I will stick it out till victory: a god brought us here.

Next, Nestōr speaks, saying: Diomedēs, you're a great warrior and a wise counselor, but you haven't said the last word here. Let's post sentries at the trench. Meanwhile, ask the elders advice, Agamemnōn, make a feast, with wine for the elders. Solicit their advice. Tonight presents a make-or-break situation for the Achaians.

There is general agreement.

89–181: Agamemnōn holds a feast for the elders. Nestōr directly addresses him, both as commander in chief, and as the cause of Achilles' persistent wrath at Agamemnōn's having seized Briseīs, against the will of the assembly. Now he must consider how to make amends. Agamemnōn responds: Yes, I was deluded in doing so: I'll compensate him. He will offer Achilles, among other things, marriage to one of his daughters and rule over seven cities. In return, he says, Achilles must renounce his anger and submit to Agamemnōn, who outranks him and is older.

Good, says Nestōr: now we need to send an embassy to persuade him to accept your terms. Phoinix, Odysseus, Aias, and two heralds are chosen, advised by Nestōr, and promptly leave.

182–306: They find Achilles singing warrior lays and accompanying himself on the lyre: he welcomes them hospitably as good friends. After they have eaten, Odysseus tells Achilles: There is a real danger that without you the ships will be lost: we need you to rejoin us! Remember your father's lesson: strife breeds dissension and trouble. Put an end to your obstinate wrath. Agamemnōn is offering rich amends [he lists them]. If they don't persuade you, think of the worn-down Achaians—you might kill Hektōr, and they'd honor you like a god!

307–429: Achilles dismisses the offer: I must speak straight out, he says. I hate anyone who says one thing but thinks another. Neither Agamemnōn nor you and the other Achaians will persuade me. The shirker and the fighter get equal treatment. Cowards are honored like heroes. Death comes to all alike, the idle and the hard-working. I fought endlessly but got little for it. Agamemnōn sits by the ships, collects our booty, throws us a few scraps, and keeps the rest—he even takes back the woman who was given to me! So, let him keep her! Why are we fighting the Trojans? What did he bring this army here for? Helen! Does he think he and his are the only men who love their wives? He's taken my woman, he's deceived me, he won't persuade me, and that's that. He and you need to work out a plan of defense, Odysseus. Yes, he's got a wall and a ditch in place. But that won't stop Hektōr! I could, and he knows it, but tomorrow

I and my men are sailing home. Tell him this. He dared not confront me in person, and I won't fight for him or work or plan with him. And Zeus has addled his mind! His gifts are nothing to me: if he offered me ten times as much it'd make no difference. Nor will I wed his daughter—Peleus will find me a fine wife if I get home. Life is worth more than all the wealth in the world! My mother's told me my fate: I can stay here and fight, win immortal glory, but die young; or I can go home, live long, and forfeit my renown—and you should all go home, for you'll never conquer Troy! Tell the elders they'd better think up a new plan to save their ships. And Phoinix can stay and sleep here, and if he wants to sail with me tomorrow, he's welcome to do so, but I won't make him.

430–605: A hush, and then old Phoinix, Achilles' early mentor, speaks up in a long and rambling speech about his own youth: how, leaving home after a quarrel with his father (also over a concubine), he came to Peleus in Phthië, who took him in and treated him like a son, gave him a fief to rule, and made him rich. Phoinix was also put in charge of the child Achilles, whom he treated as a surrogate son (because of his father's curse he had no sons of his own). So, Achilles, he says, conquer your obstinacy: even the gods, for all their high honor, can do that. Prayers are Zeus's daughters, and they follow the obstinate: those who persist are afflicted by Zeus with Blind Delusion and pay a heavy price. Agamemnōn is not obstinate; he's offering you rich compensation: don't scorn him or his embassy. Great men of old could be turned from their anger by gifts.

As an example, Phoinix recounts a tale about Meleagros refusing to aid the Aitōlians against the Kourêtes. Miffed at his lack of sacrifices, Artemis had sent a huge wild boar against Oineus, king of Kalydōn in Aitōlia: Meleagros killed it, and Artemis then stirred up trouble between the Aitōlians and the Kourêtes. When the latter were getting the better of it, Meleagros was appealed to, and to begin with fought for them. Then, like Agamemnōn, over a matter of unjustly sequestered spoils, he withdrew in rage; finally, after being offered a prize estate, he came back at the last minute and saved the day for the Aitōlians. Achilles should do likewise, and soon: it would be harder to rescue the ships when they were burning.

606–713: Achilles stands firm, urging Phoinix not to back Agamemnōn or to try and confuse Achilles by weeping, which might change his love for the old man to hate. The embassy is sent back to convey Achilles' implacable message: he won't move till Hektōr is burning the Achaian ships and threatening the Myrmidons. When Odysseus delivers Achilles' refusal to the Achaians, Diomēdēs responds: You shouldn't have offered that arrogant man gifts—it just makes him even more arrogant. Forget him.

BOOK 10

1–71: Unable to sleep because worrying about the Achaians' plight (he sees the Trojan fires on the plain, hears their fifes and pipes), Agamemnōn decides to seek advice, and some kind of plan, from Nestōr. He gets up, dresses, and goes out into the darkness. Menelaōs too decides to rouse his brother, and finds him up and arming. Is Agamemnōn, he asks, planning to send out a spy to investigate the Trojans? No one is likely to have the courage. Agamemnōn doesn't answer directly, but tells him to fetch Aias and Idomeneus, while he himself gets Nestōr to give instructions to the sentries (but doesn't say what he's proposing they should be told). Menelaōs should not try to return, he says, lest they miss each other on the camp's crisscross paths.

72–179: Agamemnōn identifies himself to Nestōr, who is not asleep, explains his insomnia, and suggests that they go check on the wakefulness of the sentries. Nestōr agrees, hopes Achilles will yet abandon his wrath and rejoin the fight, and proposes also rousing Odysseus, Aias, and Idomeneus. Also Menelaōs, who, he assumes, has left his brother to do the work. Yes, he can be slack, Agamemnōn agrees, but not this time, and he tells Nestōr where Menelaōs has gone. Together they wake Odysseus and Diomēdēs (who twits Nestōr about being so active at his age) and visit the sentries.

180–271: After finding the sentries awake and watching the plain for any Trojan advance, they hold a council meeting, attended by Mēriōnēs and Antilochos. Nestōr proposes that a volunteer go by night to spy out the enemy camp and learn what he can of the Trojans' intentions. He will be well rewarded. Diomēdēs offers to go but wants a companion: two are better than one. Agamemnōn agrees but tells him to choose the best man, rather than, out of respect, the highest-born (he's afraid for Menelaōs). How, says Diomēdēs, can I not choose Odysseus? He's not only good; he's loved by Athēnē. Spies need the gods on their side. Odysseus agrees but urges hurry: with two-thirds of the night already gone, they've very little time. They arm with helmets, swords, and—in Odysseus's case—a bow and arrows.

272–337: Diomēdēs and Odysseus leave on their mission and are encouraged by a heron on the right, an omen sent by Athēnē. Both pray to the goddess. Odysseus asks to count on her love for him. Diomēdēs offers to sacrifice a heifer if they return safely. Meanwhile Hektōr, too, is asking for a volunteer to spy on the Achaian camp and ships and find out whether they mean to fight or pull out. Achilles' own horses and chariots are offered as a reward, after they're taken. Dolōn, an unprepossessing character, the one son among five sisters, makes Hektōr swear to the this reward, takes a bow and a javelin, puts on a ferret-skin cap, and leaves.

338–464: Odysseus and Diomēdēs spot Dolōn coming, hide, let him pass, then pursue and corral him. Scared, he offers ransom. Cheer up, says Odysseus, and proceeds to debrief him about the Trojans. Dolōn tells all. Hektōr and the elders are in council. The Trojans are keeping watch, the allies are asleep (their wives and children aren't at risk!). He tells where everyone's camped, and adds that those on the perimeter, newly arrived, are the Thracians, led by King Rhēsos, with his famous white horses. Now, he finishes, tie me up and leave me! No way, says Odysseus: if we do that, you'll come spying again! Diomēdēs beheads him and they hang the ferret-skin cap and the rest of Dolōn's gear on a bush to pick up on their return.

465–514: They then, following Dolōn's instructions, find the Thracian camp. Everyone is asleep. They locate Rhēsos and his lords, asleep, with their horses tethered by them. Diomēdēs systematically starts killing them, while Odysseus hauls the bodies out of the way so as not to scare the horses. It's now very near dawn. Athēnē tells Diomēdēs that they should be on their way. They mount and take off with the royal horses.

515–79: Apollo sees it all, arouses Rhēsos's kinsman Hippokoōn, who gives the alarm. Meanwhile, Odysseus and Diomēdēs recover Dolōn's equipment from the bush and hurry back to camp. How did you get such horses? cries Nestōr. By battling the Trojans? No, some god must have given them to you! No, says Odysseus, brave Diomēdēs killed their lord and a dozen of his comrades too; and we also killed a man the Trojans had sent out to spy on our camp. They then stable the horses with those of Diomēdēs, hang up the spoils, wash off in the sea, take a bath, and sit down to eat—with a thank-offering of wine to Athēnē.

BOOK 11

1–83: Zeus sends the spirit Strife to the Achaians to stir up the urge to battle. Agamemnōn arms himself, and Athēnē and Hērē make it thunder in his honor. The charioteers get ready. Hektōr glints among the Trojans like a destructive star [Sirius], or the lightning of Zeus. Trojans and Achaians face up like two rows of reapers in a field of wheat or barley. They rage like wolves. Strife watches and rejoices. The other gods all blame Zeus, who sits apart, a spectator of the fighting.

84–162: Till noon the fighting continues evenly. But about noon Agamemnōn and the Achaians make a breakthrough. Agamemnōn kills Biēnōr, Oileus, Isos, Antiphos, Peisandros, and Hippolochos, and presses on, killing like an out-of-control forest fire. Horses rattle around with empty chariots.

163–283: Zeus pulls Hektōr out of the conflict. Agamemnōn continues the pursuit as far as the Skaian Gates. Both armies halt there, though many Trojans are still in flight; Agamemnōn continues to harry the hindmost. Zeus now sends Iris to Hektōr with a message: he can fight, but only to hold position until/unless Agamemnōn is wounded and retires. But then he can attack till he reaches the ships and darkness falls. The Muse is asked to list those who faced, and were killed by, Agamemnōn. As his wound dries, Agamemnōn begins to hurt, boards his chariot, and is driven out of the fighting.

284–367: Hektōr sees this, and calls on the Trojans to launch a charge. He himself kills nine leading Achaians in short order and then goes for the rank and file. Odysseus calls to Diomēdēs, and the two try to stem the advance. They turn and stand against the charge, killing and stripping the sons of Merōps the seer. Zeus balances his scales over the conflict. Diomēdēs kills Agastrophos, but then Hektōr comes against him and Odysseus. Diomēdēs half-stuns him with a spear cast to the head, but he recovers and retreats into the ranks. Diomēdēs shouts threats after him.

368–471: While Diomēdēs is stripping Agastrophos, Paris Aléxandros shoots him through the foot, and boasts, laughing. Diomēdēs dismisses him as a dandified skirt-chasing fop and pooh-poohs his bowmanship. Odysseus protects Diomēdēs as he tears out the arrow. Then he boards his chariot and is driven out of the fighting. Odysseus is left alone, wondering whether to fight or run for it. The Trojans hem him in like hounds and hunters round a fierce old boar. He kills five, and then the brother of the fifth, Sokos, drives a spear through his shield, slices flesh off his flank, and turns to retreat. As he does so Odysseus plants his own spear between Sokos's shoulder blades; the point comes out of his chest. The Trojans see Odysseus's blood, and press him hard. Menelaös calls on Aias to help him.

472–595: Aias and Menelaös find Odysseus at bay, but the Trojans scatter before Aias with his great shield. Menelaös escorts Odysseus out of the fighting. Aias charges. Hektör meanwhile is away on the left flank by the river.

The Achaians hold firm. But Paris shoots Machaön in the shoulder, and Nestör drives him out of the fighting. Then Hektör gets words of Aias routing Trojans on the right and redoubles his efforts, ranging along the ranks, but avoids Aias. Zeus dazes Aias, makes him stop and retreat. Eurypylos goes to his aid, but is hit in the thigh by an arrow from Paris while stripping Apisaön, and withdraws, urging the Achaians to stand firm. Aias is covered while he retreats into the ranks.

596–803: Achilles, watching the battle and figuring the Achaians will be wanting him now, tells Patroklos to ask Nestör who he's bringing out—from the back it looks like Machaön. At Nestör's hut Hekamēdē, a captive, makes drinks for him and Machaön. Patroklos comes, recognizes Machaön, but can't stay, he says—Achilles is so quick-tempered. Agamemnōn, Odysseus, Diomēdēs, Eurypylos, Nestör exclaims—all wounded and out of action! Achilles doesn't care! Is he waiting for the ships to be burned? There follows a long wandering rigmarole about conflict between the Epeians and the men of Pylos. Then Nestör reminisces about when he and Odysseus were in Pēleus's house and their fathers were giving their sons, Achilles and Patroklos, instructions about how to conduct themselves in the war. And how Patroklos's father reminded him that while Achilles was nobler, he, Patroklos, was the older man, and should advise Achilles with words of wisdom. So, now, work on him!

803–48: Off goes Patroklos, to be met en route to Achilles' hut by the limping Eurypylos, the arrow still in his thigh, blood dripping from the wound. Patroklos asks him whether the Achaians will be able to hold off Hektör. Unlikely, Eurypylos says, and asks Patroklos to extract the arrow and dress his wound. Patroklos has to relay Nestör's message to Achilles, but he'll take care of Eurypylos first, and does so, cutting out the arrow and dressing the wound with painkilling styptic herbs.

BOOK 12

1–33: The Achaians and Trojans fight on. Digression concerning the Achaians' wall and ditch, which are to last as long as the war. But after Hektör and Achilles have been killed, Troy has been sacked, and the Achaians (those who have survived) have sailed home, Poseidōn and Apollo will sweep the stones and timbers of the wall out to sea, restore the beach, and return the rivers to their original courses.

34–174: Battle continues round the walls. Hektōr urges his troops to cross the ditch, yet his own horses balk at doing so: its sheer banks are bristling with sharp stakes. The Trojan infantry are eager to charge, and the charioteers face impossible odds. Poulydamas suggests to Hektōr that they all leave their chariots and attack on foot. Hektōr agrees. They marshal themselves in five companies, under, respectively: (1) Hektōr and Poulydamas; (2) Paris, Alkathōōs, and Agēnōr; (3) Helenos and Deīphobos; (4) Aineias, Archelochos and Akamas; and (5) Sarpēdōn, Glaukos, and Asteropaios. These now advance on the Achaians. But Asios refuses to abandon his chariot and charges the ships where a gate has been left open for stragglers. Two Lapiths, Polypoitēs and Leonteus, block their advance, while Achaians hurl down rocks from the walls. Asios cries that Zeus must be a liar—the Achaians are holding out like wasps protecting their young and won't budge. Zeus takes no notice: he will give Hektōr glory, whatever happens.

175–289: Battle continues fiercely. Polypoitēs and Leonteus continue to claim victims. Meanwhile the Trojans, led by Hektōr and Poulydamas, have been brought up short by an omen—an eagle has flown over clutching a blood red snake in its claws, which bit the bird, causing it to drop its prey and fly off. Poulydamas sees this as a warning from Zeus that the Trojans will be driven back with heavy losses if they attack. Hektōr rejects this notion, however, and they advance. Zeus sends a dust storm against the ships, and the Trojans begin to break down the wall. The Achaians hold firm and mend the gaps with hides. Both Aiases urge on the defenders. Stones rain from both sides and a vast clamor goes up.

290–369: Still the Trojans can't break through the gates. Zeus rouses his son Sarpēdōn against the Achaians. Sarpēdōn arms himself and reminds Glaukos that why the two of them get special perks and treatment from the Lycians is in return for protection. If they were immortal, he for one wouldn't ever fight again. But they're not, so they might as well kill or be killed. He and Glaukos advance against the stretch of wall defended by Menestheus, who sends a message asking for Aias son of Telamōn and Teukros the archer to come help him. Aias with Teukros and Pandiōn answer the call.

370–471: The Trojans are climbing the battlements. Aias kills Sarpēdōn's comrade Epiklēs with a huge rock. Teukros shoots Glaukos in the arm. Glaukos unobtrusively withdraws to avoid his having been wounded being noticed. Sarpēdōn tears out part of the battlement but gives ground when assaulted by Aias and Teukros: his father Zeus ensures he isn't wounded. He upbraids the Lycians for sluggishness. But the Lycians and Achaians are in a dead heat: the first can't break through, the second can't repel them. Then Hektōr, helped by Zeus, lifts a huge stone, smashes in the double gates with it, and charges irresistibly in. He rallies the Trojans, who swarm in at the gates and over the wall, while the Achaians are routed among their ships.

1–38: Zeus, having seen Hektōr to the ships, goes off, not thinking that any immortal will now help either Trojans or Achaians. But Poseidōn is up on a peak on the island of Samothrākē, furious with Zeus and sorry for the Achaians. He goes to Aigai, harnesses his chariot, and skims over the waves towards the Achaians' ships, leaving his chariot in a submarine grotto between the islands of Tenedos and Imbros.

39–135: While the Trojans press on after Hektōr, Poseidōn comes up from the sea and encourages the Achaians in the likeness of Kalchas the priest, urging the two Aiases to stand firm, and infusing them with strength. Then he takes off, and Aias(2) recognizes that this was a god. Both are hot to fight. Meanwhile Poseidōn is upbraiding Teukros and the other Achaians, who gather round the Aiases, eager to fight.

136–205: Hektōr and the Trojans thrust forward, but faced with solid Achaian resistance Hektōr gives ground, calling for support. Deïphobos advances; Mērionēs breaks a good spear on his shield and trails back to the huts for a new one. Teukros kills Imbrios. Hektōr aims at Teukros, who is stripping off Imbrios's armor, but Teukros dodges the spear, which kills Amphimachos. As Hektōr is tearing off his helmet, Aias hits his shield and forces him back. The two Aiases sweep away Imbrios, strip him, decapitate him, and send his head rolling at Hektōr's feet.

206–329: Angry at his grandson Amphimachos's death, Poseidōn visits the huts and ships disguised as Thoas the Aitōlian to arouse the Achaians, while thinking up trouble for the Trojans. He meets Krētan Idomeneus, and asks him what's become of the Achaians' threats? We're all fighting well, Idomeneus replies: it must be the will of Zeus. Idomeneus then encounters Mērionēs going to get a fresh spear, and offers him one of his. Where should they enter the fighting? Right, center or left? Deciding that the right and center are well manned, they move to the left.

330–454: The Trojans go for Idomeneus. A rare comment here by Homer: "Hardhearted would that man be/who seeing this scene, experienced joy, not grief." Zeus and Poseidōn, in opposition, make trouble for both sides: Zeus backing the Trojans, to bring glory (eventually) to Achilles and satisfy Thetis, yet not planning final defeat for the Achaians; Poseidōn secretly (in a mortal's likeness) encouraging the Achaians, but always conscious of being Zeus's younger brother, and therefore avoiding open support. The two of them thus tighten the noose of war around both armies. Idomeneus first kills Othryoneus (engaged, with Priam's approval, to Kassandrē) and exults over his corpse; then Asios. Meanwhile Antilochos knocks off Asios's charioteer and corrals his horses. Deïphobos aims at Idomeneus, misses, but hits Hypsēnōr, and claims revenge for Asios (though Hypsēnōr is removed, still alive, from the fighting). Anchīsēs' son-in-law Alkathōös is frozen in place by Poseidōn and made an easy target for Idomeneus. Idomeneus, citing his ancestry, challenges Deïphobos.

455–539: Deïphobos ducks the challenge and goes to find Aineias to help him rescue Alkathōös's body. Awaiting his attack Idomeneus calls on Mērionēs and Antilochos, among others, to help him against Aineias. They rally to him. Aineias calls on Deïphobos and Agēnōr, who come, followed by their troops. Battle is joined over Alkathōōs's body. Aineias misses Idomeneus, who spears Oinomāos in the belly, then retreats slowly, feeling his age, too hard pressed by missiles to strip the corpse. Deïphobos misses him, but hits and kills Ares' son Askalaphos. In the struggle over Askalaphos, Deïphobos gets his helmet, but is wounded in the arm by Mēriōnēs and taken out of the fighting by his brother Politēs.

540–672: The struggle continues. Aineias kills Aphareus. Antilochos kills Thoön, and begins to strip his body, protected by Poseidōn from the surrounding Trojans. Adamas thrusts at him, but the god weakens the blow, and Mēriōnēs spears Adamas in the nether belly: he writhes like a roped bull, but not for long. Helenos kills Dēïpyros; Menelaōs and Helenos let fly at each other simultaneously. Helenos's arrow bounces back off Menelaōs's corselet, but Menelaōs's spear pierces clean through Helenos's bow hand, and he backs into the ranks. Menelaōs then is attacked by Peisandros, axe against sword, and drives his sword into Peisandros's forehead, killing him, and strips off his armor. Moving back, he's thrust at from close quarters by Harpaliōn, who's shot dead by Mēriōnēs. Enraged at this—Harpaliōn was his guest-friend—Paris lets fly an arrow, killing the Korinthian Euchēnōr.

673–754: Hektōr is still pressing on inside the gate and wall, unaware that on the left, with Poseidōn's powerful assistance, the Achaians are overwhelming the Trojans. Hektōr's attack is opposed with difficulty by the Boiōtians, Ionians, and others. The two Aiases fight side by side, and the Lokrians throw the Trojans off balance with a shower of arrows. Had Poulydamas not brought Hektōr to the rescue, the Trojans would have been driven off the ships and back to Ilion.

755–837: Hektōr is furious to find so many of the Trojan leaders wounded and hors de combat. We've been fighting here since this attack started, Paris tells him. Deïphobos and Helenos are wounded and out of it. But lead on and we'll follow. Spurred on by Zeus, they plunge into the thick of the fighting, with Hektōr leading. He's faced by Aias, and as Aias speaks an eagle flies by on the right, a good omen for the Achaians. The two armies face each other shouting battle cries.

BOOK 14

1–134: Nestōr hears sounds of battle, leaves Machaōn to be cared for by Hekamēdē, and sees the Achaians being routed. He's torn two ways: shall he join the throng or go and find Agamemnōn? He decides to find Agamemnōn, and leaves the cut-and-thrust behind. He meets the trio of wounded heroes—Odysseus, Diomēdēs, and Agamemnōn—coming from the fray, still watching the battle. Why, asks Agamemnōn, has Nestōr come here? Hektōr seems to be carrying out his threats. It seems the Achaians are as angry with me as Achilles is, and have no wish to fight for the ships. Yes, says Nestōr, the wall's breached, and the Achaians are routed. We need to confer, think up a plan. But not to fight: the wounded can't fight. Agamemnōn replies: You're right, the wall and ditch are breached, they're fighting at the ships—Zeus must mean the Achaians to perish here! So, we should launch the ships overnight and run for it: better that than being captured. Odysseus is scathing: You should be leading some third-rate army, not be king over us! Shut up, and don't let the Achaians see or hear you! Once they see the ships being hauled beachwards, they'll never fight! Oh, says Agamemnōn, I'm not urging retreat against the army's will! Is there anyone with better advice?

Yes, says Diomēdēs. Let's go to the fighting and encourage the others. They agree, and go off, Agamemnōn leading.

135–52: Poseidōn, watchful, goes along with them in the likeness of an old man, telling Agamemnōn that Achilles must be rejoicing in the Achaian rout. But the immortals aren't angry with you, he says, and very soon, I think, you'll see the Trojans in flight in their turn. Then he speeds off across the plain, giving a tremendous war shout as he goes, raising the hopes and fighting spirits of the Achaians.

153–223: Hērē wonders how to distract Zeus? Why not pretty herself up, get him to have sex with her, and then leave him sound asleep while she and Poseidōn take care of the war? She asks Aphrodītē for the aphrodisiac that works on mortals and immortals alike. Ocean and Tethys have been quarrelling, she says. I want to reconcile them. Well, says Aphrodītē, who (one suspects) sees through this story: I can't say no to you—you sleep with Zeus! She unfastens and gives Hērē her embroidered breast band, which contains all desire and allurements. Hērē smiles, and tucks it in her cleavage. Aphrodītē goes home.

224–351: Hērē next flies over to Lēmnos, where she seeks out Sleep and tries to bribe him to keep Zeus sound asleep for a while after she's made love with him. But Sleep has done a similar job for her once before, incurred Zeus's wrath, and had to be rescued by Night. Hērē then offers him Pasithēē, the youthful Grace he's always longed for, as his wife. He accepts, but makes her swear a great oath that she'll keep her word. Then they fly to Ida, and Sleep hides up in a tall fir tree, while Hērē goes off to find Zeus, who takes one look at her and is consumed by desire. Hērē spins him the story of visiting Ocean and Tethys, but says she's come to let him, Zeus, know what she's doing first. Oh, says Zeus, you can go there later! I haven't wanted anyone so much—a list of conquests follows—as I want you now! Now now, says Hērē, not here in the open! What if some god saw us? Let's rather go to the bedroom Hēphaistos made for me. No need, says Zeus I'll envelop us in a golden cloud. He does so, and a bed of flowers springs up under them, while the cloud sprinkles them with dew.

352–432: While Zeus sleeps, Sleep goes to the ships, to Poseidōn, and tells him to aid the Achaians while Zeus remains unconscious. Poseidōn at once goes down among the Achaians. Are we to let Hektōr get the glory just because Achilles is sitting it out? he cries. Arm the best men with the finest weapons and helmets and I'll lead the attack! The three wounded Achaian leaders—Agamemnōn, Odysseus, and Diomēdēs—spread this word through the ranks. Poseidōn leading, the Achaians face Hektōr's forces. Hektōr lets fly at Aias, but the spear hits where two baldrics cross on his chest, and drops harmlessly. As Hektōr, vexed, draws back, Aias hurls a huge rock at him and hits him in the neck above his shield. The blow spins him round and floors him. The Achaians run up, but the best Trojan fighters—Poulydamas, Aineias, Agēnōr, Sarpēdōn, and Glaukos—cover Hektōr till he can be lifted, carried unconscious to his chariot, and driven off the battlefield.

433–522: By the Xanthos river they lift Hektōr out and dash water over him. He comes to, kneels, vomits up black blood, then relapses into unconsciousness. His withdrawal from battle encourages the Achaians even more. Aias (2) floors Satnios, spearing him in the side. Poulydamas responds by spearing Prothoēnōr and boasts over his body. Aias (1) has a shot at him, but misses, and hits Archelochos at the top of the spine. Archelochos's brother Akamas, a high Trojan leader, kills the Boiōtian Promachos as he tries to drag Archelochos off. His boasting angers the Achaians further, and Pēneleōs attacks him. Akamas dodges, and Pēneleōs instead spears Ilioneus in the eye, then draws his sword and beheads him.

The Trojans are scared. The Muses are invoked to give a list of those Achaians who carried off an enemy's armor after Poseidōn turned the tide of battle. The victims of Aias, Antilochos, Mērionēs, Teukros, Menelaōs, and Aias (2) (who accounted for most deaths) are duly listed.

BOOK 15

1–112: Zeus wakes on Ida and sees the Trojans routed, Hektōr lying disabled, and Poseidōn rallying the Achaians. Angrily he rounds on Hērē, at once blames her wiles for what's happened, and reminds her—to make her stop her deceptions—of the time he hung her on high with anvils tagged to her feet after she and the north wind spirited Hēraklēs away to Kōs. Hērē shudders and swears that Poseidōn is doing all this of his own accord, having taken pity on the beleaguered Achaians. She adds that she'd advise him to do whatever Zeus told him to. Zeus, not taken in, smiles, and says, if you're being honest, bring Iris and Apollo here: she's to tell Poseidōn to stop it and go home, while he's to go patch up Hektōr, fill him with strength, have him drive the Achaians back among Achilles' ships. Then Achilles will send Patroklos into battle, and after Patroklos has killed many Trojans, including my son Sarpēdōn, Hektōr will kill him, and Achilles, will be drawn back into the war out of rage and kill Hektōr. Then I'll have the Trojans in retreat, until Troy's taken through Athēnē's advice. But till then, till Achilles gets his wish, I'll not let any god aid the Achaians, as I promised Thetis. Hērē says nothing, but leaves swiftly and returns to Olympus. Themis greets her, saying she looks scared. We're fools to tangle with Zeus, Hērē says: he's stronger than any of us; he sits apart and couldn't care less! Meanwhile, Arēs' son has been killed in battle.

113–219: Arēs cries out: Don't blame me if I now help the Achaians, even if Zeus blasts me with his thunderbolt! He arms himself and orders Terror and Rout to harness up his chariot. But then Athēnē comes out, takes away his helmet and spear, and upbraids him fiercely: you're mad, you don't listen, or understand, she exclaims. Didn't you hear what Hērē just said, who's come straight from Zeus? Do you want to bring great trouble on all of us, not just yourself? Zeus would surely come to Olympos and wreak havoc on all the gods, innocent and guilty alike. So, forego your anger! Better men have been, and will be, killed: it's hard to preserve every mortal line! After getting Arēs to sit down again, Hērē then calls Iris and Apollo out of the hall and tells them to go to Ida and follow Zeus's orders. They duly find Zeus, who first briefs Iris: she's to go to Poseidōn, and tell him to desist, and either come to Olympos or go down into the sea—and remind him that he, Zeus, is the older and more powerful!

Iris flits off, delivers the message, and adds that if Poseidōn disobeys, Zeus will come in person and fight him. Poseidōn, nothing fazed, replies that he, Zeus, and Hādēs shared out power in equal thirds. Let Zeus stick to his third, and stop trying to strong-arm his equals! Iris says: You want me to report this? You don't want to soften the message a little? Don't forget: the Furies back the older in a dispute! You're right, says Poseidōn. A good thing when the messenger knows what's what! So, I'm furious, but I'll yield for now. But tell him this: if despite me, and Athēnē, and Hēphaistos, he spares Ilion, then he has a quarrel on his hands that's past mending. With that Poseidōn leaves the Achaians and goes back down into the sea.

220–305: Having seen Poseidōn depart, Zeus instructs Apollo to go to Hektōr. Take the aegis, he says, shake it over the Achaians and scare them! Take care of Hektōr and strengthen him: let the Achaians flee to their ships and the Hellespont. I shall make sure they get respite after that. Apollo goes down, approaches Hektōr, and asks what the trouble is. Which god are you? Hektōr says. I was crushed by a rock from Aias: I thought I'd die. Take heart, Apollo says: Zeus has sent me, Apollo, to help you. Prepare your chariots to go against the ships and I'll smooth the way for them. Then he breathes great power into Hektōr, who gets up and urges on his charioteers. The Achaians are still pressing forward, but when Hektōr appears, they are scared. Thoas the Aitōlian addresses them, saying: Amazing how Hektōr has recovered when we thought he was dying! Some god must have saved him. So, let's send the rank and file back to the ships, while the best of us stay and face him! He won't charge our levelled spears! The Achaian rank and file return to the ships, while Aias, Idomeneus, Teukros, Mērionēs, and Megēs remain there with their companies.

306–89: The Trojans advance, led by Hektōr, with Apollo carrying the aegis. Arrows and spears fly. But when Apollo shakes the aegis and utters his war cry, the Achaians are unnerved. Hektōr and Aineias kill two opponents each. Poulydamas, Politēs, and Agēnōr all claim victims. Paris spears one fleeing Achaian from behind. The Achaians are in rout, inside the wall and in the ditch. Hektōr yells out to the rest to leave the armor-stripping, on pain of death, and press on to the ships. Apollo throws down the banks of the ditch to make a bridge for the Trojan chariots to cross on. He destroys the wall as easily as a child knocking down a sandcastle. The Achaians, led by Nestōr, offer desperate prayers to the gods. Zeus hears them and thunders. But this only encourages the Trojans more. They come on, fighting from their chariots, and are fended off by Achaians from the decks of their ships with long naval pikes.

390–483: Patroklos, tending Eurypylos, sees the Trojan attack and Achaian retreat, and leaves Eurypylos's hut with the intention of persuading Achilles to rejoin the fighting, which is stalemated. The Trojans can't break through to the ships and huts, and Aias can't drive Hektōr back. Aias spears Kalētōr, Hektōr's cousin. Hektōr, enraged, shouts orders to stop his body being stripped. He hurls his spear at Aias, but misses him and hits his attendant, Lykophrōn.

Aias tells Teukros to use his bow. Teukros shoots Kleitos the charioteer, and he falls from his chariot. Poulydamas rounds up the horses. Teukros then aims at Hektōr, but Zeus breaks his bowstring and knocks the bow from his hand. A god's done it, Teukros exclaims. So, says Aias, leave your arrows, take shield and helmet, and fight like the rest. Teukros arms himself, and stands by Aias.

484–591: Hektōr sees Teukros's bow disabled, guesses Zeus is responsible, and calls on the Trojans to press their attack. If a man dies, so be it; if the Achaians are driven out, his family's safe. Across from him Aias encourages his comrades: If Hektōr burns their ships, do they think they'll walk home? Die or win, let's go for it, not stay stuck here by the ships fighting inferior opponents! A murderous scrimmage develops.

Hektōr and Aias both kill opponents. Apollo protects Poulydamas.

Dolops attacks Megēs as he's stripping a corpse, but is killed by Menelaös. Hektōr calls on Melanippos to join the fray, and they advance together. Aias urges on the Achaians, and they form a bronze fence defending the ships. Zeus encourages the Trojans. Menelaös urges young Antilochos to attack a Trojan. Antilochos spears Melanippos in the chest. Hektōr comes after Antilochos, who flees back to the ranks, pursued by a shower of missiles.

592–695: The Trojans keep pressing on to the ships, as Zeus wills, planning to let Hektōr fire them, and fulfill Thetis's prayer. That done, Zeus plans to reverse his support and let the Achaians drive back the Trojans. Hektōr is being granted glory by Zeus, but already Athēnē is planning his death at Achilles' hands. And the Achaians are holding firm against his assault. Hektōr attacks and the Achaians give way but he kills only one man, Periphētēs of Mykēnai, who trips over his own shield and offers an easy target. They are now among the outermost ships. The Achaians rally before their huts, and are urged to stand firm by Nestōr. Athēnē disperses the cloud of mist that has hung over them. The scene is now bright. Hektōr and his supporters are clear in view. Aias strides up and down the ships' decks wielding a long, jointed naval pike. Hektōr, backed by Zeus, charges Prōtesilaos's ship.

696–746: A furious hand-to-hand struggle with swords, axes, and javelins develops. Hektōr lays hold of the ship's stern and calls for fire. Although hard pressed by missiles, Aias stands ready to ward off any Trojan bringing fire, and rallies the Achaians, reminding them that their backs are to the sea now—they've reached their last line of defense. He wards off twelve Trojans in turn who come with flaming torches.

BOOK 16

1–100: Patroklos approaches Achilles, weeping, Achilles asks him why the tears? Is it a death in the family? Or is it because of the Achaians' dying by the ships as a result of their own presumption? Patroklos answers: Don't be angry: the Achaians are indeed hard hit. Their best men are wounded and out of it—Diomēdēs, Odysseus, Agamemnōn, Eurypylos. You're impossible, Achilles! I hope I never feel such wrath as yours! What profit from you for future mortals if you don't now rescue the Achaians? You were born not of Pēleus and Thetis but of grey sea and sheer rocks, so set is your mind! If you're avoiding some oracle your mother's told you of, at least let me use your armor—the Trojans may take me for you and give the Achaians some respite: we might even drive them back from the ships! Such his entreaty, the great fool: but as fate decreed, / his own ghastly death and destruction it was for which he prayed, says Homer, in one of his rare comments.

Achilles, much troubled, replies: No, no oracle: just the keen pain of being robbed by an equal with greater power! The girl I was granted as a prize for my achievements has been snatched away again! But let this be! If the Trojans are at the ships, yes, take my armor, lead out the Myrmidons! The voice I hear is Hektōr's. But when you've driven him and his back from the ships, come back: don't press on to Ilion!

I wish just the two of us could, from both sides, survive to take the city!

101–256: Tiring and hard-pressed, Aias gives ground. Hektōr shears off the head of Aias' spear with his sword, and he withdraws. The Trojans fire the ship. At this Achilles urges Patroklos to arm quickly, while he, Achilles, rouses the Myrmidons to action. Patroklos arms himself with Achilles' gear, except for the great spear of Pēlian ash that only Achilles can wield. Automedōn, Achilles' charioteer, harnesses his immortal horses, Xanthos and Balios, with the mortal Pēdasos as trace horse.

Meanwhile Achilles rouses the Myrmidons, who charge out like ravening wolves. There are fifty ships, each with fifty men, divided into five companies, led by Menesthios, Eudōros, Peisandros, Phoinix, and Alkimedōn. To them Achilles says: Don't forget your threats against the Trojans—nor your accusations against me, for keeping you here! Go to it! Achilles brings out a cup and makes libation, with a prayer to Zeus of Dōdōna for Patroklos's success and safe return.

257–357: The Myrmidons, with Patroklos at their head encouraging them, pour out. The Trojans believe it's Achilles attacking them and look round for a way of escape. Patroklos spears Pyraichmēs, leader of the Paiōnians, and drives off his followers. The fire on the half-burned ship is put out, and the Achaians, once the fire's out, catch their breath, but there's no rout; the Trojans are just forced slowly back. Patroklos kills Areilykos, Menelaös kills Thoas, Megēs kills Amphiklos, Antilochos kills Atymnios, whose brother Maris is killed by Thrasymēdēs. Aias (2) kills Kleoboulos. Pēneleōs kills Lykōn, Mērionēs kills Akamas, Idomeneus kills Erymas.

358–507: Aias wants to spear Hektōr, but Hektōr is constantly watching out for missiles from behind his shield: he knows the tide is turning, but still stays to help his comrades. The Trojans straggle back across the ditch, and Hektōr too now withdraws. Many chariots and horses are entangled in the ditch. Patroklos leads the pursuit, his divine horses leaping the ditch. Patroklos turns the retreat away from the city, rounds it towards the ships, and kills many: Pronoōs, Thestōr, Erylaōs, Erymas, Amphoteros, Epaltēs, Tlēpolemos, Echios, Pyris, Ipheus, Euippos, and Polymēlos. Sarpēdōn, seeing this slaughter, upbraids the Lycians, and he and Patroklos go for each other. Zeus, watching, tells Hērē he’s debating whether to save Sarpēdōn, his son, or let him be vanquished as Fate decrees. Hērē is shocked at the idea of Zeus overriding Fate. If you set a precedent, other gods will follow your lead, she says. Let Sarpēdōn die if Fate wills it, but send Death and Sleep to carry him home to Lycia for family burial. Zeus agrees, but sends a rain of blood to show honor for Sarpēdōn. Patroklos kills Sarpēdōn’s charioteer, Thrasymēlos. Sarpēdōn fatally wounds Patroklos’s mortal trace horse Pēdasos, but Automedōn cuts it loose from the chariot. Sarpēdōn misses again, and Patroklos spears him in the midriff. He falls with a final appeal to his comrade Glaukos to hold firm and protect his corpse.

508–631: Glaukos hears and grieves. Still hurting from Teukros’s arrow, he prays to Apollo for relief: Sarpēdōn is dead, heal my wound, let me fight! Apollo hears, dries the blood, stops the pain, and fills Glaukos with strength. He urges on the Trojans, calling on Hektōr in particular to protect Sarpēdōn’s body. They advance. Patroklos calls on the Aiaes to seize and strip Sarpēdōn. The two sides clash. Zeus plunges the engagement into darkness. At first the Trojans prevail: Hektōr kills Epeigeus as he lays hands on Sarpēdōn’s corpse. In grief for his comrade, Patroklos charges through the ranks and kills Sthenelaōs. Hektōr and the Trojans give a little ground, but Glaukos turns and kills the Myrmidon Bathyklēs. Mēlionēs kills the priest Laogonos: Aineias tries to spear Mēlionēs, but he ducks. If I’d hit you, I’d have killed you, Aineias says. Mēlionēs replies: Mighty you may be, but you can’t score every time: you too are mortal. If I hit you squarely, you’d be finished too. Why bluster like this, says Aineias: the Trojans aren’t giving ground to mere words. Don’t talk, fight.

632–711: The battle rages over Sarpēdōn’s body, made unrecognizable by blood and dust. Zeus watches, debating the killing of Patroklos: should it be now, or should he, Zeus, let Patroklos drive the Trojans and Lycians citywards? He decides on the latter course: Hektōr recognizes the scales of Zeus, and calls for a retreat. The Myrmidons strip Sarpēdōn, and carry back his arms to the ships. Zeus instructs Apollo to waft Sarpēdōn’s body away, clean and bathe him, and have Sleep and Death take him home to Lycia. Apollo obeys, and all this is done. Patroklos now presses on—stimulated to do so by Zeus—in pursuit of the Trojans and Lycians, ignoring Achilles’ instructions. (Had he obeyed them, Homer comments, he’d have avoided death.) He kills Adrēstos, Autonoōs, Echeklos, Perimos, Epistōr, Melanippos, Elastos, Moulaios, and Pylartēs. Then he starts climbing the city wall. Three times he’s flung back by Apollo: the fourth time the god cries out to him to stop: Troy's not fated to be taken either by him or by Achilles. Patroklos duly backs off to avoid the god's wrath.

712–867: Hektōr at the Skaian Gate is uncertain whether to drive to battle or recall the troops inside the wall. He's approached by Apollo in the likeness of his mother's brother Asios, urging him to fight Patroklos.

Hektōr tells Kebrionēs, his charioteer, to join the fray. Apollo panics the Achaians, granting glory to the Trojans. Hektōr ignores all other Achaians and makes straight for Patroklos. Patroklos springs down and kills Kebrionēs. He and Hektōr fight over the corpse. Hektōr seizes the head, Patroklos the feet. Round them Trojans and Achaians fight, evenly matched till evening. Then the Achaians strip Kebrionēs, and Patroklos makes three assaults on the Trojans. But the fourth attack is met by Apollo, shrouded in mist, who slams him from behind with the flat of his hand, dizzying him, breaking his spear, and knocking off his helmet. While he's dizzy, Euphorbos spears him in the back, and Hektōr hurries up and spears him in the underbelly as he's retreating. Dying, Patroklos says: It was the gods and Fate that destroyed me, twenty like you alone would not have done it. And your own fate at Achilles' hands will very soon follow. Hektōr says: Who knows? It may well be that I kill Achilles. Then he pulls out the spear and goes after Automedōn the charioteer, but he, and Achilles' immortal horses, are gone.

BOOK 17

1–81: Seeing Patroklos struck down, Menelaös stands protectively over his body. Euphorbos calls on him to withdraw: let me win renown, or I'll kill you too. You'll pay for the death of my brother—the least I can do for his widow is to bring her your head! He throws, but his spear's stopped by the shield, and Menelaös stabs him in the throat. Menelaös strips him, and no one dares come against him. But Apollo grudges him the arms, and, in the likeness of Mentēs, urges Hektōr to leave off his pursuit of Achilles' horses and tackle Menelaös.

82–139: Hektōr sees the corpse and shouts. Menelaös hears him and knows who it is. He thinks: The Achaians will blame me if I back off. But if I try to fight Hektōr and all the Trojans, I'm done for. But, ah, Hektōr has a god fighting for him: the Achaians know that, and wouldn't blame me . . . perhaps I should try to find Aias and get him to help me. The Trojans advance, led by Hektōr. Menelaös slowly retreats, turning back as he goes, like a lion cornered by dogs and hunters. Back in the ranks, he sees Aias, asks for his help in saving Patroklos's corpse for Achilles—Hektōr has his armor. Aias agrees and comes with him. Hektōr is dragging Patroklos's body away, planning to behead it, but retreats quickly on seeing Aias, boards his chariot, and gives Patroklos's armor to others to take back to the city. With Menelaös beside him, Aias covers Patroklos's corpse with his shield.

140–97: Glaukos upbraids Hektōr as a coward. Save Ilion with Trojan help alone—you'll get no help from the Lycians! How will you save a lesser man when you deserted Sarpēdōn, who was your guest and comrade? If it were up to me, the Lycians would go home. If we had some brave Trojans, we could drag Patroklos to Ilion: then the Achaians would give back Sarpēdōn's body and armor! But you hadn't the courage to face Aias, who's a better man than you. Angry, Hektōr replies: Glaukos, why this arrogance? I thought you wise, but you're senseless. I'm not afraid of battle, but who can resist Zeus? So come and fight beside me and see if I'm a coward or not. He shouts to the Trojans and their allies to hold firm. Then, having retrieved Achilles' armor from the men taking it to the city, he dons it.

198–318: Zeus watches him, reflects that he's nearer death than he knows, that he's improperly wearing the gear of a better man. Still, muses Zeus, knowing that Hektōr will never come back home from the battle, he can have a little glory now. Hektōr is filled with warlike ardor, makes a rousing speech to the allies—whoever gets Patroklos's body from Aias will share the spoils and the glory with Hektōr! They charge Aias and Menelaōs, who resist under pressure, but need help. Menelaōs calls out, and Aias son of Oileus and Idomeneus and Mēriōnēs come running, with a whole mass of men at their heels. Hektōr and the Trojans advance, but the Achaians stand firm and Zeus covers them with darkness. Zeus did not dislike Patroklos when he was alive and Achilles' comrade, and he has no wish now for his corpse to be thrown to Trojan dogs, so he puts strength into his comrades to defend his body. Even so the Trojans drive back the Achaians and begin to drag off Patroklos's body. But Aias rallies the Achaians, charging the foremost Trojans and scattering those around Patroklos's body. He kills Hippothoōs, who's dragging the corpse with a belt tied round its ankles. Hektōr tries to spear Aias, but misses him and hits Schedios. Aias meanwhile disembowels Phorkys. Hektōr and the Trojans give ground. The Achaians drag off Phorkys and Hippothoōs and start stripping them.

319–422: Despite Zeus, the Trojans would have been beaten, and the Achaians would have won more glory, had Apollo, taking on the likeness of Periphas the herald, not encouraged Aineias. If a god were against you, you might not save Ilion, he says, but Zeus wants the Trojans to win more than he does the Achaians, so why hold off? Aineias knows it's Apollo and calls out to Hektōr and the rest: To be driven back is disgraceful! A god tells me Zeus is for us, so let's fight, and stop them getting Patroklos away to the ships! The Trojans rally, but the Achaians stand firm over Patroklos, while Aias ranges to and fro, attacking the Trojans and urging his comrades to stand firm. Unaware that Patroklos is dead, Thrasymēdēs and Antilochos are still fighting, and Achilles does not know yet either. Both sides meanwhile desperately hold firm in the struggle for the corpse: better to die, they say, than give in.

423–542: Achilles' divine horses weep when they realize that Patroklos is dead, Despite all Automedōn's efforts, they remain fixed by their chariot, like the marker on a burial mound. Zeus, seeing them, is touched by pity, regrets having bestowed them, immortal as they are, on a mortal, with all the consequent sorrows, and promises that Hektōr won't get them, that Automedōn will bring them back to the ships, but that the Trojans will have the better of it till they reach the ships and darkness falls. He breathes strength into the Achaians, and Automedōn leads them into battle. But—as Alkimedōn reminds him—he can't drive and fight at the same time. Automedōn takes Alkimedōn as his charioteer, and steps down to fight. Hektōr and Aineias see them, and, with Chromios and Arētos, go after the immortal horses. Automedōn sees them coming, tells Alkimedōn to stick close behind him, and calls to the Aiases and Menelaōs for support. He spears Arētos. Hektōr tries to spear Automedōn, but he ducks. The arrival of the Aiases stops an imminent sword fight: Hektōr, Aineias, and Chromios prudently withdraw. Automedōn strips Arētos of his armor and returns with it to his chariot.

543–647: The fight for Patroklos's body continues. Zeus, having changed his mind, sends Athēnē down to encourage the Achaians: she appears, wrapped in a cloud, and addresses Menelaōs, in the likeness of old Phoinix, urging him into action: it would be shameful for Achilles' comrade to become prey to Trojan dogs! Menelaōs replies: Hektōr is dangerous, and Zeus is backing him! If only Athēnē would strengthen me, protect me from missiles, I'd stand firm over Patroklos! Delighted that he has picked her to appeal to—we're not told whether or not he has recognized her—Athēnē invigorates him. Menelaōs at once spears Podēs and drags off his body. Then Apollo approaches Hektōr in the likeness of Phainōps and upbraids him for yielding to Menelaōs, reckoned a poor warrior. Furious, Hektōr goes to the front. Zeus clouds up Ida, thunders and lightens, and shakes his aegis as token of giving the Trojans the upper hand. Poulydamas disables Pēneleōs, Hektōr wounds Lēitos, Idomeneus breaks a spear on Hektōr, and Hektōr in return misses him, but kills Mēriōnēs' charioteer Koiranos, who's just come to pick up Idomeneus, who's on foot. At Mēriōnēs' urging, Idomeneus grabs the whip and drives back to the ships. Aias and Menelaōs see that Zeus has turned the tide of victory. Aias exclaims that he wishes there was someone to take the bad news to Achilles, but they're all in darkness—Zeus, he prays, clear the sky! If you're going to kill us, do it in sunlight!

648–761: Zeus pities him and disperses the dark mist. The sun shines. Aias tells Menelaōs to find Antilochos and send him to Achilles with the news of Patroklos's death. Menelaōs goes reluctantly, like a lion frustrated by a blizzard of missiles, afraid that the routed Achaians will leave him a victim to the Trojans: he urges the Aiases and Mēriōnēs to remember how kind Patroklos was when alive. Then he moves off looking for Antilochos. He finds him and breaks the news of Patroklos's death, urging him to go and tell Achilles—perhaps he'll be able to rescue the body. But Hektōr has his armor. Antilochos, horrified and weeping, sets off to tell Achilles. Menelaōs sends Thrasymēdēs to replace him in the line, and himself goes back to the conflict over Patroklos's body, pessimistic about Achilles joining the fight and urging the Achaians to make a great effort to get the body away now. When they see Patroklos's body being moved, the Trojans attack, with Aineias and Hektōr in the vanguard, but the two Aiases fight them off. Meanwhile, most of the Achaians flee, discarding their armor around the ditch as they run.

1–147: Antilochos finds Achilles by his ships, worried at the rout of the Achaians, and suspecting that Patroklos must be dead, despite the orders he had to return after saving the ships. Antilochos confirms his fears, says they're fighting over Patroklos's stripped body, and that Hektōr has his armor. Achilles is consumed with grief, weeps, tears his hair, grovels in the dust. The two women captives join the mourning. Thetis hears her son's groans, shrieks aloud, and laments to the gathered sea nymphs: I sent my splendid son to Ilion, but I'll never welcome him home—I must go comfort him now, though there's no real way I can help him. She and the nymphs then go to Troy. Thetis embraces Achilles and says: What's your grief? Zeus has given you what you wanted! The Achaians are in disarray by the ships! What's that to me? asks Achilles. My dear comrade is dead, and Hektor has the armor the gods gave Pēleus at his wedding. I wish you'd stayed a sea nymph, that Pēleus had married a mortal! I've no wish to live unless I can kill Hektōr first for destroying Patroklos! That means, says Thetis, that your own death will follow: it's fated that you will die very soon after Hektōr. Let me die now then, Achilles responds: I wasn't there to help my comrade! I sit here a useless burden! I'll go after Hektōr and accept my death when the gods want it. For now, I'll seek renown in battle. Don't try to stop me. Fine, says Thetis, but Hektōr has your armor. Don't go into battle till I return tomorrow with new armor for you from Hēphaistos. She then sends her nymphs home, telling them she's going to Olympos to persuade Hēphaistos to make arms for Achilles. They, and she, then take off.

148–243: The fighting is at the ships. The Achaians can't drag Patroklos's carcass clear: the Trojans are pressing too hard. Hektōr has Patroklos by the feet: the Aiases stand him off three times, but he gives no ground. At this point Iris reaches Achilles with a private message from Hērē, that he should arm himself and protect Patroklos's body from the shame of mutilation. Who sent you? asks Achilles. Hērē, says Iris: Zeus and the other gods don't know. Then Achilles says: How can I fight? They have my armor. No other man's armor would fit me. My mother says Hēphaistos is making me a new set. Aias's great shield would do, maybe, but he's in action with it.

Iris says: We know about your armor. Just go to the ditch and show yourself to the Trojans! It may scare them and give the Achaians some respite. She then leaves. Achilles gets up. Athēnē puts the aegis round his shoulders, a golden cloud over his head, and has a flame blaze out from him. He goes to the ditch, but doesn't join the Achaians. Then he shouts three times, and Athēnē echoes his cry. The Trojans are panic-stricken, and a dozen of them drop dead, though safe among their own people. The Achaians drag Patroklos clear, put him on a bier. They stand round him weeping, Achilles among them. The sun goes down and there's a break in the fighting.

243–355: The Trojans hold an emergency assembly before the evening meal. The first speaker is Poulydamas, Hektōr's coeval and comrade: Go back to the city! Don't stay by the ships! he says. While Achilles was out of the fighting, that was all very well. But now, with Achilles in action, things are very different! He'll be attacking the city, and many Trojans will die. So let's withdraw and man the walls: that will stop him. Angrily, Hektōr responds: Poulydamas, I don't like what you're saying! Aren't you tired of being cooped up in the city? And Priam's city used to be wealthy, but no longer! Look, Zeus is granting me glory over the Achaians by the ships, and now you call for retreat! No one's going to obey you, I'll make sure of that! Rather now eat by companies, keep strict watch all night, and be ready in the morning to fight by the ships! And if Achilles wants a battle, I'll be ready for him then! The Trojans shout assent. (Homer comments: Athēnē addled their wits! They praised Hektōr's bad advice, and ignored the good sense of Poulydamas.) Meanwhile the Achaians, led by Achilles, are collectively mourning Patroklos. Achilles is like a furious lion tracking a hunter who's taken its cubs. Vain was the promise I gave Menoitios, that I'd bring back his son laden with spoils, when Troy was down, he cries. Zeus has chosen otherwise—we're both going to die here! But I won't rest, Patroklos, till I have the head and armor of Hektōr and a dozen young Trojans to sacrifice at your pyre! He has water heated, and his comrades wash Patroklos's body, anoint his wounds, and lay him out. The Myrmidons mourn him all night long.

356–467: Zeus to Hērē: Well, you got your way: you've roused Achilles! The Achaians must be your own flesh and blood! Hērē replies: I'm the top goddess—how could I fail to make trouble for the Trojans? Meanwhile Thetis goes to Hēphaistos's house. Hēphaistos recalls how Thetis and Ocean's daughter Eurynomē rescued him when he was thrown out of Olympos by his mother Hērē: he owes much to Thetis.

He puts away his tools, washes, and asks Thetis what he can do for her. She replies: Is there any goddess with as many troubles as I have? Zeus married me off against my will to a mortal, who's now old and weak. And the son I bore I sent to Troy, but I shall never welcome him home again. Because Agamemnōn took his prize woman back, he held back from the fighting; but when the Achaians were backed up by the Trojans against their ships, he sent Patroklos in his own armor, with the Myrmidons, to help them. They would have taken the city had Apollo not killed Patroklos and granted glory to Hektōr. So I'm here to beg you to make new armor for my ill-fated son—that which he had was stripped from Patroklos by the Trojans. Hēphaistos says: I wish I could save him from death! But fine armor he shall indeed have.

468–617: Hēphaistos sets to work making a five-layered shield with a silver shield strap. Heavenly bodies and two cities decorate it. In one city a wedding is taking place and a dispute is under arbitration. The other city is besieged. With the walls manned by women and children, the men march out, led by Arēs and Athēnē, to ambush the besiegers' herdsmen and capture sheep and cattle. Strife, Tumult, and the Death Spirit all join in the fighting. Plowing is depicted too, and a wheatfield, with reapers using sickles and sheaves being bound. There is also a golden vineyard, with the vines supported on silver poles and grapes in abundance, surrounded by a cobalt enamel ditch and a fence of tin. A queue of boys and girls with baskets full of grapes dance to a boy singing and accompanying himself on a lyre. A herd of cattle is fashioned from gold and tin, with golden herdsmen. Two lions are dragging off a bellowing bull, with dogs and men in pursuit. The dogs bark at the lions but stay clear of them. A pastoral scene shows a flock of white sheep and huts and sheepfolds, and elsewhere young people dance, led by two tumblers. In conclusion, Hēphaistos sets Ocean all round the rim of the shield. Then he fashions a corselet, helmet, and greaves. All these marvels he gives to Thetis.

BOOK 19

1–144: Thetis brings this new battle gear to the mourning Achilles. The Myrmidons are astounded by it; Achilles' fury swells along with his pleasure as he examines it. He will arm himself, he says—but he is also worried that Patroklos may rot and be consumed by flies and maggots. No, says Thetis, I'll keep his flesh sound! Now you call an assembly and make your peace with Agamemnōn: after that, arm yourself. She then drips nectar and ambrosia through Patroklos's nostrils to preserve his body unchanged. Achilles goes down the beach calling everyone to assembly. Because it's Achilles, they all, even the pilots and stewards, now show up: Diomēdēs, Odysseus, and Agamemnōn come limping in with their wounds. Achilles says: I wish Briseīs had died in Lyrnessos! Far fewer Achaians would then have died because of my wrath! That profited Hektōr and the Trojans, and the Achaians won't forget it in a hurry. But we need to put all this behind us: I must quench my wrath and we must rouse the Achaians to battle and see whether the Trojans continue attacking the ships. Those who escape may count themselves lucky! The Achaians rejoice to hear this. Agamemnōn then speaks: I'm not at fault, he says; the fault lies with Zeus and Fates and the Furies, who deluded me. Zeus robbed me of good sense, but now I'm ready to make amends—so prepare for battle!

145–237: The troops shouldn't have to go into battle hungry, Odysseus says. The fight will be a long one. Let them eat and drink first. Meanwhile, Agamemnōn should display the gifts to be given to Achilles and swear on oath that he's never had sex with Briseīs. Agamemnōn agrees and asks Odysseus to display of the gifts. But Achilles demurs: You can do all that another time, he says. Men are lying dead and unavenged and you want us to eat! I shan't eat till I'm avenged and the sun goes down. You're the great fighter, Odysseus replies, but my advice makes more sense. Those who eat regularly fight better.

238–339: Odysseus takes a group of warriors to Agamemnōn's hut to fetch the gifts, which include eight captive women, Briseīs among them, and weighs out the ten talents of gold. Agamemnōn swears that he has not slept with Briseīs, and a boar is sacrificed. Achilles accepts the argument that Agamemnōn was deluded by Zeus and dismisses the assembly. The Myrmidons take the gifts to Achilles' hut. Briseīs mourns over Patroklos's body: her husband and her brothers have all been killed, but Patroklos promised that she would wed Achilles, and she mourns him for his kindness. The other women join in the lamentation—officially for Patroklos, but each one for her own sorrows. The Achaians beg Achilles to eat, but he steadfastly refuses. A few leaders, including Agamemnōn, Menelaös, and Odysseus, stay and try to comfort him. But he remembers the meals Patroklos prepared for him, and won't eat. Nothing, he says, could be worse, not even the deaths of his father Pēleus or his son Neoptolemos—whom he'd hoped Patroklos would take back to Phthiē. Those with him join the weeping, remembering those they too have left behind.

340–424: Zeus sees and pities them. Achilles is fasting while the rest of them eat, he tells Athēnē. We mustn't let hunger make him weak, so go and feed him with nectar and ambrosia. She flies down and does so. The Achaians arm themselves and pour out from their ships. Achilles is shown donning his new armor in a state of murderous rage. It fits perfectly. Automedōn readies his chariot, and Achilles exclaims to his immortal horses: Bring your charioteer back safely; don't let him be killed, as you did Patroklos. One horse, Xanthos, on which Hērē has bestowed speech, responds: This time we'll save you, though your end is near! The stripping of Patroklos wasn't our fault: we can run as fast as the west wind! Fate and the gods so decreed, just as your own death is decreed! Achilles replies: Xanthos, you don't need to foretell my death. I know that myself. But I won't stop until I've given the Trojans their fill of war! And with that he drives off to battle.

BOOK 20

1–74: While both sides prepare for battle, Zeus sends out Themis summoning all the gods to assemble on Olympos. All come, except Ocean. Poseidōn asks why they've been called. Something perhaps to do with the Achaian and Trojan preparations for battle? Zeus says: You have it: I'm concerned for them. I shall simply watch, but you gods can help whichever side you like. With Achilles back fighting, and furious over Patroklos's death, I fear he may storm the walls, doing more than what's fated. The gods divide: Hērē, Poseidōn, Athēnē, Hermēs, and Hēphaistos go to support the Achaians; Arēs, Phoibos Apollo, Artemis, Lētō, Xanthos, and Aphrodītē will back the Trojans. Meanwhile, the Achaians have the edge because of Achilles' presence in his new armor. When the gods join in, Strife goes to work, and Athēnē (by the ditch) and Arēs (on the ramparts) urge each side on with great war cries. Zeus thunders; Poseidōn makes the earth quake—so violently that Hādēs fears that his subterranean realm may be exposed. Apollo confronts Poseidōn; Athēnē takes on Arēs; Hērē is faced by Artemis; Lētō by Hermēs; Hēphaistos by Xanthos/Skamandros.

75–155: Achilles is determined to fight Hektōr. Apollo, disguised as Priam's son Lykaōn, urges Aineias to attack Achilles, but Aineias is not eager to do so. Still, he adds, if a god were to fix things, that might be different. Pray to the gods, says Apollo, and don't forget: your mother was Aphrodītē, his was only a nymph. He infuses great strength into Aineias, who decides to challenge Achilles after all. Hērē notices, and addresses the gods, Poseidōn and Athēnē in particular. Aineias should be turned back, or one of us should encourage Achilles with our support! We're here to make sure Achilles suffers no harm today, whatever his ultimate fate may be. If he isn't reassured about this by a god, he'll take fright when a god comes against him in battle. Poseidōn says: Gods shouldn't fight gods anyway. We all should sit this out and leave the fighting to mortals. But if Arēs or Apollo should try to block Achilles in battle, then we should all weigh in and stop them. With that Poseidōn leads most of the gods to Hēraklēs' wall, while Apollo and Arēs station themselves on a hill—both sides plotting, but reluctant, despite Zeus's permission, to involve themselves directly.

156–352: The two sides advance. Aineias and Achilles approach each other. Achilles calls out to Aineias: Why are you doing this? Even should you kill me, Priam wouldn't recognize your status. Have you forgotten, too, how I beat you once before, and only Zeus saved you? So stand down before you're hurt. Aineias replies: Don't try to scare me as though I were a child. We both know each other's lineage. But why stand here bickering like a pair of women? Rather, let's fight. His spear is stopped by Achilles' shield; Achilles' spear pierces through Aineias's shield, but fails to hit him. Then Achilles comes at him with drawn sword, while Aineias hefts a great rock to throw at him. Poseidōn prepares to intervene: Aineias has been egged on by Apollo, who won't save him from being killed, which will infuriate Zeus, since it's his fate to survive and lead the Trojans. Hērē says he'll have to decide whether to save Aineias, reminding him that she and Athēnē have sworn not to save Troy. Poseidōn blinds Achilles with mist and pulls his spear out of Aineias's shield, setting it down by its owner. He then heaves Aineias to the furthest edge of the conflict, telling him: Don't fight Achilles; he's a better man than you and the gods love him. But when he's dead, fight: then no other Achaian will be able to match you.

353–454: Achilles urges on the Achaians—good though he is, he can't handle all the Trojans alone! Hektōr says: We can fight the gods with words: with spears it's harder. I'll battle Achilles, however powerful he is: he may fulfill some of his threats, but not all. The two sides clash. Apollo tells Hektōr to await Achilles in the ranks, not challenge him solo. Hektōr, scared by the god's voice, obeys. Achilles attacks the Trojan ranks. He kills Iphitiōn, and the Achaian chariots roll over his body. Then he kills Dēmoleōn, Hippiodamas, and Hektōr's brother Polydōros. Furious, Hektōr makes for Achilles, who beckons him: Come close, and die the sooner! Hektōr says: Don't try to scare me like a child. Yes, I'm a lesser warrior than you. But these things lie in the lap of the gods. He hurls his spear, only to have Athēnē turn it back and drop it at his feet. Achilles springs at him, shouting. Apollo then snatches up Hektōr and hides him in mist. Achilles tries to get at him in the mist three times, but fails. Guessing that Apollo has saved him, he turns in search of other victims.

455–503: Achilles kills Dryōps, Dēmouchos, Laogonos and Dardanos, Trōs, Moullos, Deukaliōn, and Rhigmos and Areithoōs. He charges on, splattered with blood.

BOOK 21

1–135: The rout reaches the Xanthos (Skamandros) river. Achilles has chivvied the retreating Trojans into two groups: one making for the city, the other, men and chariots together, diving into the stream, like locusts fleeing a fire. Achilles leaves his spear by a bush, and plunges in armed with his sword alone, attacking indiscriminately: the Trojans cower like small fish chased by a dolphin. Achilles now captures twelve young Trojan warriors, ties their hands, and turns them over to his comrades to be kept as a blood offering for Patroklos. Now he's confronted by Priam's son Lykaōn, whom he'd earlier captured and sold into Lēmnos: but he's escaped, and is now once again at Achilles' mercy. He begs to be taken alive, in a long and detailed plea—he doesn't, he emphasizes, have the same mother as Hektōr—but Achilles is adamant. Till Patroklos was killed, he says, he ransomed quite a few Trojans. But no more now! Patroklos died, who was a better man than you are: why should you survive? I'm a fine warrior, but I too face death. With that he plunges his sword in, seizes the corpse by one foot, flings it into the river, and apostrophizes it: Lie there with the fishes! All of you, till I pursue you to Troy! Not even Xanthos will save you now—you'll pay for the deaths of Patroklos and all the other Achaians you've slaughtered!

136–227: The River, angered, plots how to stop Achilles. Meanwhile Achilles charges Asteropaios (a Païōnian, son of the Axios, another river), who is filled with strength by Xanthos. He is also ambidextrous, and he throws two spears at once at Achilles: one hits his shield, the other grazes his forearm before grounding itself in the earth. Achilles' spear misses, and buries itself half its length in the riverbank. Asteropaios can't pull it out, and Achilles finishes him off with his sword, boasts over him of superior lineage, leaves him there to be eaten by eels and fishes, and goes after more Païōnians: kills seven, and would have killed more, had the River not addressed him: If Zeus is allowing you to kill Trojans without number, at least do it in the plain, don't choke my waters with blood and corpses! Lay off! Very well, Achilles says. But I shan't stop killing Trojans till I've driven them back into their city and seen whether Hektōr will fight me or not.

227–382: Achilles keeps on after the Trojans. The River now reproaches Apollo, saying that he hasn't done as Zeus asked, namely, protect the Trojans until darkness fell. Achilles now leaps into mid-stream: Xanthos surges against him in a huge wave, sweeping corpses along, hiding living survivors in his eddies, bellowing like a bull. Achilles grasps a tree, swings himself ashore, but the River follows, flooding after him over the plain with a great roar. It chases him like an irrigation stream that gets up speed when all the dams are removed from a channel: the River is a true match for him in both speed and violence. He prays, desperate, to Zeus: Save me, but do what you will after! I'd rather have been killed by Hektōr! But now I'm going to be drowned like a young swineherd trying to cross a winter torrent! Poseidōn and Athēnē appear by him in mortal form: Poseidōn reassures him—it's not his fate to be killed by a river: Xanthos will soon let up! Keep attacking, they tell him, until you've driven the Trojans back into Ilion. But when you've slain Hektōr, then return to the ships: so far do we promise you glory! They take off and leave him. Achilles moves on over the flooded plain, thick with corpses and abandoned weapons: he now has the strength to defy the rolling river. But Xanthos doesn't let up, calls to Simoeis, the other river of the plain, to join with him in stopping this wild madman: he, Xanthos, will drown him, bury him and his armor deep! With that his surging wave, all blood and corpses, towers over Achilles. Hērē, watching, scared that the wave will wash him away, calls to Hēphaistos to stop Xanthos with consuming fire, which she'll speed with gales, and only to stop when she tells him, not before! Hēphaistos at once gets to work. He dries the plain with a front of fire that consumes the dead and their gear, trees, rushes, and bushes and torments the fishes and eels, and the River himself. Xanthos says, his water seething, like a cauldron as its water boils and melts hog fat: I won't fight you, Hēphaistos! Let Achilles drive them out of Troy! What's it to me? He stops his pursuit, and asks Hērē why her son has picked on his stream to attack? He'll stop now, and tell Hēphaistos to stop too! And he'll swear an oath never to ward off the day of doom from the Trojans, even when the city's ablaze.

At this Hērē tells Hēphaistos to stop: it's not right to harry a god on behalf of mortals. Hēphaistos quenches his fire, and the river flows back.

383–434: These two gods stop, but the others are in noisy conflict: Zeus sitting on Olympus laughs to see them at it. Arēs attacks Athēnē, spears her aegis; Athēnē hefts a huge boundary stone and knocks Arēs down with it, exclaiming: You still haven't learned how much more warlike I am than you! This will keep your mother happy—she's furious at you for deserting the Achaians for the Trojans! Aphrodītē now leads Arēs away, groaning and short of breath. Hērē sees them, and calls to Athēnē to go after them. Athēnē does, and hits Aphrodītē in the chest: she collapses, and both she and Arēs lie there. Athēnē exclaims: May all Trojan supporters be as bold and resolute as Aphrodītē! We'd have won the war long since if they had been! Hērē smiles . . .

435–514: Poseidōn addresses Apollo: Why are we holding back? Shame on us if we return to Olympus without fighting! You begin: you're the younger. And you're a fool: have you forgotten how Zeus made us serve Laomedōn for a year? I built Ilion's ramparts, you herded Laomedōn's cattle, and then he cheated us of our agreed hire, threatened us physically? Yet you now support his people, you don't want to destroy the Trojans! Apollo replies: Earth-Shaker, if I quarreled with you over mere transient mortals you'd say I was crazy. Give over this involvement, leave them to battle on their own! Apollo says this being ashamed to fight with his own uncle. But his sister Artemis upbraids him: Running away, are you? What use is your bow now? Don't let me ever hear you boasting again that you'd fight with Poseidōn! Apollo says nothing, but Hērē has an angry outburst at her: Want to fight me, do you? I'm no easy opponent, never mind your bow—it was women against whom Zeus made you a lion: better for you to be hunting wild beasts than fighting those stronger than yourself! Now, learn how much stronger I am than you! Hērē then grabs her wrists with one hand, and with the other beats her about the ears with her own bow and quiver. Weeping, Artemis flees, like a dove from a hawk, leaving her bow and arrows behind. At this Hermēs prudently tells Lētō that fighting Zeus's wives is unrewarding, and if she wants to say she beat him, that's fine. Lētō gathers up her daughter's archery gear, while Artemis herself runs to Zeus ("Your wife beat me!") who's highly amused.

515–611: Apollo meanwhile goes to Ilion, concerned lest the Achaians defy fate by storming the city now. The other gods join Zeus as spectators of the conflict. Achilles, like smoke from a burning city, fuelled by angry gods, continues his attack. Priam watches the rout from the walls of Troy, and calls to the gatekeepers to let the fugitives in, but to shut the gates again before Achilles can enter. They do so. Apollo, invisible by the oak tree, rouses Agēnōr to face Achilles. Agēnōr is in an agony of indecision. Shall he flee from Achilles? Then Achilles will overtake and kill him. Shall he run off to the thickets of Ida, cool off in the river, and return to Ilion in the evening? But what's the chance of Achilles not noticing and overtaking him? Oh, he reflects, what am I thinking about? Best to face him: he's human, can be wounded, is in fact mortal, even if Zeus favors him. With that he crouches ready, like a leopard that, even when speared, is ready to fight to the death. You thought you'd sack Troy today, he shouts at Achilles, but there are plenty of us here to stop you! You're the one who'll die! He throws his spear, hits Achilles' shin.

Achilles comes for him, but Apollo whisks Agēnōr to safety, hidden in mist, himself takes on Agēnōr's semblance, and leads him away in a chase over the plain, thus giving the fleeing Trojans a chance to get safely into the city.

BOOK 22

1–89: Trojans are cooling off and quenching their thirst on the battlements; Achaians are coming up to Troy, shields on their shoulders.

Hektōr is still outside Ilion, beyond the Skaian Gates. Apollo now asks Achilles why he, a mortal, is chasing him, Apollo, a god—not having recognized him as such—rather than keeping an eye on the Trojans: anyway he can't kill him. Achilles replies: You've fooled me: I'd have killed many more had it not been for you. If I had the power, I'd take my revenge on you. Achilles now moves at full speed to the city. Priam sees him first: he comes gleaming across the plain like that bright but malign harvest star called Orīōn's Dog. Priam then makes an urgent plea to Hektōr: Don't face Achilles alone, or you'll be killed! I wish he was dead, he's killed or sold off so many of my sons! And two more, Lykaōn and Polydōros, I don't see anywhere—if they're alive we'll ransom them, if dead, the more sorrow for us! Come inside, defend the city from here, on the ramparts! Take pity on me—Zeus will give me a bad enough death when the city falls and my sons are dead, my daughters and daughters-in-law raped, my children killed, my treasure gone: I'll be torn to pieces, an old man, by my own dogs! Nothing could be more shameful! His wife adds her own pleas; but Hektōr remains unmoved.

90–187: Achilles advances, huge and formidable. Hektōr holds his ground like an angry serpent in front of its lair. But he debates to himself: If I go inside, Poulydamas, who urged me to do just that when Achilles first rose up, will rebuke me! I should have listened to him. Now someone may say that I caused disaster by relying on my own strength. Better, then, to fight Achilles now, kill or be killed? Or should I lay aside my arms, go to him, promise to give back Helen and her possessions?

To divide up the wealth of the city? Have the Trojan elders swear to this? No, I can't approach him as a suppliant—if he doesn't pity me he may kill me, unarmed as I am, like a woman! Talk with him like a lover I can't: better to fight him, take my chances. Achilles approaches, spear in hand, bronze flashing like the sunrise. Hektōr, terrified, runs for it. Achilles pursues him like a hawk after a dove: past the fig tree and the two springs with their washing tanks, three times round the walls of Troy, running for Hektōr's life, with the gods all watching. Zeus exclaims: I'm sorry for Hektōr, who's always honored me, but with Achilles chasing him, the question is, shall we save him from death, or leave Achilles to kill him? Athēnē says: What? Rescue a mortal from his fate? If you choose to do that, you can; but we gods do not assent to it! Zeus replies: I'm not serious about this, and I want to be kind to you: do what you will about it. Athēnē flies down from Olympos.

188–272: Achilles continues hard in pursuit of Hektōr, who, like a deer chased by hunting dogs, isn't caught but can't get away. As in a dream, the pursuer can't catch his quarry or the quarry escape. Round they go three times, with Achilles keeping Hektōr in the plain, away from the walls. On the fourth round Zeus puts their two fates in his scales, and Hektōr's side plummets. Apollo, who's been helping him run fast, now leaves him. Athēnē comes to Achilles and says: He can't escape us now! Get your breath; I'll talk him into fighting. She then goes to Hektōr in the guise of his brother Deiphobos and says: Achilles is pressing you hard; let's both make a stand here! Achilles says: You were always my favorite brother: even more so now for daring to come outside with me. Athēnē says: Everyone begged me to stay inside! But now let's attack him! The warriors approach each other. Hektōr says: No more running away! And I swear to return your body if I win; so too do you. Achilles exclaims: We have no bond of friendship, any more than lions and men, wolves and lambs! Now you'll pay with your life for my comrades whom you killed.

273–366: Achilles throws his spear, Hektōr dodges it, Athēnē covertly picks it up and returns it to Achilles. Hektōr says: You missed! You didn't know my fate through Zeus after all. Hektōr's spear then rebounds from Achilles' shield. With no second spear, he calls to Deiphobos for one, but Deiphobos is nowhere to be seen. Hektōr instantly realizes the gods have doomed him, but determines not to die without a fight. He draws his sword and swoops like an eagle. Achilles charges him, spots a gap by the collarbone in the armor that Hektōr stripped from Patroklos, and drives his spear clean through. Hektōr falls, and Achilles boasts over him. Hektōr (the spear missed his windpipe) begs for his body to be returned home for burial, not left for the dogs to devour. Achilles says: Don't beg me! I wish I were mad enough to eat you raw myself! You're for the dogs and birds! No ransom will save you, however great. Dying, Hektōr says: I know you well. Perhaps it will be I who cause the wrath of the gods that day when Apollo and Paris kill you by the Skaian Gates. With that he dies. Achilles says: Lie dead! I'll accept my own death when the gods so say.

367–515: He pulls out his spear and starts stripping the corpse. The Achaians gather round and admire it, each one giving it a fresh wound. Hektōr's easier to deal with now than he was by the ships, they joke. When he's got off the armor, Achilles says: Now Hektōr is dead we should find out whether the Trojans still plan to hold out. And Patroklos is still unmourned, unburied! But for now we can go back to the ships with Hektōr's body, singing our victory paean! Then he lashes the body behind his chariot by its pierced heels and drags Hektōr off in the dust.

Priam and Hekabē see this; Priam, weeping, announces his determination to beg Achilles for the body; Hekabē leads the women in lamentation. Hektōr's wife, Andromachē, hears, from her loom, the sounds of mourning and rushes out: she too sees Hektōr being dragged in the dust, and she faints. When she recovers she laments the fate in store for their baby son Astyanax, robbed of a father, and cries that she'll burn all his fine clothes now, since he'll never wear them again.

BOOK 23

1–107: The rest disperse at the ships, but Achilles keeps back the Myrmidons, with their harnessed chariots, to drive three times round the body of Patroklos in mourning. The corpse of Hektōr is laid in the dust before him. Then they sit down to a funeral feast. After it the chiefs take Achilles to the hut of Agamemnōn. He refuses to wash off the blood and filth from his person until Patroklos has had formal burial.

Feasting in the evening; in the morning Agamemnōn should order men out to gather firewood and make all other preparations for Patroklos's funeral. After feasting, Achilles sleeps by the sea among his Myrmidons, and is visited by the ghost of Patroklos, who begs for proper burial, so that he can have proper admission to Hādēs, and for their bones to be buried together. Achilles tries to embrace him, but he vanishes like smoke, leaving Achilles with the reflection that yes, something survives in Hādēs, but it's terribly insubstantial.

108–248: The mourning continues all night. Men and mules go out to the forests to fell trees for the funeral pyre. Mourners cover Patroklos with their shorn hair. Achilles plans a great burial mound for both of them. The pyre is raised, sheep and cattle are sacrificed and the body wrapped in their fat. Achilles prays to the Spercheios river, dedicates his own hair, sacrifices Patroklos's own dogs and the twelve Trojan youths.

He threatens to turn Hektōr's corpse over to the dogs, but Aphrodītē and Apollo keep it undecayed and untouched by scavengers. He lights the pyre, but it refuses to kindle. He prays to the Winds for help, and Iris takes his message to them: they come and fire the pyre with a sustained gale. The blaze rages all night, while Achilles pours libations, and dies down at dawn, and the Winds go home. Achilles sleeps, but is woken by the leaders. He tells them to gather Patroklos's bones and ashes, put them in a golden casket, and bury them under a modest mound.

249–361: They do all this. When it is done, Achilles brings out prizes for the funeral games: cauldrons, tripods, horses, mules, oxen, women, pig iron, gold. First comes the chariot race. Achilles would himself have won it, he says, with his immortal team, had he competed. But now others must try. Eumēlos, Diomēdēs, Menelaōs, Antilochos, and Mērionēs all come forward. Nestōr advises his son Antilochos, whose horses are not the best there, to keep close to the marker at the turning point, and drive cleverly. They draw lots for positions at the start.

362–538: The race takes place. As they near the turn by the sea Eumēlos moves into first place, with Diomēdēs close behind and threatening to overtake him. But Apollo knocks the whip from Diomēdēs' hand. Athēnē gives the whip back to him, strengthens his horses, then wrecks Eumēlos's chariot. Diomēdēs and Menelaōs drive on past. Antilochos urges on his horses, passes Menelaōs off-track, dangerously, despite Menelaōs's enraged objections. Back at the finishing line Idomeneus says he thinks he's seen Diomēdēs leading the pack. Aias (2) says, No way, big mouth, it has to be Eumēlos. Achilles stops them quarrelling. Then Diomēdēs indeed comes in first, followed by Antilochos, with Menelaōs close behind, Mērionēs trailing a spear cast behind him, and Eumēlos last of all, on foot and dragging his chariot. Achilles tells them to give Eumēlos the second-place prize, since he's by far the best.

539–650: General agreement, but Antilochos objects: I came in second, he may be good but he overturned. Give him a special prize if you like, but the mare for second place is mine. Achilles smiles, and agrees to do that. He gives Eumēlos a corselet he won. But now Menelaōs raises his own objection, and calls for a judgment: Antilochos, he says, got ahead of him with inferior horses by trickery and cheating. Let him declare on oath whether he did or not! Antilochos says: I'm younger than you: you know what a young man's offenses can be! I'll give you the mare, and more of my own if you want, rather than be estranged from you and the gods! Menelaōs, warmed and touched, says: I give up my anger! Just don't try to con your betters! And though the mare is mine, I'll let you keep it! Mērionēs now takes fourth-place prize; the fifth is unclaimed, and Achilles gives it to Nestōr as a memento. Nestōr thanks him with a long rambling anecdote about his one-time prowess at the games.

651–739: Achilles now sets out prizes for boxing. Epeios admits inferiority as a warrior, but asserts that no one will beat him as a boxer, and that the next of kin should be on hand to carry his victim out. Euryalos stands up, who'd once defeated all the sons of Kadmos at the funeral of Oidipous (Oedipus), with Diomēdēs as his backer. Epeios knocks him out and claims the prize. The next prizes are for wrestling: Aias takes on Odysseus, and the two struggle mightily, close gripped like a high house's cross-beams carpentered to resist gales, but neither can gain the mastery, and Achilles declares the bout a draw, with equal prizes.

740–897: Next comes the footrace, with a silver mixing bowl, a fat ox, and a half-talent of gold as prizes. Aias son of Oileus, Odysseus, and Antilochos compete. Aias leads, with Odysseus as close behind him as a weaving rod is to the weaver's breast at the loom. Odysseus prays to Athēnē, who both gives him extra strength and tips Aias headlong in the cattle dung from Achilles' bull sacrifice. Aias knows, and says, spitting out dung, that Odysseus has had Athēnē's help, but everyone laughs at him. Antilochos gracefully compliments the older Odysseus—only Achilles could have beaten him. Achilles, flattered, adds another half-talent of gold to his third prize. Then it's the turn of the armed warriors' duel, and here Aias son of Telamōn and Diomēdēs compete. They fight violently; the Achaians, scared for Aias, stop the fight. Both get armor, but Diomēdēs is also given the sword that was the original prize. For the shot-putters, the prize is a great mass of pig iron, which also serves as the shot. Polypoitēs, Leonteus, Epeios, and Aias son of Telamōn compete. Everyone laughs at Epeios's effort. Polypoitēs far out-throws all the rest, and wins the prize. For archers, the target is a live dove tied to a cord that's attached to a ship's mast: prizes, ten double and ten single iron axes. Teukros and Mēriōnēs compete. Teukros forgets to vow Apollo a sacrifice, misses the dove but severs the cord. Mēriōnēs has an arrow ready, snatches the bow from Teukros, offers Apollo a sacrifice, and hits the dove in midair. He gets the double axes. Finally, for the spear throwing, Achilles gives the first prize, a cauldron, without competition to Agamemnōn, on reputation alone. Mēriōnēs gets the second prize, a bronze spear.

BOOK 24

1–119: All the others eat and turn in for the night, but Achilles remains sleepless, tossing and turning, then wanders along the shore, till dawn, mourning Patroklos. He ties Hektōr behind his chariot again, drags him three times around the burial mound, and leaves him lying there when he goes back to rest. But Apollo keeps his flesh undecayed, wrapped in the aegis. The gods pity Hektōr and urge Hermēs to steal his body. All, that is, except Poseidōn and Hērē and Athēnē, who still hate the Trojans because of the insult to them in the Judgment of Paris. On the twelfth day Apollo upbraids them as hard-hearted: Did Hektōr never sacrifice to you? Why do you support Achilles now? He's mad, obsessional, pitiless. Most mourners weep and that's that. But this man trails the corpse round his comrade's tomb—no honor in that! He should beware: we could grow angry with him. He's outraging the earth!

Hērē says to Apollo: Yes, if you grant Hektōr and Achilles equal honor: but while Hektōr's mortal, Achilles is the son of a goddess, and we were all at the wedding—you too! Zeus says: These two don't have equal honor, but Hektōr was dear to the gods, certainly to me, to whom he always sacrificed. And let's hear no more about stealing his corpse—Achilles would know at once because of Thetis his mother. So, call Thetis here: I want to have her persuade Achilles to return Hektōr's body to Priam for ransom. Iris fetches Thetis from the deep sea, and she joins the gods' assembly. Zeus tells her the gods want to remove the body, and that she must persuade her son to give it back to Priam; Iris meanwhile must tell Priam to go to the ships with an offer of ransom.

120–264: Thetis goes back to Achilles, who is still lamenting, while his companions prepare the morning meal. She says: How long will you go on like this? You need to eat, to have a woman—you're not long for this life! Zeus and the gods are angry with you for not returning Hektōr's body. Give him up, accept ransom! Achilles says: If that's so, if Zeus so orders, then whoever brings ransom can have him. Meanwhile Zeus sends Iris to Troy to tell Priam to amass ransom and go alone to the ships, with just a elderly herald to drive the loaded mule wagon and return with the body. Hermēs will guide him, and Achilles won't kill him, or let anyone else do so: he respects suppliants. Iris goes and finds Priam, filth-stained, mourning with his family. She passes on Zeus's message and leaves. Priam tells his sons to ready the wagon. He then goes to his treasure chamber, telling his wife Hekabē what he's planning. She screams and tries to deter him—so ruthless is Achilles: were it possible she would eat his heart raw! Priam says: Don't try to stop me; a goddess it was gave the orders. If I can have my son back, then Achilles can kill me if he so chooses. He then picks out the ransom: fine robes, rugs, ten talents of gold, tripods, cauldrons, a beautiful Thracian cup. With his staff he drives the Trojans away from his courtyard. Then he calls on his sons, with many insults—all the best are dead—to hurry up and get the wagon ready, and load the ransom onto it.

265–439: Priam's sons bring out the wagon, yoke the mules, and load the treasure. Hekabē tells Priam to make libation and pray to Zeus for a favorable sign. He does so, and Zeus sends a black eagle on the right. Seeing it, they rejoice. The wagon then leaves Troy, driven by Idaios the herald: the family members seeing them off now turn back. Zeus now tells Hermēs to accompany them as a guide and helper. Hermēs puts on his winged sandals, takes his wand of sleep, and goes, disguised as an aristocratic youth. He finds the mules being watered at the river. Priam and Idaios are scared. Hermēs puts them at ease, offers to help and defend them. Priam says the gods must be looking out for them to send such a fine youth their way. Where are you taking this treasure, Hermēs asks. Are you fleeing the city, or storing your goods now your son Hektōr is dead? Who are you, Priam asks. An attendant of Achilles, Hermēs says. At dawn the Achaians plan to attack the city. Priam asks: Is my son still there by the ships or has he been given to the dogs? No, Hermēs says, he's not devoured, he's still by the ships, and his flesh hasn't rotted after twelve days, nor have maggots got into it! He's still fresh, he's free of bloodstains, his wounds are closed—he was dear to the gods, they're taking care of him. Priam says, that shows how right my son was always to remember what was due to them! So, here's this cup I'll give you, if you'll be our guide till we reach Achilles' hut. Hermēs says: You're testing me, trying to make me take gifts behind Achilles' back! I'll gladly be your guide, though, on land or at sea.

440–558: With that Hermēs takes over the driving of the wagon. He puts the meal-busy guards at the wall to sleep, then slides back the bar and opens the gates. They then drive in, and Hermēs also opens the gateway to the palisaded enclosure the Myrmidons built for Achilles, drawing back the bar it took three men (except for Achilles) to shift. He then brings in the ransom and leaves for Olympos, saying he is Hermēs, and that it's improper for a god to be entertained by mortals. Priam leaves Idaios with the horses and mules, and goes into the hut, where Achilles has just eaten, and is being attended by Automedōn and Alkimos. Priam clasps Achilles' knees, and kisses his slaughterer's hands. All are amazed. He begs Achilles to think of his own father, and rehearses his own miseries, not least the death of Hektōr, announces he's come with ransom for the body, urges Achilles to respect the gods and pity him. They both weep: Priam for Hektōr, Achilles for both Pēleus and Patroklos. Finally Achilles, astonished that Priam has dared come, calls for a truce to mourning: men get whatever Zeus gives, good and bad: Pēleus too. Priam too was once fortunate, but now—! Give over; you won't bring your son back that way. Don't grovel, get up, take a seat. Priam refuses to sit while Hektōr remains untended. Return the body, he says, and quickly: accept my ransom.

559–676: Don't provoke me, Achilles says. My mother brought me Zeus's fiat: I intend to return Hektōr to you! And I know some god brought you here: you'd never have made it otherwise! So annoy me no further—I might ignore your suppliant status, and Zeus's fiat! Priam obeys. Automedōn and Alkimos unyoke the horses and mules and bring in the herald, along with the ransom, except enough apparel to shroud the corpse in. Achilles orders the handmaids to wash and dress the body elsewhere, to avoid arousing Priam's wrath so that Achilles would be driven to kill him. The body is then set on a bier and the bier on the wagon. Achilles apologizes to the ghost of Patroklos for what he is doing. He then goes back in, tells Priam his son is ready on a bier to be removed in the morning. But for now, you should eat, he says: even Niobē took food after her children were all killed by Apollo and Artemis! Keep your mourning for when you're back in Ilion. So they eat supper, and eye each other, marveling. Priam says: I need to sleep. This is the first I'll have eaten or slept since my son's death. Achilles has beds made up out in the portico, explaining to Priam that he sometimes gets late-night visitors from among the Achaians, who might, seeing Priam, tell Agamemnōn, who might well be less accommodating over the body. He then asks: How many days do you need for Hektōr's proper funeral? Priam says: Nine days to gather wood for the pyre and to mourn him. Funeral and feast on the tenth; actual burial on the eleventh. Back to warfare, if we have to, on the twelfth. Agreed, Achilles says, and clasps hands on it. Then they both sleep, Priam outside, Achilles with Briseïs.

677–804: Hermēs now ponders how to get Priam and the body away unnoticed. He stands over Priam and tells him: Get up and be on your way now you've ransomed your son! If Agamemnōn or the others find out you're here, it'll cost three times as much to ransom you yourself! Priam wakes, terrified, and rouses Idaios the herald. Meanwhile Hermēs yokes up horses and mules, and drives them out unseen as dawn breaks, leaving them for Olympos when they reach the Xanthos river. Priam and Idaios then drive chariot and wagon back to Troy. Only Kassandrē sees them, but she then arouses the Trojans, and a crowd gathers at the gates to welcome Priam, led by Andromachē and Hekabē. Andromachē laments: Hektōr, you leave me a young widow, with a baby son. Who will save Troy now? The city will be destroyed, I shall be sold into servitude, and my son will either go likewise or be murdered!

Then Hekabē: Hektor, dearest of my sons, the gods looked after you! My other sons Achilles sold abroad; but though he dragged you round Patroklos's tomb, that still didn't bring Patroklos back, and despite it all your body's still fresh! Then it was Helen's turn: In all the time I've been in Troy, Hektōr, I've never had anything but kindness from you, and you stopped the unkindness of others as well. So I weep for you and myself: everyone here now hates me! Priam then gives orders for fetching timber, since Achilles has guaranteed a truce. For nine days they collect it. On the tenth they set Hektōr on the pyre, and light it. On the eleventh they gather the bones in a golden urn, and bury them. Finally they celebrate a funeral feast in Priam's home. Hektōr's burial is complete.

Select Glossary

NOTE: This glossary is mostly limited to the names of people and places that play a sufficient part in the narrative of the Iliad to arouse the reader's or listener's interest. It does not include all the many victims slaughtered on both sides, who for the most part exist only as names, sometimes with a brief biography attached. The same is true of a host of attendant nymphs. In general, main characters excepted, I ignore any name for which the evidence comes only from the poem itself.

ABANTES A people of the island of EUBOIA, they are skilled at hand-to-hand fighting and notable (2.542) for wearing what are apparently long pigtails.

ACHAIA (AHHIYAWA), ACHAANS Achaia seems to have been originally the northern Achaia in PHTHIŌTIS, home of ACHILLES. For Homer, "Achaians", like ARGIVES and DANAĀNS, has become a term loosely equivalent to "Hellenes", that is, Greeks, in historical times. To the Hittites, Ahhiyawa was a powerful kingdom; it was seemingly located on the Greek mainland and is now generally agreed to be identical to Achaia (Latacz 2004, 121–28). How far south this kingdom extended is uncertain.

ACHELŌĪOS Both a river and a river god (21.194), the offspring of OCEAN and Tethys. Homer mentions two rivers of this name: the more important one (though not located) in Akarnania (a mountainous district in northwestern Greece), and the other in Asia Minor, near Sipylos.

ACHILLES Son of PĒLEUS and the divine sea nymph THETIS, unrivalled ACHAIAN warrior from PHTHIĒ in THESSALY, leader of the MYRMIDONS, and the central figure in the drama of the Iliad. Early details about him known from other sources such as his physical invulnerability and his posthumous translation by THETIS to immortality on the White Island (Leukē) are not mentioned in the Iliad (Aethiopsis arg. 4 = West 2003 [A], 112–13). His rage or wrath (mēnis) is appropriate given the divine element in his blood, since it is a kind of intense fury most often found elsewhere among the gods. Disillusioned with the whole epic notion of heroism, of fighting for honor and kléos (glory), since heroes and cowards now, he argues (9.318–20) get equal honor and all die anyway, he toys with the idea of going home to PHTHIĒ and leading a long peaceful life. It is the death of his beloved comrade PATROKLOS that spurs him on to embrace the short glorious life that is fated for him, and now his motive is simply revenge, exemplified by his abuse of Hektōr's corpse (22.395–404). It takes his confrontation with HEKTŌR's father PRIAM, come to ransom his son's body (24.477–551), to make him recognize their common humanity and sorrow; and even this encounter has to be organized—and insisted on—by ZEUS (24.103–19). His death at the SKAIAN GATES, shot by PARIS ALÉXANDROS at the instigation of APOLLO, is prophesied by the dying HEKTŌR (22.359–60) but takes place (Aethiopis arg. 3 = West 2003 [A], 112–13) after the conclusion of the Iliad.

AEGEAN SEA The extension of the Mediterranean delimited to the west by the Greek mainland, to the south by the great island of KRĒTĒ (CRETE), to the east by the coast of Asia Minor, from the AEOLIS down to CARIA, and in the north by Macedonia and the Chalcidic peninsula (see map), and enclosing numerous islands, in particular those of the archipelago in the southern Aegean known as the Cyclades.

AEGIS A magical object, possessed by ATHĒNĒ and ZEUS (who lends his to APOLLO, 15.219–30) of which the exact appearance is never fully clarified. It is made of material, most probably goatskin, and has been likened to a large bib or shawl, draped round the shoulders (5.738). It is ageless, immortal, fringed with gold tassels, and of great value (2.447–49). It is decorated with the Gorgon's head and with allegorical figures such as Valor and Rout, appropriate for the battlefield, where it is most frequently used in the Iliad, being shaken out like a standard (15.229–30, 17.593–96) to encourage the side the god favors, to terrify their enemies, and to protect individuals. In this last capacity Apollo uses it (24.18–21) to cover HEKTŌR's dead body and keep it from defilement as ACHILLES drags it behind his chariot: just how, we are not told, nor whether Achilles can see it. See also book 2, note 2.

AEOLIS That portion of the Asia Minor coast from the entrance of the HELLESPONT south as far as the Hermos river (thus including the TROAD, q.v.).

AGAMEMNŌN Son of ATREUS and brother of MENELAŌS: married to HELEN's sister KLYTAIMNĒSTRA, and the father of ORESTĒS and at least three daughters, including IPHIGENEIA. The commander in chief of the ACHAIAN expedition to TROY, and thus characterized as "lord of men" (anax andrōn), he is by turns arrogant, clumsy, aggressive, insulting, and panic-stricken, characteristics that determine his actions throughout the Iliad. Despite this, and accusations of cowardice, he proves himself (11.91–263) a fine warrior in battle and an expert spearman. Much of the trouble he incurs is due to his excessive concern for his own aristocratic status. The nervous apologia he makes for his own behavior (19.78–144) is typical. Impulsive and tactless, given to fits of despair, he nevertheless recognizes his own faults in the quarrel with ACHILLES, and he more than once (e.g., at 9.115–61) at length declares himself willing to make ample amends. The notorious deed that eventually leads to his murder by his wife after his return home (Od. 11.405–35), the sacrifice of IPHIGENEIA to appease ARTEMIS, is not mentioned in the Iliad, although his anger at KALCHAS the priest (who called for the sacrifice) as having never brought anything good to pass, only disasters (1.108–9) may hint at this episode.

AGĒNŌR A leading Trojan warrior, the son of ANTĒNŌR and the priestess Theanō, he scores the first kill recorded (4.469) for the Trojans, and alone stands up to ACHILLES in the great battle by the SKAMANDROS river. He is unsuccessful, but APOLLO wafts him off the battlefield, and then, assuming his likeness, lures Achilles away from pursuit of the routed Trojans (21.544–611).

AHHIYAWA See s.v. ACHAIA.

AIAKOS Father of PĒLEUS and TELAMŌN, and thus grandfather to ACHILLES. He himself was a son of ZEUS by a nymph, Aigina, daughter of the ASŌPOS river; according to one tradition he was connected with AIGINA the island before it was inhabited, and ZEUS supposedly created a population for his benefit (Hes. Cat. fr. 145 Most 2.212–13) from the local ants (myrmēkes), which became the MYRMIDONS (q.v.) and accompanied the family to PHTHIĒ in THESSALY, where it was well established by Pēleus's day.

AIAS (1) Son of TELAMŌN, known as “the Greater” to distinguish him from AIAS (2), together with whom he frequently fights; they are a kind of double turn (bracketed by Homer through the use of the dual to describe them as a pair). He is notably huge and strong, and carries a large (anachronistic) shield, which he uses (17.128–38) to protect the body of PATROKLOS. As a warrior he is regarded as second only to ACHILLES, and perhaps on that account, he is also part of the diplomatic embassy (9.182–655) that attempts to bring ACHILLES back into the war. His end takes place beyond the time frame of the Iliad. After ACHILLES' death, AIAS and ODYSSEUS rescue his body and bring it back to the ACHAIAN camp; but at the funeral games the prize for bravery, consisting of the arms of ACHILLES, is awarded to ODYSSEUS rather than to him; as a result he goes mad and commits suicide (Little Iliad, arg. 1 = West 2003 [A], 120–21). He never forgives his rival even in the underworld (Od. 11.543–64).

AIAS (2) Son of OĪLEUS, LOKRIAN hero, known as “the Lesser” to distinguish him from the son of Telamōn, AIAS (1), but a member of AGAMEMNŌN's council of war and a formidable warrior in his own right. He emerges with the highest headcount of slain Trojans in the Iliad (Polinskaya, HE 1: 26). His rape of KASSANDRĒ at the sack of Troy (Sack of Iliion arg. 3 = West 2003 [A], 146–47) is not referred to. He dies at the hand of POSEIDŌN on the way home from Troy (Od. 4.99–511, Returns arg. 3 = West 2003 [A], 154–55).

AIGINA Island in the Saronic Gulf, roughly halfway between Attica and Epidaurus. In the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.559–64) it figures as part of the ARGOLID controlled by DIOMĒDĒS.

AINEIAS Son of ANCHĪSĒS by the goddess APHRŌDĪTĒ, and (like his second cousin PRIAM) descended from Dardanos and the Trojan royal line, though through Kapys rather than LAOMEDŌN. He bears a permanent grievance at not receiving from PRIAM the honor that he feels is his due (13.460–61, cf. 20.178–83). Despite his reputation as a warrior second only to HEKTŌR (6.78–79 and elsewhere) he does not figure very impressively in battle (e.g., 5.297–318, 20.86–102): on the other hand, his standing with the gods is marked by the number of times they rescue him when he is in trouble: his mother saves him from DIOMĒDĒS (5.311–17), and so does APOLLO (5.431–47); POSEIDŌN spirits him away through the air from ACHILLES (20.318–39), prophesying that he will rule over the TROJANS. He escapes from TROY at the time of its sack. His lasting fame is owing, not so much to the Iliad, as to the Roman tradition, promoted by Virgil in the Aeneid, of his emigration to Italy and foundation there of the port city Lavinium and the gens Iulia (thus figuring as the ancestor of Caesar and Augustus), leading eventually to the foundation of Rome itself.

AITŌLIA A rugged, mountainous area of west central Greece, adjacent to Akarnania, the Gulf of Corinth, and the ACHELŌÏOS RIVER. The Aitōlians are listed in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.638–44) as contributing forty vessels to the expedition against TROY, and their battle with the Kourētes is described at length by PHOINIX (9.529–99).

ALÉXANDROS See s.v. PARIS/ALÉXANDROS.

ALKMĒNĒ Daughter of Elektryōn, married to Amphitryōn, mother of Iphiklēs, and (by ZEUS, who seduces her disguised as her husband) of HĒRAKLĒS (14.323–24). HĒRĒ, determined to thwart Zeus’s plan for Hēraklēs to become king of the Argolid, holds up his birth until after that of his cousin EURYSTHEUS (19.95–125); as an adult Hēraklēs (about whom the Iliad displays more knowledge than it does about most of the earlier generation of mythical heroes) is indentured to Eurystheus to perform the Twelve Labors (variously referred to at 8.363, 367–69; 15.30, 639; 19.114–24, 133).

ALPHEIOS The largest river in the PELOPONNESE: rising in the mountains of ARCADIA it flows west-northwest past Olympia and Elis, forming the northern boundary of NESTŌR’s kingdom of PYLOS and discharging into the IONIAN SEA. Also recognized by Homer (11.727) as a river god.

ALTHAIĒ Daughter of Thestios, married to Oineus, king of Kalydōn, and mother of MELEAGROS, whom she curses for the killing of her brother in a fight over the Kalydōnian boar; her curse is heard by the FURIES (9.567–72).

AMAZONS A mythical race of warrior women, traditionally descended from ARĒS, and located in Anatolia, near the Sangarios river, which was where PRIAM (3.186–89) fought them in his youth. BELLEROPHŌN also defeated them (6.186). In both cases Homer describes them as antianetras, “a match for men.”

ANCHISĒS Son of Kapys, descendant of TRŌS, and by APHRODITĒ father of AINEIAS. During the TROJAN WAR he is an elderly man (17.324); the tradition regarding his escape at the time of the city’s sack is familiar from Virgil’s Aeneid. Homer has a reference to his mortal wife (13.429–33) and to a daughter, Hippodameia.

ANDROMACHĒ Daughter of ĒĒTIŌN, king (6.396–97) of THĒBĒ (2); married to HEKTŌR (22.468–72), with whom she comes to TROY, and mother of a baby son, called by his parents Skamandrios, but known to the Trojans as Astyanax, “lord of the city” (6.402–3). Her fear, after Hektŏr’s death, that the child will be flung from the battlements when the city is captured (24.726–38) is all too prescient (Little Iliad, fr. 29 = West 2003 [A], 140–41): this scene (with ACHILLES’ son NEOPTOLEMOS—who also got Andromachē as war booty—doing the deed) is a favorite with both black- and red-figure Athenian vase-painters (Anderson, HE 1: 107). The strong and loving relationship between husband and wife is wonderfully conveyed in their all-too-brief meeting with their son (6.390–493) near the gates of Troy. The scene (22.437–516) in which Andromachē first learns of Hektŏr’s death is equally powerful and moving.

ANTĒNŌR A Trojan elder, married to the priestess Theanō (6.295–300); he is most notable for unsuccessfully advocating the return of HELEN to the ACHA- IANS (7.347–53).

ANTILOCHOS A son of NESTŌR, an aristocrat who distinguishes himself, though comparatively young, among the various ACHAIAN warriors. He comes into dramatic prominence relatively late. It is he who brings news of the death of PATROK- LOS to ACHILLES (18.2–21). At Patroklos’s funeral games, he is carefully coached for the chariot race by his father (23.306–48), interprets the advice in a somewhat questionable way, and wins (23.373–447). Challenged by MENELAŌS, he backs down charmingly, and ends by keeping his prize. Last in the foot-race, he elegantly flatters Achilles, who doubles his consolation prize (23. 785–97). He is also, famously, the only character in the entire Iliad who, just once (23.555), makes Achilles smile. He is killed (after the close of the Iliad) by Memnŏn, son of the DAWN (Od. 4.186–87; Aethiopis arg. 2, 4 = West 2003 [A], 112–13).

APHRODĪTĒ Goddess of erotic desire, well established in the Hellenic pantheon by Homer’s time. Neither her birth nor her origins are certain. According to Homer, she was the child of ZEUS by Diŏnē; in Hesiod (Th. 190–206) she is sired by the foam (aphros) round the genitals of Ouranos, thrown into the sea by his son KRONOS after the latter had cut them off, which suggests an older, more primitive tradition, against which Homer may be reacting. The Iliad knows about her affair with ANCHĪSĒS (which produced AINEIAS), and of her calamitous role in the JUDGMENT OF PARIS (not least her having made HELEN unable to resist Paris’s advances in return for his vote rating her beauty above that of HĒRĒ and ATHĒNĒ, thus precipitating the TROJAN WAR). Cf. 2.819–21, 24.25–30.

Throughout the Iliad Aphrodītē is viewed, not unreasonably, as a disconcerting mixture of dangerous power and adolescent silliness. She uses her magic to rescue PARIS when he’s about to be killed in a duel by MENELAŌS, and wafts him back home to have sex with Helen—who still, clearly, can’t resist him, and hates herself for it (3. 377–448). Aphrodītē rescues her bastard son AINEIAS from DIOMĒDĒS, and starts to carry him off the battlefield; but Diomēdēs attacks and wounds her, with loud insults, so that she drops Aineias (who is rescued by APOLLO), borrows ARĒS' chariot, and drives home to OLYMPOS to seek comfort from Daddy (Zeus) and Mommy (Diōnē), like any teenage girl, while Athēnē and Hērē mock her (5.311–429: so much for the Judgment of Paris!). Both silliness and power are to the fore when Hērē borrows Aphroditē's magic to produce (for her own nefarious purposes) an irresistible urge for sex in Zeus (14.187–223). In the Battle of the Gods, Aphroditē is rudely beaten up by Athēnē (21.415–26). To Homer, it is her childishness that makes her enormous power (through the ability to manipulate the male sexual drive) so perilous: this, after all, is what, in the last resort, underlies the unstoppable waste and futility of the Trojan War—this, and the PLAN OF ZEUS. In an unlooked-for sense, Aphroditē is very much her father's daughter.

APOLLO The son of ZEUS and Lētō, who bore him on the AEGEAN island of Dēlos, which, like Delphi, became one of his major sanctuaries. The Iliad makes clear that by Homer's time, Apollo's cult was widespread (though his name, unlike those of several other Hellenic deities, does not figure in the MYCENAEAN LINEAR B tablets). The main myths regarding him are well known. He is regularly portrayed as young, handsome, and beardless. His many special powers and interests include archery, disease and healing, and music and poetry: he is associated with the lyre, rather than with the wilder wind and percussion instruments. Yet his civilization has its limits. His first introduction in the Iliad shows him (1.8–53) physically shooting arrows bearing plague into the ACHAIAN troops (a nice instance of the way Homer retains an archaic reified concept of things later regarded as no more than immanent if not actually abstract), in reprisal for the insulting dismissal by AGAMEMNŌN of Apollo's priest CHRYSSES.

Throughout the poem, in fact, Apollo remains consistently on the side of the TROJANS. On the battlefield he rescues AINEIAS, and takes him to his own Trojan shrine, where Lētō and his twin sister ARTEMIS (who are as pro-Trojan as he is) magically nurse him back to health (5.344–45, 431–48). He is directly responsible for the death of PATROKLOS, dealing him a dizzying blow from behind (16.786–805) that leaves him helpless and vulnerable (cf. also 700–711). He keeps HEKTŌR's dead body free from decay and mutilation (24.18–21), and fulminates against the other gods (24.33–54) for standing by during the abuse of the corpse by ACHILLES—a tirade that indirectly leads (Graf, HE 1: 66) to the ransoming of Hektōr by PRIAM. His main opponent on OLYMPOS is ATHĒNĒ, whose pro-Achaian stance is still seemingly fuelled by resentment at the long-past JUDGMENT OF PARIS. Graf (ibid.) goes on to point out that since LAOMEDŌN cheated both Apollo and his uncle POSEIDŌN of their due hire for building the walls of TROY and guarding his cattle during the building, Apollo should logically be anti-rather than pro-Trojan (as Poseidōn reminds him, 21. 444–60). However, he draws the line at actual combat with his uncle (21.461–66).

ARCADIA A mountainous and poverty-stricken inland region of the north-central PELOPONNESE. Arcadians were traditionally regarded as pre-DORIANS, and their dialect differed sharply from that of other Peloponnesians. No seafarers, they nevertheless brought sixty ships to Troy (supplied them by AGAMEMNŌN: 2. 603–14).

ARĒS Son of ZEUS and HĒRĒ, but essentially marginal (indeed, almost mortal: 5.388–91), and thoroughly disliked by his divine father (5.887–93), Arēs is the god of the more brutal and thuggish aspects of warfare (in contrast to his opponent ATHĒNĒ, “who represents the intelligent and orderly use of war to defend the polis” (Graf, *OCD*³ 153). In the Iliad he fights—by no means always successfully—on the side of the TROJANS. Wounded by DIOMĒDĒS, he bellows “as loud as the war-cry of nine thousand—no, ten thousand—fighting troops” (5.859–61). Hit in the neck by a well-aimed rock from Athēnē, he sprawls out over seven furlongs in the dust (21.406–14), and she laughs at the sight. There is something inherently ridiculous about Arēs. He goes whining to Zeus like a child (5.867–86); when, in the Odyssey, he’s snared in bed with APHRODĪTĒ by her outraged husband HĒPHAISTOS, all the gods come and mock the guilty pair (Od. 8.266–343). Yet he is described as “a glutton for war” (5.388) or, regularly, as “ruin of mortals”; he is accompanied in battle (4.440, 11.37, 15.119) by Deimos (Terror) and Phobos (Rout), the surprisingly abstract offspring from his coupling with Aphrodītē; his very name is used as shorthand for “war frenzy”, while the mōlos Arēos (perhaps literally Arēs’ mill) is the “grind of battle” (2.401).

ARGOLID, THE Extended peninsula south of CORINTH (KORINTHOS) and west of the Saronic Gulf, mostly mountainous except for its coastline and the large and fertile ARGIVE plain at the head of the Gulf of ARGOS. This plain was the site of several major Mycenaean sites, including MYKĒNAI (MYCENAE) and TIRYNS. In the Iliad the Argolid is divided between two dominant kingdoms, that extend beyond its boundaries: those of DIOMĒDĒS and AGAMEMNŌN. The first, based on Argos, includes most of the Argolid, including Troizēn and Epidaurus; the second, ruled from Mykēnai, extends northward into Corinthian territory. See the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS, 2.559–61, 569–75. Both suggest Dorian manipulation in the Archaic Age (Finkelberg 2005, 171).

ARGOS, ARGIVES The pre-DORIAN MYCENAEAN city of Argos, at the southern end of the Argive plain in the northeastern PELOPONNESE, flourished c. 1350–1200 B.C.E., and in the Iliad forms the capital of the kingdom of DIOMĒDĒS. The later Dorian occupants seem to have appropriated some of this Mycenaean tradition. To complicate the picture further, “ARGIVES” is one of the three generic terms (the others being “ACHAIANS”—the most popular—and “DANAĀNS”) used in the Iliad to describe members of the force attacking TROY, which is to say, in the loosest sense, Homeric Greeks. Indicative of a more limited geographical sense are phrases such as “ACHAIAN Argos” (the Argolid or Argive valley) and “Pelasgian Argos” (southern THESSALY, the home of ACHILLES: Finkelberg, HE 1: 87).

ARISTEIA The concentrated formal description, sometimes at considerable length, of the arming, military successes, and climactic crisis of a single warrior performing at his best (from Greek aristos, “best”). Mueller (HE 1: 89) well compares the aristeia to “a solo in a concerto.” The four major aristeias are those of DIOMĒDĒS (5.1–8, 84–352, 431–44), AGAMEMNŌN (11.15–46, 84–180, 218–83), PATROKLOS (16.130–54, 364–507, 553–87, 684–857), and ACHILLES (20.156–503; 21.17–382, 520–611).

ARTEMIS Daughter of ZEUS and Lêtō, and twin sister of APOLLO, Artemis has signs, even in Homer, of great antiquity: not least the title “Lady of Beasts” (Potnia Thērōn, 21.470), which suggests MYCENAEAN, even possibly MINOAN, antecedents. Despite this, she does not figure prominently in the Iliad. Like her mother and brother, she is very much on the TROJAN side. She helps nurse the wounded AINEIAS (5.445–48). When her brother chooses not to fight his uncle POSEIDŌN she angrily accuses him of cowardice (21.468–77) and gets banged around the ears by HĒRĒ for her pains with her own bow and arrows (21.479–504). This hardly enhances her tradition in myth as virgin huntress, protector of women in childbirth, and presider over their various rites de passage, not least that from maidenhood to marriage. Homer rather emphasizes her role as a death-bringing deity: like her brother, Artemis is a “deadly archer”. Together the two of them (as ACHILLES recalls, 24.602–9) shot to death the numerous brood of Niobē’s children, Artemis taking care of the girls while Apollo did away with the boys. She is also on record (without explanation) as having killed the mothers of both SARPĒDŌN and HEKTŌR’s wife ANDROMACHĒ (6.205, 428). See also s.v. ASKLĒPIOS.

ASINĒ A MYCENAEAN and Archaic site in the Argolid, on a rugged promontory near Tolō and Nauplion: given modern prominence by George Seferis’s famous poem “The King of Asine” (Seferis 259–65), where it is referred to as “only one word in the Iliad and that uncertain” (in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS, 2.560). Conquered by ARGOS c. 700, it survived into the Hellenistic period.

ASKLĒPIOS Homer knows him only as a “peerless healer” (4.194, 11.518), taught by the Centaur CHEIRŌN (4.219), and the father of two noted healers at TROY, Machaōn and Podaleirios (2.731–32), from THESSALY (2.729–33). The Iliad has no mention of his parentage (APOLLO and the nymph Korōnis), of his dramatic birth (snatched from his mother’s womb on her funeral pyre: Apollo had sent ARTEMIS to kill Korōnis for suspected infidelity), or of his death by ZEUS’s thunderbolt (he had become so famous a healer that he even attempted to raise the dead: Zeus killed him for trying to nullify inexorable FATE: see Gantz 91 with ref.)

ASŌPOS The main river of BOIŌTIA, flowing eastward from Thespiai through a gorge near Tanagra and discharging into the river Euripos near Orōpos (4.383, 10.287). Homer’s description of it as reed-thick with grassy banks still holds good.

ATHĒNĒ Favorite daughter of ZEUS, born from his head (though this is never specifically stated in the Iliad, frequent though her presence is throughout) without any mother (Gantz 51–52 with ref.). ARĒS, when remonstrating with Zeus about her encouragement of DIOMĒDĒS’ killing spree (5.871–86) nevertheless comes very close when he says (874–75): “We’re all at war with you, for you bore [tékes] this mad accursed / daughter of yours . . .” She is early established: in the MYCENAEAN LIN-EAR B tablets there is an a-ta-na po-ti-ni-ja who may well be Athēnē Potnia, Lady Athēnē. Several of her epithets are of doubtful meaning; again, a sign of antiquity

(Is glaukōpis “grey-eyed”, “bright-eyed”, or “owl-eyed”? All are possible). More formidable on account of her close, and indeed unique, relationship with Zeus, Athēnē is a virgin warrior goddess, who wears armor as well as her terrifying AEGIS, and stands, sometimes disguised, as helper and ally, beside those mortal men whom she favors (e.g., DIOMĒDĒS and ODYSSEUS), and over whom she watches carefully (e.g., in the night-raid on the Thracians, 10.278–91). Having not experienced normal childbirth, she undertakes masculine actions with no hesitation; yet she also possesses female skills. Besides making clothes (5.733–37) she is an expert in, and patron of, skills such as weaving, pottery, carpentry, and metalworking. Both sides are to the fore in her role as city protector, Athēnē Polias.

Her relationship to ATHENS is more ambiguous than might be supposed. Though her name and that of the city are virtually identical, and the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS insists (2.546–51) that she nurtured Athens’s early earth-born mythical king ERECHTHEUS, the Athenians are considerably more interested in her than her own mythical and religious tradition is in them. This is very noticeable in the Iliad, where Athēnē is more prominent than any other god aside from Zeus, yet the ATHENIANS are barely mentioned. Her Athenian association with the owl reminds us of her reputation for wisdom and good judgment, and her first entry in the Iliad (1.188–222) is to stop the furious ACHILLES from drawing his sword on AGAMEMNŌN.

However, this action of hers, it turns out, is not characteristic. Throughout the action she is a committed supporter of the ACHAIANS, not only continually urging them on to fight, armed with her AEGIS (2.445–52, 5.793–834), but on occasion more than ready to join the battle herself (5.835–63, 21.391–433). When Achilles renounces his wrath and is ready to return to the fray, Athēnē (18.203–6) wraps him in her aegis, sets a golden cloud over his head, and makes a bright flame blaze from his head (how metaphorical this last is Homer deliberately does not make clear). It is not until the very last book (24.25–30), and then in a casual aside, that we are reminded of the earliest, and most rankling, reason for Athēnē’s and HĒRĒ’s implacable hatred of TROY and the TROJANS (4.30–68, 20.313, and throughout): their dismissal, in a beauty contest, by PARIS in favor of APHRODĪTĒ. Homer’s placing of this reminder, after all the slaughter and heartache, was surely no accident.

ATHENS, ATHENIANS Like CORINTH (KORINTHOS), Athens notably fails to live up to its later fame in the Iliad, rating only a brief mention in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.545–54), where it figures as “a well-built citadel” but the ATHENIANS receive only four other glancing references (4.32; 13.196, 689; 15.337).

ATREUS Son of Pelōps and Hippodameia, brother of Thyestēs, father of AGAMEMNŌN and MENELAŌS by his wife Airōpē, and king of MYKĒNAI. At 2.100–108 we are given a dynastic list of Agamemnon’s predecessors as inheritor of the royal scepter: from Atreus it passes without incident to Thyestēs, and Thyestēs similarly passes it on to Agamemnon. But (as scholars not been slow to point out) this completely ignores, and rewrites, a more than usually lurid sequence of mythical dynastic infighting, involving murder, treachery, adultery, incest, and unwitting cannibalism (details in Gantz 540–56), in which Atreus and Thyestēs figure as deadly enemies. One of the last acts in this sequence is the murder of Agamemnōn by Thyestēs's son Aigisthos, in collusion with Agamemnōn's wife Klytaimnēstra. Since this is repeatedly referred to throughout the Odyssey, Homer was clearly aware of the tradition, and carefully cherry-picked what he used from it, ignoring the rest, and censoring the Atreus-Thyestēs quarrel. This is not the only occasion on which the author of the Iliad shows himself sensitive to the more embarrassing features of archaic myth.

ATTICA The land surrounding, and ultimately controlled by, ATHENS: a roughly triangular domain extending from the Parnēs range in the north down to the Sounion promontory in the south. According to myth the Athenian unification of Attica's settlements (synoikismos) was carried out by Thēseus: unusually, there is clear evidence of more or less uniform continuity from MYCENAEAN times through to the Archaic and Classical eras.

AULIS A small harbor on the coast of BOIŌTIA, facing EUBOIA, below a promontory near Tanagra: famous—from the Epic Cycle (Cypria arg. 6, 8 = West 2003 [A], 72–75) and plays by Aeschylus and Euripides—as the assembly point for the ACHAIAN armada that sailed against TROY, and the site of the sacrifice of IPHIGENEIA to placate ARTEMIS and obtain a favorable wind. This episode is not directly referred to in the Iliad.

AUTOMEDŌN Son of Diōrēs; the charioteer of ACHILLES (9.209, 24.474) and PATROKLOS (16.145–47, 472–75), and also a notable warrior in his own right (17.359–542). After the death of PATROKLOS, ACHILLES honors Automedōn most highly of all his comrades (24.574–75). In Roman times, his name, used alone, came to mean “charioteer.”

BELLEROPHŌN More properly, in Homer, Bellerophontēs. He appears in the Iliad solely as part of the long speech by GLAUKOS (6.144–211) describing his ancestry in the royal Corinthian dynasty of Ephyrē. Bellerophōn is the grandson of Sisyphos and grandfather to the brothers Glaukos and SARPĒDŌN. The account of Bellerophōn's adventures given by Glaukos is remarkable for two things: the one reference to writing in the Homeric poems and the absence of any mention of the winged horse Pegasos, elsewhere a key figure in Bellerophōn's ARISTEIA, when he successfully accomplishes the tasks given him by the king of LYCIA, whose spurned wife has falsely accused him of raping her.

BOIŌTIA, BOIŌTIANS Boiōtia is the region of Greece immediately to the north of Attica, from which it is divided by the mountain ranges of Kithairōn and Parnēs: like Attica, it faces the island of EUBOIA on the east. The Boiōtians form the first, and very sizable, item in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (q.v. for some of the puzzling Boiōtian omissions and inclusions of townships), providing fifty ships each with a crew of 120; only AGAMEMNŌN's contingent is larger. Yet they do not perform well or often at TROY: in the battle over PATROKLOS's body, “First to panic and flee was Boiōtian Pēneleōs” (17.597); wealthy Helenos is mentioned only to fall victim to HEKTŌR (5.707–9, cf. 15.330).

BRISEÏS As ACHILLES' war prize—whose arbitrary seizure by AGAMEMNŌN triggers the whole plot of the Iliad, from Achilles' wrath and withdrawal from the campaign to his return to avenge the death of his comrade PATROKLOS—Briseïs is far from a talkative heroine. In fact she has nothing to say at all till the fourteen lines she gets to mourn Patroklos (19.287–300). We hear that she was captured by Achilles at the sack of Lyrnessos (2.688–93), where he also killed her husband (19.291–96); yet when, at his reconciliation with Achilles, Agamemnōn swears he never had intercourse with Briseïs (19.258–65), he speaks as though he had respected her virginity. There is also one tradition that her name was Hippodameia. Dué (HE 1: 145, with citation of his earlier work) suggests plausibly that there are two victim stories conflated here, both to do with the death of a king at the sacking of his city: in one it is his unmarried daughter who is captured (and falls in love with his enemy), in the other, his wife.

CARIA, CARIANS A mountainous coastal region in southwestern Asia Minor, adjacent to IONIA. The Carians are the only contingent in the TROJAN CATALOGUE (2.867–75) described as “of barbarian speech” (barbarophōnoi); this was in fact “an Anatolian language related to HITTITE” (Rutherford, HE 1:149), recently deciphered.

CATALOGUE OF SHIPS, THE List of local contingents in the expedition to TROY, together with the numbers of ships each provides (2.494–759). Few aspects of the Iliad have occasioned more fractious scholarly debate. One of the rare points generally agreed is that catalogues as such are an accepted feature of Greek epic: see, e.g., Il. 2.816–77; Od. 11.225–330, and the fragmentary Hesiodic Catalogue of Women (Most, 2, 40–261). But otherwise consensus is rare. Did Homer compose the Catalogue as we have it? In any case does it reflect some kind of pre-Homeric memorized document, and if so was this a product of Geometric / Dark Age Greece or a surviving tradition from the Mycenaean Bronze Age?

The first thing to remember is how large, in the statistical sense, this Catalogue is. There are twenty-nine major entries, each one detailing the cities of the region concerned, the names of their captains, and the numbers of ships and men involved. The total comes to over a thousand ships with a hundred or so troops allotted to each. We know of such lists generally in antiquity, but they tend, unsurprisingly, to be a very practical part of the business of warfare: borrowed from by bards to commemorate local participation in great deeds, but seldom as long and detailed as the Catalogue of Ships (Latacz 2004, 219–23). Literally one-third of the Catalogue consists of place-names, 178 in all. As far as we can tell, all are genuine, not fictional, and none turn up in the wrong region. The idea that Homer, or some earlier bard, went round identifying them like a modern research scholar is, as Latacz says (225), prima facie “quite unrealistic”. So the list must have been compiled earlier, an appropriate general preface to the great maritime expedition against TROY. But the Iliad takes place in the ninth to tenth year of that expedition, so Homer simply borrowed such a list, emending details where necessary to allow for altered circumstances; and sure enough, we find the absence of leaders like PROTESILAÖS (killed) and PHILOKTĒTĒS (left behind on LĒMNOS with a suppurating wound) having to be accounted for (2.695–99, 716–23).

So the Catalogue was a pre-existent entity: but can we date it? Here several factors are crucial. (i) Almost a quarter of the names listed were unlocatable by historical times, and had therefore at some point beyond the general reach of memory been abandoned or undergone a name change. (ii) The names show no awareness of the so-called Dorian invasion during the Geometric period. (iii) Likewise, there is no notion of Greeks inhabiting the Anatolian coastline, which again points to a period prior to the great years of colonization that began c. 1050. (iv) The actual structure of the entries to the Catalogue bears a remarkable resemblance to the bureaucratic records of the LINEAR B TABLETS. Thus a Mycenaean origin for the Catalogue is highly probable. (The best analysis of these arguments known to me is Latacz 2004, 219–49, to which I am heavily indebted.)

Nevertheless, skepticism remains widespread, and the best summing-up of the difficulties remaining in the Catalogue is Oliver Dickinson's article on it in the Homer Encyclopedia (HE 1: 150–55, though many of his criticisms (e.g., the surprising prominence given to the BOIŌTIANS) do not take sufficient account of the likelihood that the Catalogue was not originally designed for the Iliad). Significant Mycenaean names are missing (but the Catalogue states specifically (2.492) that it only lists those who went to Troy). And so on. The debate continues.

CENTAURS See s.v. CHEIRŌN.

CHEIRŌN The Centaurs, mythical beings, horses, but human down to the waist above their forelegs, embodied the notion of humans before the advent of restraining civilization. Wild, violent, greedy (especially for liquor), and indiscriminately lecherous, they traditionally occupied the mountains and forests of northern Greece. The virtuous exception to this pattern of uncontrolled excess was Cheirōn, a kind of demi-equine Socrates, who was not only, like most Centaurs, versed in herbal medicine and many basic crafts, but wise and just (11.832), a renowned teacher and mentor, who was traditionally supposed to have educated not only ACHILLES, but also ASKLĒPIOS and Jason (of Argonaut fame).

Homer somewhat downplays Cheirōn's traditional role in the upbringing of Achilles: he instructs the boy in herbal medicine (11.829–32), and is mentioned as being close to his father PĒLEUS (to whom he gave the great ash spear that Achilles inherited, 16.141–44, 19.388–91), but Achilles' prime teacher—and much cherished by him as such—is the elderly PHOINIX (9.438–43, 485–91). This variation is in line with Homer's general avoidance of the wilder aspects of early traditional myth.

CHIMAIRA A composite tripartite fire-breathing mythical monster— a lion in front, a serpent behind, a goat in the mid-part" (6.181)—killed by BELLEROPHŌN as the first of the ordeals laid on him by the king of LYCIA (6.179–83).

CHRYSEÏS Daughter of the priest of APOLLO, Chrysēs, she is captured at the sack of Cilician THĒBĒ (2), and awarded in the share-out of spoils to AGAMEMNŌN, who at first rebuffs her father's offer to ransom her. However, after Apollo vents his anger on the ACHAÏANS, they override Agamemnōn and insist on Chryseïs being returned to her father. Agamemnōn's arbitrary seizure of ACHILLES' prize, BRISEÏS, as compensation for his loss, leads directly to Achilles' wrath and withdrawal from combat, thus precipitating the Iliad's central theme. Dué (HE 1: 165) argues that since Chryseïs was captured from Thēbē, rather than her parental home, she was already married—in fact, a widow, Achilles having most likely killed her husband.

CILICIA, CILICIANS See s.v. THĒBĒ (2).

CORINTH (KORINTHOS) Controlled by AGAMEMNŌN and mentioned in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.570) as "wealthy"; also referred to (6.152, 210) as Ephyrē, but otherwise giving no hint in the Iliad of its later importance.

CRETE, CRETANS See s.v. KRĒTĒ (CRETE).

DANAĀNS One of the three regular names, together with ACHAÏANS (the most common) and ARGIVES, used to identify participants in the mixed Greek expeditionary force that sailed against TROY. The derivation of the name is uncertain, though ancient: references from Egypt date back to the fifteenth and fourteenth centuries B.C.E. (Lopez-Ruiz, HE 1: 192). The most likely connection is with the Danuna, known to the Egyptians as one of the SEA PEOPLES (Latacz 2004, 130ff.)

DARDANOS, DARDANIA/NS Dardanos in the Iliad (20.215–40, 304–5), as AINEIAS informs ACHILLES, is recalled as the favorite son of ZEUS by any mortal woman (by Elektra, daughter of Atlas, in this case). He founds Dardania, near the site of TROY, before Troy itself is built, and becomes the founding ancestor (through Erichthonios and Trōs) of the Trojan kings, so that both Aineias (son of Kapys) and PRIAM (son of LAOMEDŌN) are his descendants. But it is POSEIDŌN who guarantees (20. 302–4) that the dynasty founded by Dardanos will not die out. The Dardanians in the Iliad are related to the Trojans, but not yet, as they became later (e.g., in Virgil's Aeneid), identical with them. Historically, the Dardanians occupied a region near the IDA range in the TROAD (Strab. 13.1.33, cf. Dueck, HE 1: 194).

DAWN (Eōs) Dawn, or Eōs, daughter of the sun god Hyperīon, is barely anthropomorphized at all in the Iliad: she is regularly described as "saffron-robed" or "rosy-fingered" and she does, once (11.1), rise from the bed of Tithōnos, but her sole function is to herald the morning, and quite often the context makes clear that this is simply the dawn, small d, with no personality. Yet elsewhere she displays a strong mythological character. By the beautiful boy Tithōnos (PRIAM's brother, no less) she is the mother of MEMNŌN, on whom she persuades ZEUS to confer immortality (Aithiopsis arg. 2 = West 2003 [A], 113): Tithōnos too is granted immortality, but in his case Dawn forgets to ask for eternal youth as well, so that he ends up as a dry, piping husk, a kind of human cicada (HHAphr. 218–38) She pursues mortal lovers with zest, including the hunters Orīon (Od. 5.121–24) and Kephalos (Hes. Th. 986–87). She also (Hes. Th. 378–823) is reported as giving birth to winds and stars, a wonderful chance, I've always thought, for some inspired graphic-book illustrator.

DEATH In personified form (Thanatos) represented as the brother of SLEEP, both being sent by APOLLO to convey SARPĒDŌN's body to LYCIA (16.676–83). Hesiod (Th. 212–13, 756–59) makes Death and Sleep the offspring of Night and Erebus.

DEATH-SPIRIT The Homeric kér (not to be confused with kēr, heart, mind, feeling) was thought of as in some way akin to FATE (moira)—each individual got his or her own kér at birth—but also figured as a quasi-physical agent, more than capable of swallowing a victim (23.78–79). This death-spirit was “personal and dangerous” (Vermeule 39), “a sister of sleep, death, and the furies.” Cf. Onians 399–400.

DEÏPHOBOS Son of PRIAM and HEKABĒ and (22.233–34) HEKTŌR's best-loved brother—though Priam (24.251) scolds him as a no-good. ATHĒNĒ therefore assumes the likeness of Deïphobos to persuade Hektōr to halt his flight and face ACHILLES in battle, well aware, anti-TROJAN as she is, that this will mean his death (22.228–47). After PARIS/ALÉXANDROS is killed by PHILOKTĒTĒS, Deïphobos marries Helen (Little Iliad, arg. 2 = West 2003 [A], 121–23), perhaps by a leviratic-style obligation to wed a dead brother's childless widow. He is subsequently killed by MENELAŌS, who thus recovers HELEN (Sack of Ilion, arg. 2 = West 2003 [A], 145; cf. Od. 8. 516–20).

DELUSION (Atē) The Greek atē, which I and others translate as “Blind Delusion” or simply “Delusion”—most often capitalized thus in view of its dramatic personification by PHOINIX (9.496–514), but sometimes lowercase, where it seems recognized simply as a psychological force—is a compulsive urge, originally seen as external, to behave in a fashion leading to disaster. It is Delusion, but it also can characterize the fatal consequences of that Delusion. Most notably, AGAMEMNŌN uses it (19.85–138) to disclaim responsibility for his actions regarding ACHILLES and BRISEÏS, exactly in the way a modern defendant in court may offer insanity as an excuse. In modern scholarship, Homer's often ambiguous use of atē has increasingly come to be seen as an early step toward the internalization of emotional motives, rather than objectifying these as external visitations inflicted by some (generally malevolent) deity.

DĒMĒTĒR This famous goddess of agriculture (and the mystery cults connected with agriculture) is strikingly absent from the Homeric OLYMPIAN pantheon, though casual references (2.696, 5.499–502, 13.322, 14.326, 21.76) show full awareness of her functions and precincts, and other epic poetry such as the Homeric Hymn to Demeter and Hesiod's Works and Days stress her importance. The exact reason for her suppression by Homer has never been satisfactorily explained (for theories advanced, see Currie, HE 1: 201–2).

DESTINY See s.v. FATE.

DIOMĒDĒS Son of TYDEUS, one of the Seven at THĒBĒ (1), with whose great reputation as a warrior AGAMEMNŌN compares Diomēdēs very much to his disad-vantage (4.365–98): Diomēdēs shows his maturity by ignoring the slur, and attributing it to stress (4.402–18). He is, in fact, among the leading, and most aggressive, ACHAÏANS at TROY, and has his own ARISTEIA (q.v.). Though young, he is listed among the elders, and speaks with authority (2.406, cf. 7.399–402, 9.31–49, 14.109–32); he has brought a large contingent of eighty vessels to Troy, from known MYCENAEAN strongholds in the Argolid such as ARGOS and TIRYNS (2.560–68). Exactly where his domain ends and that of AGAMEMNŌN begins is never entirely clear in the Iliad. He is a favorite of ATHĒNĒ, who frequently protects him (5.1–8, 121–32, 794–861; 10.503–14). After the fall of Troy he has a safe return to Argos (Od. 3.180–82).

DIONYSOS Like DĒMĒTĒR, another powerful agricultural deity (presiding over grapes as Dēmētēr over grain) who is barely referred to in the Iliad, though Homer is well aware of the myths surrounding him, including his curious birth to Semelē and ZEUS (6.129–37, 14.325).

DŌDŌNA Described in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS as “hard-wintered” (2.750), and referred to (16.233–35) in ACHILLES’ prayer to ZEUS on behalf of PATROKLOS, Dōdōna (BA 54 C2), site of the famous and ancient oracle of Zeus, is situated in northwestern Greece, near modern Ioannina. ODYSSEUS (Od. 14.327–30) was said to have consulted “the high-leafed oak” there, the rustling of its leaves interpreted by the ascetic Selloi (16.235), who went barefoot and slept on the ground (but by historical times had been replaced by three priestesses: Hdt. 2.55–57, Strab. 7.7.12, cf. Finkelberg, HE 3: 788).

DOLŌNEIA The “Lay of Dolōn”, or Dolōneia, is the scholarly name for book 10 of the Iliad. From antiquity on, it has always found critics eager to dismiss it as a later addition to the rest of the text: Martin West, indeed, confidently omits it in toto from his Teubner text (Homeri Ilias, 2 vols., Stuttgart 1998–2000), and one recent translator, Stephen Mitchell, has followed his example, dismissing it as a “baroque and nasty episode” (Mitchell lvii). Several reasons have been given down the centuries for its alleged inauthenticity. It is singularly lacking in the Iliad’s high military code of honor. It is, uniquely, a night operation, and a fairly ruthless one. Its vocabulary has unusual features. It could be excised without any damage to the overall plot.

All this is true, but still does not add up to proof; and there can be no doubt that the primary driving force has always been the fact that, for various reasons, many people found it, and still find it, decidedly unpleasant. Yet it comes at a very apposite point. The two warriors, DIOMĒDĒS and ODYSSEUS, who at the end of book 9 are most impatient with the honor-bound, militarily disastrous, grandstanding of ACHILLES (and, by implication, with the aristocratic code that has prolonged the war for nine long years) are also the two who at once follow up their fruitless embassy to the grandstander with a highly successful nocturnal guerilla raid on the enemy camp. They wipe out the leaders of the newly arrived THRACIAN contingent, including its king, RHESOS; they take his famous team of horses as spoils of war; they capture, and extract valuable information from, a would-be TROJAN spy, DOLŌN; they get back to camp safely. This, they imply, is how it should be done. It all foreshadows the warfare of the future: they lie to Dolōn, then behead him; they kill Rhēsos and his warriors while they are asleep; the end justifies the means. We don't know when, or if, the Dolōneia was in fact added to a putative canon. More to the point, it's not even certain whether there ever was a canonical Ur-text by Homer to which it could be attached. There are rather more good reasons for keeping than for excising it.

DORIANS The third main ethnic division of the Hellenes (ancient Greeks), the other two being the IONIANS and the Aeolians (see AEOLIS). According to both mythic tradition and actual historical probability, the Dorians only migrated from Epiros in the northwest to the southern Homeric world of the ARGOLID and the PELOPONNESE after the TROJAN WAR; and the Iliad, in confirmation of its MYCENAEAN antecedents, makes no mention whatsoever of them.

ĒĒTIŌN Father of ANDROMACHĒ, and king of Cilician THĒBĒ (2), at the capture of which he was killed, along with all his sons, by ACHILLES (6.395–98, 416–28). Notably, several of his captured possessions—a lyre (9.186–88), a chariot horse (16.152–54), and a mass of pig iron (23.826–27)—are paraded by their captor in the course of the Iliad: Achilles plays the lyre, the horse joins his immortal team when PATROKLOS goes to fight on his behalf, and the pig iron features as a prize at Patroklos's funeral games. Not to be confused with minor homonyms at 17.675 and 21.43.

EILEITHYIA Ancient goddess of childbirth (16.187–88), mentioned in the LINEAR B tablets: daughter of HĒRĒ (11.270, 19.119) and ZEUS (Hes. Th. 922). ODYSSEUS refers to her famous cave at Amnisos on KRĒTĒ (CRETE). She was widely worshipped in Greece: see Lyons, HE 1: 242.

ELYSIUM, THE ELYSIAN FIELDS Nicely described by Mackie (HE 1: 246) as “a kind of paradise for heroes in Greek eschatology”. Such eschatology is notably rare in Homer: Elysium gets one mention only (Od. 4.561–69), where its main attraction is its idyllic climate. Most dead warriors, HEROES or not—even a son of ZEUS such as SARPĒDŌN—seem, even after special treatment (16.433–38, 667–83) to end up as sad wraiths in the dreary realm of HĀDĒS. Yet, arbitrarily, MENELAÖS, as husband of HELEN and Zeus's son-in-law, is promised entry to Elysium after death (Od. 4.561–64). A more promising destination for the elect seems to be evolving.

ENYALIOS An ancient war god mentioned in the LINEAR B tablets: in the Iliad mostly an epithet attached to the courageous, such as MĒRIONĒS (7.166, 8.264), who are described as “a match for” him; in a couple of places (17.211, 20.69), he has become no more than an epithet for ARĒS (q.v.).

ERECHTHEUS An early mythical king of ATHENS: mentioned in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS as supposedly autochthonous (2.547–51), and set by ATHĒNĒ in her own shrine (i.e., the Erechtheion), he was also closely associated with POSEIDŌN.

ERIS See s.v. STRIFE.

EUBOIA The large island, second only to KRĒTĒ (CRETE) in the AEGEAN, long and narrow, lying very close along the east coast of mainland Greece opposite BOIŌTIA and ATTICA. Though only briefly mentioned in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.535–36), Euboia is notable for having, as an island of seafarers, in contrast to the isolated and impoverished mainland, preserved its wealth, its links to the East (Powell, HE 1: 268–69), and some of its old MYCENAEAN traditions (one famous burial, at modern Lefkandi, is truly Homeric) right through the Dark Age.

EUMĒLOS Son of Admētos and Alkēstis, and married to Iphthimē, the sister of ODYSSEUS's wife Penelope (Od. 4.797–98), Eumēlos is a leading commander (anax andrōn), and brings eleven ships to TROY from southern THESSALY (2.711–15). His horses, bred by APOLLO, are by far the best (2.763–67), and he himself a skilled horseman (23.289). In the chariot race at the funeral games of PATROKLOS he is expected to win, but when Apollo attacks DIOMĒDĒS, who looks like overtaking Eumēlos (23.382–84), ATHĒNĒ retaliates by snapping Eumēlos's yoke, so that he is thrown from his chariot and injured (23.391–97). He limps in last on foot, dragging his chariot, but ACHILLES gives him, on reputation alone, a rich consolation prize (23.532–65). A later meliorizing tradition (Apollod. Epit. 5.5, cited by Polinskaya, HE 1: 271) has Eumēlos winning the race for Achilles.

EURYSTHEUS Son of Sthenelos, and thus great-grandson of ZEUS, who was forced to grant him, rather than his cousin HĒRAKLĒS, rule over the ARGOLID by a trick of HĒRĒ (see 19.91–133, and s.v. ALKMĒNĒ). It was also Eurystheus who later imposed the Twelve Labors on Hēraklēs, probably as a penalty for the murder of his children (cf. Gantz 382–83).

FATE The idea of Fate (moira, moros, aisa) as a determining power, independent of divine will, is one of common occurrence throughout the Iliad. It is particularly associated with the time, and manner, of an individual's death. Etymologically these terms are all based on the notion of due measure, a proper share or portion. How that measure is to be assessed in each individual case is never made entirely clear. When ZEUS weighs the relative fates of mortals in his scales (8.68–77, ACHAIANS and TROJANS; 22.209–13, ACHILLES and HEKTŌR), he is not the arbiter, but merely assessing what is already predetermined. The same applies to his general predictions concerning the war (8.473–77, 15.61–71). Yet there is at least one occasion (the battle during which his mortal son SARPĒDŌN is fated to be killed by PATROKLOS, 16.431–61) on which Zeus would seem seriously to consider the possibility of overriding Fate, but is talked out of it by HĒRĒ (unless this is simply a clever ploy to leave open the determination of whether in fact he could, or could not, do it.) By Homer's day the notion of predestined Fate was becoming at least debatable. The gods worry about the possibility (20.30, 21.517) or work to prevent it (2.155, 17.231), as Edwards (HE 1: 286–87) rightly reminds us. He also points out that it is, precisely, the existence of firmly determined individual fates that facilitates their prediction, as that of Hektōr by Patroklos (16.851–54) or that of Achilles by Hektōr (22.358–60).

FURIES, THE Female chthonian (19.259–60) deities known as the Erinyes (as far back as the LINEAR B tablets), the Furies are particularly concerned with ensuring retribution for offenses, more often than not those involving blood-guilt, within the family. They are invoked by parental curses, and generally fulfill them (9.454–57, 571, 21.412, Od. 11.279–80). They protect elders' rights in particular (15.204). They uphold the sanctity of oaths (19.259–60, 3.279). They can, or so AGAMEMNŌN claims, blind a man's reason (19.86–89, cf. Od. 11.234). They remain most famous as the black-garbed, snake-haired, sinister avengers, daughters of Night, brought on stage by Aeschylus in his Eumenides.

GANYMĒDĒS In the Iliad (20.231–35) the beautiful son of TRŌS, whom the gods raise up to OLYMPOS to be ZEUS's wine server; Zeus by way of recompense gives Trōs a team of immortal horses, which are in due course inherited by his grandson LAOMEDŌN (q.v.).

GARGAROS See s.v. IDA, MT.

GLAUKOS Son of Hippolochos, and cousin to SARPĒDŌN, his co-commander of the LYCIAN contingent (2.876–77), Glaukos is descended from SISYPHOS, and BELLEROPHŌN is his grandfather. At his famous battlefield meeting with DIOMĒDĒS (6.119–236) it transpires that the latter's grandfather Oineus once entertained Bellerophōn, making Diomēdēs and Glaukos official guest-friends: instead of fighting they therefore exchange armor (6.232–36). Glaukos is generally a distinguished warrior (e.g., 7.13, 14.426, 16.593) and abuses HEKTŌR for failing either to secure Sarpēdōn's body or to recover that of PATROKLOS. With Sarpēdōn, he is one of the very few TROJAN allies (or indeed Trojans) who is more than a name in the Iliad. The Aithiopis (arg. 3 = West 2003 [A], 112–13) and Apollodorus (Epit. 5.4) both have him killed by AIAS (1) during the battle over ACHILLES' body.

GORGON In myth, Perseus decapitates the Gorgon Medousa (Hes. Th. 280), whose gaze retains the power of petrification, and gives her head to ATHĒNĒ: it duly appears on the goddess's AEGIS in battle (5.741–42). "In the Homeric epics, the Gorgon's (Medusa's) head is already detached from her body, and it has become a potent symbol of fear and death" (Ebbott, HE 1: 323). AGAMEMNŌN similarly has a Gorgon's face on his shield to inspire terror in his opponents (11.36–37); HEKTŌR's eyes when fighting are compared to the Gorgon's gaze (8.348–49).

GRACES The number of these minor goddesses of charm, grace, and beauty, known as Charites, is uncertain. Hesiod (Th. 907–9) mentions three, Euphrosynē, Aglaia, and Thalia, the daughters of ZEUS and Euronomē, and various others crop up, such as Pasithēē (Il. 14.269, 276), who is given in marriage to SLEEP (Hypnos) as a bribe by HĒRĒ.

HĀDĒS The third son of KRONOS and Rhea, his brothers being ZEUS and POSEIDŌN, who in the Iliad (15.185–93) tells how their respective domains were determined by lot: Zeus got the heavens, Hādēs the underworld, and Poseidōn himself the sea, the earth and OLYMPOS being shared by them all in common. Hādēs is described as “unbending, implacable” (9.158–59), and, as the god of death, the one most hated by mortals (5.158–59), but plays no direct role in the Iliad, where references to Hādēs are normally not to the god himself, but to his subterranean realm of the dead, the UNDERWORLD. This is never clearly described in the poem, though apparently separated from the upper world by both a gate and the waters of Styx (8.366–68, cf. 23.71–74). It seems to be above TARTAROS (8.13–16, 478–81), and is a constant reminder of the ultimate fate of all HEROES, whether ACHAIAN or TROJAN. It is also very different from the afterlife visited in the furthest west by ODYSSEUS, with its fields of asphodel, more reminiscent of ELYSIUM (Od. 11, passim).

HEKABĒ (Hecuba) In the Iliad, daughter of King Dymas of Phrygia (16.718–19)—unsurprisingly, her name, like her husband’s, is non-Greek—and wife of PRIAM, to whom she bears nineteen of his fifty children (24.496), including HEKTÖR, KASSANDRĒ, and PARIS/ALÉXANDROS (about whom in later tradition she has a dream, while pregnant with him, that she will bear a torch fated to burn TROY, and therefore had him exposed: see s.v. PARIS/ALÉXANDROS, and Roisman, HE 2: 335 with ref.). Homer presents her (ibid.) as “a caring mother and wife whose wishes are always thwarted” (6.254–68, 286–311; 22.79–89, 24.197–227). Because of her fecundity and the rate of TROJAN casualties, she is in perpetual mourning for her various sons. But Hektör is her favorite, and her lamentation at his passing knows no bounds (22.431–36, 24.710–12, 747–59). Later tradition, especially as used by Euripides in his Hecuba and Trojan Women, envelops Homer’s dignified matriarch in lurid melodrama.

HEKTÖR Son of PRIAM and HEKABĒ, married to ANDROMACHĒ, and father of the child Skamandrios/Astyanax (6.394–403), Hektör is the leader and emblem of TROY’s defense against the ACHAIAANS: his death at the hands of ACHILLES foreshadows the city’s fall; it is as though “all towering Ilion, top to bottom, were left smoldering with fire” (22.410–11). Troy’s noblest warrior, he is never (in this unlike the most distinguished ACHAIAN warriors) given a formal ARISTEIA of his own, nor does he kill any of his leading opponents who are so honored. His backing by ZEUS is of a generalized nature: he is empowered to break through the Achaians’ wall and to set fire to their ships—but this leads, inevitably, to the involvement, first, of PATROKLOS, and then, after Hektör himself kills Patroklos, of Achilles, following which the sequence of events leading to the inevitable fall of Troy is determined by FATE. Though he is as conscious as Achilles of his reputation and his claim to military glory (kléos), unlike Achilles he is not battle-hungry by nature, but rather driven by a sense of social shame (aidōs), the fear of his society’s censure if he fails to live up to the HERO’s ideal (6.442; Redfield 118 and elsewhere). He is more defined by his strong sense of social responsibility than by any conscious pursuit of military prestige, though it is his aidōs that makes him insist, fatally, on meeting Achilles in single combat, rather than pursuing a more sensible defensive policy from inside the city’s walls (6.429–46, 22.38–93). As the narrative progresses, he becomes gradually more nervous, stressed, abrupt, and angry (with himself at least as much as with others), ignoring warnings (12.223–27, 18.267–72) and wildly boasting (18.308–9) of his chances against Achilles. We remember this when, faced with Achilles in fact, he has a total failure of nerve, and runs for it (22.131–66, 188–207). His weaknesses are all too human; his brief moment of domestic happiness with his wife and baby son (6.399–493), shot through with foreboding about their future when the city falls, is one of the most unforgettable scenes in the Iliad.

HELEN Daughter of ZEUS—though her official father was Tyndareus—by Lēdē; sister to KLYTAIMNĒSTRA, Kastōr, and Polydeukēs (3.236–44), and married to MENELAÖS. Tyndareus made all the suitors for her hand swear an oath that, were she ever abducted—which in fact happened twice, the first time by Thēseus—they would, all of them, combine to recover her (Hes. Cat. fr. 155 = Most 2: 231–33). Homer refers only briefly and late (24.25–30) to the JUDGMENT OF PARIS, as a result of which PARIS/ALÉXANDROS, having duly assigned the prize for beauty to APHRODĪTĒ, was rewarded by her by being made irresistible to Helen, thus in effect triggering the TROJAN WAR. It is stressed (3.282, 458; 13.626) that when Helen eloped, she took much property with her (though how this was done secretly is never explained). The comparatively few times she appears in the Iliad (3.121–244, 383–447; 6.343–69; 24.761–76), she is filled with shame, not least by her inability to resist Paris sexually (reified in a personal clash with Aphrodītē, 3.380–420), and is touching in her posthumous tribute to HEKTÖR, who alone of her TROJAN relatives, except for PRIAM, was unfailingly kind to her. One account has her baring her breasts (successfully: he drops his sword) to a furious Menelaös at the sack of Troy (Little Iliad, fr. 28 = West 2003 [A], 138–39), and she and Menelaös (both now comfortably middle-aged, if not elderly) later entertain Tēlemachos with reminiscences of the Trojan War in Sparta (Od. 4.219–303). The post-Homeric countertradition that Helen never in fact went to Troy (it was a phantom, an eidōlon, that did so) reminds us of the new middle-class morality exemplified by Xenophanes, who complained about Homer (and Hesiod) attributing immoral behavior to the gods, when in fact they were simply reporting traditional (but now embarrassing) ancient myths.

HELLAS In the Iliad restricted to a small region in southeastern THESSALY, neighbor to PHTHIĒ (9.478), and (like its neighbor) home to MYRMIDONS (16.594–96). Both formed part of the kingdom of PĒLEUS and ACHILLES (2.683–85). In the Odyssey (1.344, 4.726, etc.), Hellas is northern Greece, as opposed to the PELOPONNESE, there called “Argos”; for Hesiod (WD 653), “Hellas” and “Hellenes” referred respectively to the whole of Greece and Greeks generally, as they do today. Between Homer and Hesiod, “Panhellenes” undergoes an identical extension (Il. 2.530, Hes. WD 528, cf. Fowler, HE 2: 339).

HELLESPONT, THE The strait (today known as the Dardanelles) dividing Europe from Asia, and connecting the Black Sea with the AEGEAN.

HĒPHAISTOS The Greek god of fire (strikingly exemplified in the Iliad by his napalm-like attack on the aggressive waters of the SKAMANDROS RIVER (21.342–56), and—uniquely among the OLYMPIANS—a highly skilled divine blacksmith, artisan, and architect, the “famed craftsman” (1.571, 18.143, 391) various creations of whose, some disconcertingly modern, are scattered through the Homeric poems: for ZEUS (recognized as his father in the Iliad), a scepter and AEGIS (2.100–102, 15.307–10); for his mother HĒRĒ, a throne and a private bedchamber (14.238–40, 166–67); self-moving tripods (18.373–79), golden robots that can speak and think (18.417–21), and, above all, the marvelous new armor he fashions for ACHILLES (18.469–613). His position on OLYMPOS is decidedly ambiguous. His aristocratic fellow deities deride both his lameness and his plebeian skills; when he traps his wife APHRODITE in bed with ARĒS (Od. 8.266–333), the mockery is directed against the comic vulgar cuckold no less than the aristocratic adulterous couple. Yet the Olympians are more than ready (in this like their human counterparts) to exploit those skills when needs be; while Hēphaistos’s deliberate invitation of that laughter (by hobbling round in imitation of the beautiful cup bearer Ganymēdēs) in order to defuse a difficult situation (1.595–600, cf. Rinon, HE 2: 341) suggests a more sophisticated social sense than his audience is aware of. Tradition has it that he was twice thrown headlong out of Olympos. The first time was by Zeus (when he took his mother’s side in a quarrel): he landed on LĒMNOS, and lamed both legs in the fall (1.590–94). The second time was by HĒRĒ herself, who (he alleged) found his lameness an embarrassment (18.395–97). On this occasion THETIS saved and looked after him, so that his readiness to forge armor for her son ACHILLES is in repayment for her kindness. Overall, one is more conscious with Hēphaistos than with most characters in the Iliad of Homer carefully cherry-picking only what he needs from a large and variegated mythic tradition.

HĒRAKLĒS The greatest of all Greek HEROES, and (like so many of the best of them) sired by a god (ZEUS) on a human woman (ALKMĒNĒ, q.v.). He belongs to an earlier generation than that of the TROJAN WAR and so plays no direct part in the Iliad—though his son Tlēpolemos, later killed by SARPĒDŌN (5.628–59) is listed as a Rhodian leader in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.653–69), as are two grandsons (2.678–79), while the narrative shows broad familiarity with the various myths concerning him. Homer has several indirect allusions to the Twelve Labors (e.g., 8.363, 19.132–33); but Od. 11.620–26 is the only place where a specific Labor—the fetching up of Kerberos—is mentioned. He has an implacable enemy in HĒRĒ, literally from the time of his birth (19.104–24, see s.v. ALKMĒNĒ and EURYSTHEUS); for later harassment, cf. 14.253–56, 15.26–28 (though he gets his own back, probably during his attack on PYLOS, by shooting her in the breast with a three-barbed arrow: 5.392–94, cf. 11.690–93). Hērē is also involved in his death: 18.115–19, a passage where ACHILLES, while resigning himself to a brief life, reminds his mother, THETIS, that even Hēraklēs, though a glorious HERO, was mortal and had to die. The most ironic reference to him comes at 5.635–42, where his son Tlēpolemos is boasting to Sarpēdōn (who is about to kill him) that they don't make warriors now like those of former times: why, Hēraklēs, with only six ships and a few men, was able to reduce and sack TROY after being cheated by LAOMEDŌN (q.v.)! So much for an expedition of over a thousand ships and some hundred thousand men, after nine years of inconclusive warfare (there is a second reminder of Hēraklēs' achievement at 14.249–51).

HERALDS These ever-useful officials (e.g., AGAMEMNŌN's herald Talthybios) are prominent throughout the Iliad, where they perform a wide variety of services. They carry a special staff of office (the caduceus), their persons are inviolable, and they are under the protection of HERMĒS. Thus, apart from civic functions such as making public proclamations, summoning individuals to (and moderating their conduct at) assembly (2.50–52, 18.503–5) or warfare (2.442–44), and presiding at festivals and religious sacrifices (18.558–59, 3.116–20, 9.174), they are present on missions involving risk, where their sacrosanct character should guarantee safety: most notably with PRIAM on his mission to ACHILLES (24.149–51, 281–82). But as Thalmann says (HE 2: 346), “their status is hard to pin down”. Sometimes they are referred to as henchmen or attendants, yet they can have noble personal epithets. Their special inviolable status is perhaps, like that of the seer, best seen as a religious aspect of their quasi-diplomatic profession.

HĒRĒ Self-styled eldest daughter of KRONOS and RHEA (4.58–61), and wife (as well as sister) of ZEUS, with whom the LINEAR B tablets already associate her in the Bronze Age. She is constantly treated, in myth and cult, as a goddess of marriage: somewhat ironically, seeing that her own marriage is not only incestuous but also, to say the least, difficult—on one occasion her irate spouse leaves her dangling in midair from a golden chain with a couple of anvils tied to her feet, as punishment for her persecution of HĒRAKLĒS (15.18–30). With ATHĒNĒ, and seemingly for the same reason (cf. JUDGMENT OF PARIS), she is strongly pro-ACHAIAN and anti-TROJAN throughout the Iliad (4.64–72, 5.711–861, 907–9, 8.198–219, 16.439–58, 18.168–84, 20.32–37, 21.328–39, 24.22–30). However, she remains very cautious—perhaps with those anvils in mind—of offending Zeus too directly: see 8.397–432, though she has no compunctions about seducing him so that POSEIDŌN can help the ACHAANS during his postcoital slumber (14.153–360). With Athēnē and Poseidōn, she has even made an attempt (defeated by THETIS) to dethrone and imprison Poseidōn (1.396–404). She claims (4.50–52) that the cities dearest to her are ARGOS, SPARTA, and MYKĒNAI (MYCENAE). She is referred to as “Argive Hērē” (4.8, 5.908), and Argos continued to be her main cult center in historic times.

HERMĒS A minor deity in the OLYMPIAN pantheon, the son of ZEUS by a nymph, Maia. Known in the LINEAR B tablets from MYCENAEAN times. Right from birth, he is said to be “resourceful and cunning, a robber, a rustler of cattle, a bringer of dreams, a nightwatcher, a gate-lurker . . . by mid-day he was playing the lyre, and in the evening he stole the cattle of far-shooting Apollo” (Homeric Hymn to Hermes 13–18 = West 2003 [B], 112–59). He is, in fact, a classic trickster, sharing the epithet polytropos (“resourceful”, “of many wiles”) with ODYSSEUS. But in the Iliad, characteristically, this side of his nature is not emphasized (though when there is a divine scheme proposed to hijack HEKTÖR’s body from ACHILLES (24.22–24), it is Hermēs who is chosen for the job). For Homer it is Hermēs’ functions as a messenger of Zeus and a guide to mortals that are prominent. He delivers the royal scepter from Zeus to Pelōps (2.104). He rescues ARĒS from imprisonment by the Titans (5.385–91). He is pro-ACHAIAN, (20.34–35, 72) but refuses to fight (21.497–501). Most important, Zeus chooses him to escort PRIAM safely on the nocturnal journey to ransom his son from Achilles, and return him safely afterwards (24.153–54, 330–468, 677–94). Hermēs escorts him in the likeness of a young aristocrat, with great tact and skill. He uses his magic wand to lull sentries to sleep, open the gates, and unbar the entry to Achilles’ hut (440–67). He takes care to wake Priam before dawn and drives him clear of the Achaian camp (683–94). In the Odyssey, similarly, he is twice dispatched to help Odysseus (1.38–43, 5.29, 10.275–307). At the end of the Odyssey (24.1–202), he performs one of his most famous functions, that of psychopompos, the conductor of the souls of the dead, when he leads the ghosts of the slaughtered suitors down to Hādēs. The exact meanings of his ancient epithets (e.g., “slayer of Argos”) remain uncertain.

HEROES, HEROIC AGE In Works and Days (143–73), Hesiod describes the last two ages before his own in mythic terms, as an “age of bronze” (150–51) and an “age of mortal heroes, called demigods” (159). The end of this last, the era preceding his own, he specifically correlates with the THEBAN and TROJAN WARS. The men of it were superhuman in that they had divine blood in their ancestry, and they thus far outclassed, both physically and in prowess, the men of his own “iron age”; yet they nevertheless remained mortal, and all perished in “vile war and grim battle” (161). Their glory was their strain of divinity and the warrior code that they upheld (on which see the disquisition of SARPĒDŌN, 12.310–28, foreshadowing the creed of aristocrats everywhere up to and including 1914); their tragedy was that they could not escape death. Those who grew up in the aftermath of the Trojan War were the last of their breed: gods were never again to have direct intercourse (sexual or of any other kind) with mortals. That all this was an enhanced mythic recreation of the events leading to the final collapse of the historic MYCENAEAN palace culture has become increasingly clear with the advance of recent research into the Bronze Age.

Homer never spells out this scenario in detail, but both Iliad and Odyssey show acute awareness of a complete break between the world of heroes and that of ordinary mortals. In his remarkable speech to ODYSSEUS and DIOMĒDĒS rebuffing attempts to bring him back into the war (9.308–429), ACHILLES reveals total disillusion with the heroic code: a disillusion savagely emphasized by the profoundly unheroic, yet highly successful, night raid that Odysseus and Diomēdēs proceed to carry out that same night (bk. 10: cf. DOLŌNEIA). In the Odyssey, glory (kléos), if necessary at the price of death, is no longer the ideal: the goal is now survival.

The heroic age has died with its final generation of heroes. There is one striking proleptic image of this in the Iliad: the postwar flooding by POSEIDŌN and APOLLO of the ACHAIAI defense wall by the ships (12.17–33), which will destroy every last trace of these Achaian demigods' presence, and signal the end of the heroic era in which the Iliad is set.

IDA, MT. A mountain range in the southern TROAD, immediately north of the Gulf of Adramyttion (BA 57 E2), today called the Kaz Dag. Its main peaks, including GARGAROS, rise to nearly six thousand feet and offer a panoramic view of TROY and its environs, which lends plausibility to ZEUS's being seen throughout the Iliad (e.g., 3.276; 8.47–52, 75, 170–71, 397; 11.181–94, 336–37; 12.252–53; 14.157; 15.5–12, 151–53; 17.593–96; 20.56–57; 24.308) as either ruling from Ida, or using it as an observation post for keeping an eye on the progress of the war and giving signs by thunder (POSEIDŌN uses SAMOTHRAKĒ in the same way: 13.10–15). Ida was, and still is, "spring-rich" (polypidax, cf. 12.18–21 for its numerous rivers) and heavily wooded (23.117–20). Most notably, the summit of Ida is the scene of Zeus's al fresco lovemaking with HĒRĒ (14.292–353), despite her hope (327–40) for indoor privacy; for other couplings there, see 2.280–81, 4.475.

IDOMENEUS A leading older (13.361, 510–13) HERO, son of Deukaliōn, and captain of the contingent from KRĒTĒ (CRETE) (2.645–50). Idomeneus is distinguished enough to have been the guest of MENELAŌS in SPARTA (3.230–33), to receive praise from AGAMEMNŌN (4.257–64), and to have his own small ARISTEIA (13.361–454). He is regularly grouped with the best of the ACHAIAIS: 2.404–5, 6.435–37, 7.165, 19.309–11, etc.).

ILION See s.v. TROY.

IONIAN ISLANDS/SEA A group of islands off the west coast of mainland Greece, and south of Kerkyra (Corfu), in the Ionian Sea. The main ones known to Homer are Leukas, ITHÁKĒ, Kephallenia/Samē, Zákynthos, Doulichion, and the Echinades. In the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.625–30) the last two are ruled by Megēs of Doulichion, whereas the rest (2.631–37) are under ODYSSEUS.

IPHIGENEIA See s.v. KALCHAS.

IRIS Originally the rainbow, and as such (like the DAWN) not fully personalized in the Iliad (11.27, 17.547). More often (e.g., 2.786–806, 3.121–40, 11.185–210) she appears as a regular messenger of ZEUS (and once, 18.166–202, of HĒRĒ): she has the virtue of being "wind-footed". At one point, interestingly (15.159), Zeus warns her not be a "false messenger" (pseudangelos): there are in fact at least two occasions (8.423–24 and 15.179–81, the second directly following that warning!) on which she does insert some very tart and strongly worded additions of her own to the more diplomatic message she is sent to carry. Zeus clearly knows his messenger. Her two most important missions both take place in book 24: she summons THETIS to OLYMPOS (24.77–92) to be briefed on making ACHILLES accept ransom for the body of PATROKLOS, and also takes an encouraging message to PRIAM (24.147–88) to make him approach Achilles with the offer of that ransom.

ITHÁKĒ (ITHACA) One of the Ionian islands (whether modern Itháki or not is disputed: a plausible recent suggestion is that it was the—then separate—Palē peninsula of Kephallenia). The center of ODYSSEUS's kingdom, which probably extended to the islands of Samē (= Kephallenia) and Zákynthos, as well as part of the mainland (Il. 2.631–35; Od. 1.245–48). In sharp contrast to the Odyssey, the Iliad barely mentions Ithákē: HELEN (3.201) describes it as “a rugged dominion”.

JUDGMENT OF PARIS, THE This famous episode, though apparently a major cause of the TROJAN WAR, is only once mentioned in the Iliad, and then very briefly, in the last book (24.22–30), where—as an explanation for the refusal of HĒRĒ and ATHĒNĒ to support a plan whereby HERMĒS would rescue HEKTŌR's dead body from its abuse by ACHILLES—their hatred for all things Trojan is attributed to the fact that “when these goddesses came to [Paris's] courtyard he despised them / but had praise for the one who furthered his fatal lust.”

To get the full picture we must turn to Proclus's synopsis of the Cypria (arg. 1 = West 2003 [A], 68–69), supplemented by Apollodorus (Epit. 3.2). Here we find ZEUS conferring with THEMIS about a prospective Trojan conflict (see s.v. PLAN OF ZEUS). In furtherance of this, at the wedding of PĒLEUS and THETIS, STRIFE mischievously throws a golden apple inscribed “For the fairest”, to be competed for by HĒRĒ, ATHĒNĒ, and APHRODĪTĒ. Zeus then orders HERMĒS to conduct the three goddesses to the shepherd's steading of PARIS/ALÉXANDROS on MT. IDA, where this young herdsman (in fact a Trojan prince exposed at birth, because of an ill-omened dream by his mother: see s.v. HEKABĒ) will award the beauty prize to the goddess of his choice. All three goddesses try to bribe him. Hērē promises him kingship, Athēnē victory in war, and Aphrodītē sexual irresistibility to the most beautiful mortal woman in the known world, HELEN, who happens already to be married to MENELAÖS. He chooses Aphrodītē, who is as good as her word. While a guest of Menelaös, Paris duly absconds with Helen (and much of her property) during his host's absence at a funeral on KRĒTĒ (CRETE). Since Helen's prenuptial suitors have all sworn an oath to her father to rescue her if ever abducted (see s.v. HELEN), the result is the Trojan War, exactly as Zeus had planned.

KALCHAS Son of Thestōr, chief priest and seer of the ACHAIAN expeditionary force, who “knew events present and future as well as from the past” (1.70–72) and has brought the fleet safely to TROY with the aid of APOLLO. Though important, he is only prominent early in the Iliad. He explains the reason for Apollo's wrath (the refusal of ransom to the Apolline priest CHRYSSES for his daughter) that has led to a visitation of plague on the troops (1.74–100), and, indirectly, to the rage of ACHILLES at AGAMEMNŌN (1.106–244). In a flashback narrated by ODYSSEUS (2.299–332) we learn of a portent at AULIS at the outset of the campaign, which Kalchas interpreted to mean that the war would last ten years. Outside the Iliad, Kalchas figures in several crucial episodes (e.g., the building of the WOODEN HORSE), the most important (Cypria arg. 8 = West 2003 [A], 74–75) being his explanation to Agamemnōn at Aulis that the contrary winds preventing the fleet from sailing are due to the wrath of ARTEMIS at Agamemnōn claiming to outperform her as a hunter, and that only atoning for this with the sacrifice of his daughter IPHIGENEIA will change the winds. He duly sends for Iphigeneia on the pretense that she is to marry Achilles: the sacrifice takes place (later tradition euphemizes this by the substitution of a deer; Aeschylus in the Agamemnon knew better), the prevailing wind changes, and the fleet duly sails. Ten years later, when Agamemnōn finally comes home to MYKĒNAI (MYCENAE), Iphigeneia's death is a major factor in his murder by his wife, KLYTAIMNĒSTRA. Some have seen a hint of this never-forgotten business in Agamemnōn's initial simmering distaste for Kalchas (1.105–8), but Homer never refers to it directly.

KASSANDRĒ The most beautiful (13.365–66, 24.699) daughter of PRIAM and HEKABĒ, briefly betrothed (13.368–69; her fiancé is killed), and the first person to see her father returning, with HEKTŌR's corpse, from his momentous encounter with ACHILLES (24.700–706). This is all that the Iliad tells us about her. We hear nothing about her capacity for prophecy (Cypria arg. 1), bestowed on her by APOLLO in the hope of seducing her: when she refuses him, he cannot undo his gift, but adds the rider that no one will ever believe her predictions (Aesch. Ag. 1202–12). Nor does Homer mention her rape by AIAS (2) at the sack of TROY (Sack of Ilium arg. 3 = West 2003 [A], 146–47). In the Odyssey, however, we do learn briefly of how she, like AGAMEMNŌN (who has brought her to MYKĒNAI as his prize), is killed by KLYTAIMNĒSTRA (Od. 11.421–23).

KLYTAIMNĒSTRA Daughter of Lēdē and Tyndareus, married to AGAMEMNŌN, sister of HELEN, and mother of several daughters (including IPHIGENEIA) and one son, Orestēs. The only reference to her in the Iliad is at 1.113–15, where Agamemnōn compares her unfavorably to his prize of war CHRYSEĪS. In the Odyssey, however, the full story of her adultery with Aigisthos, and her subsequent murder of Agamemnōn, is related in detail, (3.263–72, 11.409–34, 24.199–202), primarily in the UNDERWORLD, to ODYSSEUS, by Agamemnōn's ghost. See also s.v. KALCHAS.

KRĒTĒ (CRETE) The “great island” (still known as such to modern Greeks) that lies like a rugged mountainous bar, about 160 miles in length, across the southern entry to the Aegean Sea, has always played a major part in Greek history as fortress and trading center. Paradoxically, we know a good deal more about its pre-MYCENAEAN Bronze Age “Minoan” culture than Homer did. In the Iliad—consonant with modern research positing a Mycenaean takeover of the island c. 1450—we find a major contingent of eighty ships, led by IDOMENEUS (q.v.), joining the expedition against TROY (2.645–52). There is mention of well-known cities—Knossos, Phaistos, Gortyn—under Idomeneus's rule. He himself is proud of his heroic lineage: son of Deukaliōn, and grandson of MĪNŌS (q.v.), whom ZEUS sired, and set as guardian over Krētē (13.448–54). We get one fleeting glimpse only of the island's legendary past, when, on the shield he is forging for ACHILLES, HĒPHAISTOS sets “a dancing floor like the one in spacious Knossos / that long ago Daidalos fashioned for fair-tressed Ariadnē” (18.590–92).

KRONOS Youngest of the TITANS, son of Ouranos (Heaven/Sky) and Gaia (Earth). By his sister Rhea he sires the OLYMPIAN family of gods: Hestia, DĒMĒTĒR, HĒRĒ, HĀDĒS, POSEIDŌN, and ZEUS. In the Iliad he is chiefly (and frequently) mentioned simply as these deities' progenitor, but there are brief allusions to Zeus's rebellion against him (14.203–4) and his subsequent defeat and imprisonment in TARTAROS (8.478–81, 14.203–4, 274–79). The full, and grisly, creation myth, avoided by Homer, is given by Hesiod in his Theogony, 137–38, 154–210, 453–506, 617–735.

KYPRIS In book 5 of the Iliad only, a title or alternative name ("the Kyprian /Cypriot") for APHRODĪTĒ, Kypros/Cyprus being both the place of her birth (Hes. Th. 199) and her cult center (Od. 8.362).

LAKEDAIMŌN Known in historical times as Lakōnia, Lakedaimōn (already so named in the LINEAR B tablets) comprises the area of the Eurōtas river valley, flanked east and west by the mountain ranges of Parnēs and Taÿgetos, that formed the basic territory of ancient SPARTA. It is described, accurately, in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.581) as "hollow ravine-scored", and is the domain of MENE-LAŌS (and, thus, by marriage as well as by birth, the home of HELEN). It furnishes sixty ships to the expedition against TROY (2.582–87).

LAOMEDŌN Father of PRIAM (20.237), and former king of TROY, the main reference to whom in the Iliad (21.441–57) concerns his not only defrauding POSEIDŌN and APOLLO out of wages due them for labor done at ZEUS's bidding on his behalf, but threatening to sell them as slaves and cut off their ears. Poseidōn in revenge sends a sea monster to ravage Laomedōn's lands, and he appeals to HĒRAKLĒS for help, promising him his immortal horses (inherited from his grandfather TRŌS, q.v.: 5.265–67) as a reward. Hēraklēs obliges (20.145–48), but, true to form, Laomedōn fobs him off with mortal horses, and in furious retaliation (5.638–42) Hēraklēs captures and sacks Troy.

LĒMNOS Island in the north Aegean. The Iliad refers to it (i) as a source of wine—perhaps in exchange for slaves (21.29–31)—for the ACHAANS during their campaign (7.67–69); (ii) as where PHILOKTĒTĒS was left behind during the voyage to TROY, because of a foul-smelling wound caused by a bite from a water snake (2.721–24), and (iii) where HĒPHAISTOS was flung by ZEUS in anger during a domestic dispute (1.590–94): the association of the blacksmith god with this island has been plausibly linked to its fumaroles, and the volcanic gas and smoke rising from them.

LESBOS Large island in the northeastern Aegean, close offshore in the Gulf of Adramyttion to the TROAD, with long-standing connections to the area associated with Homeric TROY. Its capture by ACHILLES is mentioned in the Iliad (9.128–30), as is the woman Diomēdē whom he won there as a prize of war (9.663–65).

LINEAR B A MYCENAEAN syllabary in use between c. 1450 and the collapse of Aegean Bronze Age culture c. 1200, and surviving for the most part on clay tablets baked hard in destructive fires at Knossos on KRĒTĒ (CRETE) and in mainland Greece at PYLOS, THĒBĒ (1), TIRYNS, MYKĒNAI (MYCENAE), and LAKEDAIMŌN: named thus to distinguish it from Linear A, the still undeciphered earlier (1750–1400 B.C.E.) MINOAN syllabary on which it was based. The tablets (both A and B) were first discovered and categorized by Sir Arthur Evans (1851–1941); Linear B was deciphered as a form of proto-Greek in 1952 by the young architect and cryptographer Michael Ventris (1922–56). The Linear B tablets consist largely of bureaucratic records of personnel, livestock, and goods, and two major conclusions have been drawn from them. (i) The old theory, supported by Evans, that Mycenaean culture was throughout a minor (perhaps colonial) dependency of that of Minoan Krētē has been completely discarded. Indeed, it seems clear that the reverse was true from about 1450 on: the Mycenaeans established their own rule over Krētē, and the adaptation of Linear A to transcribing Mycenaean Greek was a direct consequence of this. (ii) The second conclusion, in essence that of Moses Finley, and still dominant in too many places, argued that the bureaucratic world of the tablets was so different from the one portrayed by Homer that the poet's picture must rather have been drawn in essence from the later, Archaic world, with which he was more familiar. But in fact what Linear B revealed was a world that medievalists already knew very well: while an illiterate aristocracy fought wars, pursued honor, and patronized the bards, a lettered clergy kept the economic network on which they depended running smoothly and invisibly, leaving their masters to the pleasures of guest-friendships and the exchange of rich gifts and genealogies. Linear B, far from disproving the Mycenaean roots of Homeric society, in fact confirms them, by providing a key feature missing from the medieval comparison.

LOKRIS, LOKRIANS In the Iliad, we have to do only with eastern (Epiknēmidian and Opuntian) Lokris, on the coast north of Phōkis and BOIŌTIA, across from the island of EUBOIA (BA 55 D3). The Lokrian contingent is forty ships (2.527–35) and mainly notable for the important role assumed by its leader, AIAS (2), q.v. One of its towns, Opoeis, was the birthplace of PATROKLOS (23.84–88).

LYCIA, LYCIANS A region of southwestern Asia Minor, between CARIA and Pamphylia. In the Late Bronze age, Lycia and Pamphylia constituted a historical entity known to the Hittites as Lukka. The Lycians form the last entry (2.876–77) in the brief TROJAN CATALOGUE. Their leaders are SARPĒDŌN and GLAUKOS (q.v.).

MELEAGROS Son of Oineus, king of Kalydōn in AITŌLIA, and ALTHAIĒ (q.v.). Though the commander-designate of the Aitōlian contingent (2.638–44), he is dead before the expedition's departure. He is best known in myth for his role in the great Kalydōnian boar hunt, an episode related at length (9.529–99) by PHOINIX during the embassy to ACHILLES as an example that might induce him to be reconciled to AGAMEMNŌN and return to the fighting. ARTEMIS, angered by Oineus's failure to make due sacrifice to her, sends a huge boar to ravage his crops and orchards. It causes many deaths, but finally is killed by Meleagros. Still riled, Artemis then stirs up trouble between Aitōlians and Kourētes (a nearby tribe) over the boar's head and hide as trophies, during which Meleagros kills his mother's brother. Althaiē thereupon prays for his death, and the great warrior retires from the struggle, only being persuaded to rejoin the fight when losses to the Kourêtes leave the enemy literally hammering at his and his wife's bedroom door. Let Achilles take heed! (Though sympathetic to his old tutor Phoinix, Achilles remains unconvinced.)

MENELAÖS Son of ATREUS; younger brother of AGAMEMNŌN, married to HELEN, and king of SPARTA. In the Iliad he is a brave warrior, but older than many and never considered in the top rank: Agamemnōn is worried that he may be killed (4.169–82, 7.107–16). Yet with good assistance he does well: for example, he and AIAS (1), helped by MĒRIONĒS, successfully rescue, and make off with, the corpse of PATROKLOS (17.90–261, 705–61). Furious when wronged—his anger at being cheated out of his victory in the chariot race at the funeral games for Patroklos (23.425–41, 566–85) is typical—he is easily flattered into a good mood by the offender (23.586–615). But at one crucial moment, during his enraged duel (3.21–29, 338–72) with PARIS/ALÉXANDROS, the man who, by cuckolding him and levanting with his wife, has precipitated the TROJAN WAR, Menelaös, on the point of victory, and about to strangle his opponent with the chin strap of his own helmet (3.369–76), is made to look a comic fool. APHRODĪTĒ, always protective of Paris, snaps the strap and magically wafts Paris away to Helen's boudoir for sex, leaving his puzzled opponent to storm frantically through the ranks in search of him, while he and Helen bed down (3.448–54). Menelaös is again captivated by Helen at the fall of Troy (Little Iliad fr. 28 = West 2003 [A], 138–39); see above s.v. HELEN on how the two of them later entertain Tēlemachos in Sparta (Od. 4.219–95). This is not the only occasion in the Iliad when we are—deliberately, I would argue—left wondering what, if anything, the Trojan War achieved.

MĒRIONĒS A CRETAN, son of Molos (13.249), and IDOMENEUS's henchman and second-in-command (2.650–51). A fine warrior (5.59–68, 13.156–68, 526–39), he offers to fight HEKTŌR (7.166) and is several times (e.g., 7.166, 8.264) likened to ENYALIOS. This, and his offer to ODYSSEUS (10.260–71) of a boar's-tusk helmet (such as went out of use several centuries before the putative date of the TROJAN WAR) hint at his great antiquity in the epic tradition. He is also a talented archer (13.650–56) who wins the archery contest at PATROKLOS's funeral games (23.850–83).

MINOAN CIVILIZATION The term “Minoan”, derived by Sir Arthur Evans from the mythical king MĪNŌS (q.v.) was coined by him to describe the early palace culture (c. 1700—c.1400) of KRĒTĒ (CRETE), to distinguish it from the mainland MYCENAEAN culture then being explored by Heinrich Schliemann. In fact we do not know the real name of the colorful and highly sophisticated people, with their bull-leaping frescoes and parabolic drains, that Evans and his successors so successfully popularized: the Egyptians called them the Keftiu, and this name may be connected with biblical Kaphtor. There seem to have been major disasters c. 1650 and 1490–50—perhaps seismic and volcanic, with probable human intervention in the latter case, when it seems likely that the mainland MYCENAEANS profited by a natural disaster to take over the island (cf. LINEAR B). Thus for at least two centuries, until c. 1200, the KRĒTĒ known to the epic tradition would have been one dominated by Mycenaeans, and this would explain the island’s participation in the TROJAN WAR.

The main Homeric reference to KRĒTĒ comes in the Odyssey (19.172–89), in one of the traveller’s tales fabricated by ODYSSEUS for his wife Penelope, but so designed as to “make all his lies sound like true facts” (19.203). The island is thickly populated, with some ninety cities. They do not all speak the same language: there are native islanders, Dorians, and others. The main city is Knossos, and it was from there that King Mīnōs ruled. It has a difficult harbor at Amnisos. All this agrees well with the archaeological and linguistic record. Over forty sizable settlements have been excavated, and more are known. The architecture is advanced, offering maze-like rooms constructed, with light wells, around a central courtyard. Under the Mycenaeans many previously independent towns seem to have come under the central administration of Knossos. Like other Mycenaean centers, Knossos suffered in the general eclipse of palatial Bronze Age culture c. 1200.

Homer reveals little knowledge of Minoan life and society, but there are occasional flashes in the Iliad of familiarity with Minoan myth (e.g., of Ariadne’s dancing floor built in Knossos by Daidalos, 18.592: cf. s.v. HĒPHAISTOS). Characteristically, given its nature, Homer does not mention the famous myth of the Minotaur, though clearly (Od. 11.321–25) well aware of it.

MĪNŌS Famous early legendary king of KRĒTĒ (CRETE), “where Mīnōs’s line is,” says Eumaeus (Od. 17.523), he is the subject of numerous (often conflicting) myths in later Greek tradition, but is mentioned only briefly by Homer. He is, by Eurōpē, the son of ZEUS, who sires him “to be Krētē’s guardian” (Il. 13.450), and with whom he is intimate (Od. 19.178); the brother of RHADAMANTHYS (Il. 14.321–22), and the father of Deukaliōn (Il. 13.451, Od. 19.178) and Ariadnē, whose connection with Thēseus Homer knows but does not stress (Od. 11.321–25, cf. Diod. Sic. 4.61.4–5). He sits with a gold scepter in the underworld as judge of the dead (Od. 11.568–71). The only hint of his less savory activities—this in connection with Ariadnē—is that he has a “malign” mind (Od. 11.322). From other sources (e.g., Hdt. 1.171, Thuc. 1.4, Diod. Sic. 4.60.3), we know that Mīnōs was regarded as the first thalassocrat, with rule extending into the Cycladic islands of the Aegean: this tradition agrees with archaeological findings on Thēra (Santorini), for example. It is also possible that “Mīnōs” was a dynastic title rather than a name (cf. Diod. Sic. 4.60.2–3).

MUSES OLYMPIAN goddesses of song and creative inspiration, children of ZEUS and Mnēmōsynē (Memory), and nine in number, each attached to a specific area (Od. 24.60–62, Hes. Th. 53–67), the best-known being Kalliopē (epic), Eratō (lyric), Melpomenē (tragedy) and Thalia (comedy). On Olympos they sing in chorus, accompanied by APOLLO on the lyre. They are regularly invoked, including at the opening of both Iliad and Odyssey, to provide knowledge and inspiration. However, as Ruth Scodel well points out (HE 2: 531) they do not themselves do the narration, but merely feed the poet with material, since Homer several times thereafter appeals to them for specific facts: for example, to name the ACHAEAN leaders in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.484–92), to identify the best warriors and chariot horses (2.761–62), or to explain (16.112–13) “how fire first came to be flung on the Achaeans’ ships.” Their gifts could come dear: Dēmodokos in the Odyssey gets his skill from the Muse (who loves him dearly!) only in exchange for his sight (Od. 8.62–64); and when Thamyris unwisely boasts that he can sing and play better than the Muses themselves, they not only strip him of his talent, but “maim” him (Il. 2.594–600): this, as we learn elsewhere (Apollod. 1.3.3) likewise involved blinding. Inspiration, then as now, could, it was clearly felt, be dangerous.

MYCENAEAN CIVILIZATION The Late Bronze Age culture of mainland Greece, from c. 1550 to the approximate date (c. 1200) of the end of the palatial regime in such cities as MYKĒNAI (MYCENAE), TIRYNS, ARGOS, and PYLOS. It is the last century or two of this period, ending with the TROJAN WAR and its immediate aftermath, with which the Homeric epic tradition is primarily concerned. From southern THESSALY to the PELOPONNESE, we find a series of wealthy, powerful, and increasingly competitive elite groups: warrior kings based on strong-walled citadels, both served by and protecting the largely rural population surrounding them. Their burial goods (in particular those of the shaft graves at Mykēnai) were resplendent, their beehive tholos tombs and their huge “Cyclopean” walls both costly and impressive: these were men who set out to leave their mark, whose legacy was calculated to suggest that they were indeed, as epic tradition repeatedly maintained, stronger and larger than the latter-day mortals who succeeded them.

It was long believed that, especially after the takeover of MINOAN KRĒTĒ (CRETE) c. 1450, these Mycenaeans were invaders. Today, however, the cumulative evidence suggests a slow cultural evolution of local clans. The basic features of this era, from its monumental strongholds to its battle-minded aristocracy, may well have furnished some fundamental elements of the Homeric (and Hesiodic) HEROIC AGE (q.v.). It seems probable that either Mykēnai or THĒBĒ (1) was in some sense (as the role of AGAMEMNŌN in the Iliad suggests) the capital of these largely independent fiefdoms, which collectively must have constituted the kingdom of AHHIYAWA (?ACHAIA).

For the economic functioning of these principalities see s.v. LINEAR B. With the collapse of the palace-centered system c. 1200, endemic warfare continued (as vase illustrations suggest), but all sophisticated aspects of this remarkable culture, from its writing system and its jewelry to its monumental architecture, were lost, and only fractionally preserved in memory.

MYKĒNAI (MYCENAE) Closely associated in the Iliad with AGAMEMNŌN, Mykēnai is strategically situated on a rocky eminence, protected on two sides by ravines, at the northeastern edge of the ARGIVE plain (cf. Od. 3.263). It looks toward ARGOS, and is linked with most other neighboring areas by traceable roads. Today, of course, with its great “Cyclopean” Lion Gate, its shaft-grave tombs, and its unforgettable gold burial masks (“golden Mykēnai” indeed, 11.46, Od. 3.304), it is, as Wiener says in his lapidary article (HE 2: 535–38), “inextricably linked” in public perception with Heinrich Schliemann. Everyone remembers how Schliemann believed, on first seeing the gold masks, that he had “gazed on the face of Agamemnōn”. It is less often recalled that what he had seen in fact antedated any plausible date for Agamemnōn (cf. TROJAN WAR) by at least two centuries.

However, it was indeed around, or shortly before, the likeliest date for that war that much of Mykēnai as we know it came into being. The great palace, as well as the circuit walls, with their giant limestone slabs (dubbed “Cyclopean” in antiquity, since it was thought only giants such as the Cyclops could have built them) were erected c. 1350: “well-wrought citadel” (2.569) is right. The huge tholos tomb known as the “Treasury of Atreus” followed, soon after 1300. The Lion Gate itself was added c. 1270. Mykēnai was now at the very zenith of its wealth and power. How far did that power extend? At 2.108 Agamemnōn is “lord over many islands and the whole of Argos”; 9.149–53 suggests even wider Peloponnesian holdings. Yet in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.569–77), even though his is the largest contingent (100 ships), his holdings are largely limited to the area round CORINTH, while Argos and other sites are held by DIOMĒDĒS (2.559–66): this suggests a later date, and perhaps some Dorian manipulation (cf. s.v. ARGOLID).

MYRMIDONS In general, the inhabitants of PHTHIĒ and HELLAS, two regions in southeastern THESSALY, near the SPERCHEIOS RIVER (Il. 2.681–85, 9.395, Od. 11.496). See also s.v. HELLAS above.

The Myrmidons are the subjects of ACHILLES’ father PĒLEUS (Il. 7.126, 16.15, 155; 21.188, 24.536); in a more restricted sense they are the picked warriors, the companions (betairoi) who accompany Achilles to TROY, and it is in this sense that they are most frequently mentioned throughout the Iliad (1.180, 328; 9.185, 652; 11.796–97, 16.12–13, 68–220, 257–83; 18.69, 323–55; 19.14, 278, 299; 23.4–6, 60, 129; 24.449). They are “war-loving” (16.65, 23.129), a quality illustrated by similes comparing them to angry wasps (16.259–65) and thirsty wolves after a kill (16.155–67). For their early connection to AIGINA see s.v. AIAKOS.

NEOPTOLEMOS Also known as PYRRHOS (i.e., “redhead”): ACHILLES’ sole son. PĒLEUS, knowing from THETIS that Achilles was fated to die at TROY, had sent him as a boy to Lykomēdēs, king of the island of Skyros, to be brought up secretly, disguised as a girl (Cypria fr. 19 = West 2003 [A], 96–97). While thus closeted Achilles made love to the king’s daughter Deīdameia. Neoptolemos, the result of this union, was fetched to Troy after his father’s death by ODYSSEUS, and given Achilles’ armor. He proved a savage warrior. He was one of the picked fighters in the WOODEN HORSE (Od. 11.504–37: this tactful account by Odysseus, in HĀDĒS, to the shade of Achilles, of his son’s actions during the sack of Troy omits his slaughter of PRIAM (Sack of Ilium arg. 2 = West 2003 [A], 144–45) and his getting ANDROMACHĒ as a prize of war after hurling her baby son Astyanax from the battlements (Little Iliad frs. 29–30 = West 2003 [A], 138–41).

NĒREĪDS Marine nymphs, daughters of the old sea god Nēreus, with whom they reside in the sea (generally the AEGEAN). They are of large but indeterminate number (estimates range from the thirties to the fifties): named, but—with few exceptions, such as THETIS—not individualized. In the Iliad their sole mention, and function, is as a funerary chorus of mourners, led by Thetis (18.35–69), for PATROKLOS and, beyond him, for the doomed ACHILLES. Their keening at Achilles' actual funeral (Od. 24.47–62) is so intense that it scares the ACHAIANS, who have to be calmed by NESTÖR.

NESTÖR Youngest son of Nēleus, king of PYLOS, and Chlōris, and grandson of POSEIDŌN. He and his father are the only survivors of the raid on Pylos conducted by HĒRAKLĒS (11.687–93). In the Iliad he is noted for two outstanding characteristics: his great age, and the wise persuasiveness with which age has endowed him (2.247–52). He has outlived two generations and is king among the third; he is a honey-sweet orator. He has three sons: ANTILOCHOS, Thrasymēdēs (10. 255–57, 16.317–25, 17.377–83, Od. 3.411–15) and Peisistratos (Od. 3.36–42, 4.155–67). He brings ninety ships to TROY (2.591–602) and despite his age helps out on the battlefield (8.80–121, 11.511–20, 15.559–66). But his chief role is that of ever-ready adviser: not always with success, as in his attempt to mend the initial rift between AGAMEMNŌN and ACHILLES (1.254–84). This speech is typical: it is long-winded, it calls upon ancient precedent, and it is careful to mention his own youthful achievement. Other such occasions include the embassy to Achilles (9.111–12, 162–73, 179–81, where he “kept giving them instructions”), the night raid on the TROJAN camp (10. 204–17), and rambling tips on chariot racing to Antilochos (23.305–48). Notable examples of his nostalgic (“I’m not so strong as I was”) bragging are his battles with the Epeians (11.668–762) and his prowess as an athlete at long-ago funeral games (23.626–50). Despite his anecdotal loquaciousness he is invariably treated with the greatest courtesy and respect. In the Odyssey he is the first source of information to Tēlemachos about his father ODYSSEUS (Od. 3.118–29).

(Tēlemachos, incidentally, is the only character in either epic who is driven to dodge his relentless longwinded hospitality, conspiring with Peisistratos to avoid another stay at Pylos on his homeward journey: Od. 15.195–201).

OCEAN An extreme example of the archaic personification of natural phenomena. Ocean is the circular remote (3.5) stream thought to encompass the frontiers of a disc-shaped world, (14.200–201, 18.607–8, cf. Hes. Th. 790–91), and neighbor to distant, little-known, and thus fantasized peoples: Aithiōpians (1.423, 23.206), Pygmies (3.4–6), and Kimmerians (Od. 11.14–19). When rescued by THETIS after being thrown out of OLYMPOS by HĒRĒ, HĒPHAISTOS hides near Ocean (18.393–405). But Ocean is also the son of Ouranos (Sky) and Gē or Gaia (Earth), married to Tethys (14.201–2), and the progenitor of all the gods (14.246), as well as of every sea, river, and spring (21.195–97). He has a house, and Hērē proposes to visit him and Tethys there (14.301–11). With the rapid development of exploration, however, this always improbable personification was soon dropped; and by Herodotus's day the very idea of a circumambient stream embracing the world was challenged (Hdt. 2.23, 4.36).

ODYSSEUS Son of Laertēs and Antikleia (daughter of the thievish trickster Autolykos, Od. 19.392–466, Shakespeare's "snapper-up of unconsidered trifles"); married to Penelopē, father of TĒLEMACHOS, and lord of a small kingdom centered on the IONIAN island of ITHÁKĒ (q.v.). Despite this marginal background and dubious ancestry he is one of the most distinguished leaders at TROY (and, of course, the central hero of the subsequent Odyssey). Though his reputation for devilousness is several times mentioned in the Iliad—HELEN says that "he knows all manner of wiles and sharp devices" (3.200–202), while the angry AGAMEMNŌN addresses him as "you, skilled in vile deception, mind set on crafty profit!" (4.339)—it is only in his dealing with DOLŌN (10.371–458) that this side of his character shows itself (Stanford 14–19, who suggests, plausibly, that "in the Iliad the poet intended his hearers to enjoy the spectacle of a wily, sensitive, and self-controlled man disciplining his personality to fit into a rigid code of heroic conduct."

Elsewhere he displays fine courage as a warrior (11.310–488); his tough decisiveness and sharp words save the day when the Greek army is on the verge of breaking up (2.269–335); his persuasive tongue is put to good diplomatic use during the embassy to ACHILLES (9.223–306; yet even here Achilles in response expresses his hatred for a man "who hides one thought in his mind, but speaks another" (313).

It is surely significant that in the Iliad we hear nothing of Odysseus's extraordinary skill (Od. 21.366–430) with the bow: he does not even compete for the archery prize at the funeral games of PATROKLOS (23.850–83). The reason is clearly because this weapon was shunned by aristocratic HEROES as operating at a safe distance, and thus not encouraging true hand-to-hand valor. If so, in the post-Iliadic Odyssey, Homer must have enjoyed throwing off all restraints and portraying his much-travelled hero as the finest trickster of them all, in a world where survival mattered far more than aristocratic honor. Perhaps the most sharply etched portrait of him in the Iliad is delivered by the Trojan elder ANTĒNŌR (3.209–24), recalling his prewar diplomatic visit to TROY; short, but massive and broad-shouldered, the great voice booming from his chest as he makes his speech, "the words resembling some driving wintry snowstorm."

OLYMPOS, OLYMPIANS In one sense Olympos is a very tangible limestone mountain—at nearly ten thousand feet, it is the highest peak in the Greek mainland, and, straddling as it does the frontier between THESSALY and Macedonia, an impressive natural landmark, often veiled in clouds, and snow-capped annually from late fall to spring. But in Homer, notably in the Iliad, it is also the abode of the Olympian gods, a part of their heaven, and thus, inevitably, removed from its physical presence. Originally, in the far distant past, the two had been identical (Olympos's regular epithets are all appropriate for a real mountain), and their one-time congruence manifests itself throughout the Iliad. The gods not only use Olympos (and IDA) as a vantage point to observe goings-on on earth; they have houses and workshops there, built by HĒPHAISTOS; Olympos is their home, most of them feast and sleep and quarrel there, as Purves nicely puts it (HE 2: 600–601) “in a kind of rowdy extended family,” that contrasts sharply with the human heartbreak and slaughter going on below. This being the HEROIC AGE, the Olympians still have close contact with mortals; but, too, their high places are still sacrosanct. Some of the resultant discrepancies bothered the Greeks of historical times: ZEUS, for example, at one point (8.23–27) threatens to hang gods, sea, and earth on a golden cord from Olympos (mountain or heavenly sphere?), which led the commentator Aristarchos to observe, tartly, that he couldn't hang the earth from Olympos if Olympos was part of earth.

ORESTĒS Son of KLYTAIMNĒSTRA and AGAMEMNŌN, who refers to him, when making his offer of compensation to ACHILLES (9.142–43), as tēlygetos, probably meaning “late-born” and so “cherished” (Hainsworth 76), an epithet that would surely have been relished by Homer's audience, who knew, all too well, what was to come: Agamemnōn's murder by his wife, at least partly in revenge for the sacrifice at AULIS of his daughter IPHIGENEIA, and the subsequent killing of both Klytaimnēstra and her lover AIGISTHOS, after seven years, by Orestēs himself (Od. 3.193–98, 304–8, Hes. Cat. fr. 19.27–30 = Most 2.70–71). From Agamemnōn's viewpoint, a cherished son indeed.

PAIĒŌN, PAEAN Paiēōn, alluded to by Homer at Il. 5.401, 899, 900 and Od. 4.232, is the name of an ancient god of healing, known from the LINEAR B tablets, later diminished to an epithet of APOLLO. The name is cognate with the Apolline paean, a cult song addressed to the god as an appeasement after the return of CHRYSEĪS (1.472–74) and urged by ACHILLES as a victory chant when escorting HEKTŌR's body back to the ships.

PANDAROS A wealthy Trojan, son of Lykaōn (whose name may have occasioned his false association with LYCIA at 5.105 and 173): leader of a contingent from the foothills of MT. IDA, and a famous archer favored by APOLLO (2.824–27). His most notable act in the Iliad is when—flattered and encouraged by a disguised ATHĒNĒ (4.86–103), because of her anxiety for the war to continue—he shoots and wounds MENELAÖS (4.104–47), thus breaking the sworn truce previously established (3.84–120, 245–301). When battle is rejoined, he also shoots DIOMĒDĒS in the shoulder (5.95–105). Called to action by AINEIAS, he makes a long, nervous, self-exculpatory speech (5.179–216), and shortly afterwards, boastful to the last, is killed by Diomēdēs (5.280–96). Many readers may well connect him with the Pandarus of Boccaccio, Chaucer, and Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida—the cousin or uncle of the latter and the go-between facilitating her romance with Troilus—which, they may be surprised to learn, is a medieval invention, taking off from the increasingly anti-Homeric tradition in antiquity that culminated in the invented narratives of the TROJAN WAR (probably of the first century C.E.) ascribed by their anonymous authors to “Dictys of Crete” and “Dares the Phrygian” (see Frazer, R.M., 3–7, who provides the only available translation of both).

PARIS/ALÉXANDROS Son of PRIAM and HEKABĒ, younger brother of HEKTÖR, and—through his abduction of HELEN, the wife of MENELAÖS, together with her (no less important) possessions (3.70–72, 458; 7.361–64, cf. Cypria arg. 2 = West 2003 [A], 68–69, Strauss 20–21)—the direct cause of the TROJAN WAR. Of the two names by which he is variously known, “Paris” has no basis in Greek, while “Aléxandros” (which of course does) may well indicate a connection, if not identity, with an Alaksandu, prince of Wilusa (? = Iliion) who made a treaty with the Hittites (Latacz 2004, 103–10, 117–19) c. 1290–70. The two names have often been thought to indicate a melding in the epic of two separate characters: suggestive of this is the fact that although Aléxandros fights exclusively as an archer in book 11 (370–83, 504, 581), elsewhere Paris fights only as a spearman (12.93, 13.660–72, 15.341–42). Homer tells us neither of his exposure because of an ill-omened dream (on this see HEKABĒ), and its implications for his role in the JUDGMENT OF PARIS (q.v.), nor of the full significance of the PLAN OF ZEUS for this whole sequence of events.

We first meet him in book 3 (15–32), where his character is indelibly established: he comes prancing out ahead in a panther skin, carrying a bow as well as his spears, and challenging any ACHAIAN to fight him, but at the sight of MENELAÖS he panics and scuttles back in among the ranks, earning the first of several stinging descriptions by his brother HEKTÖR as a sex-mad, lyre-playing, long-haired, good-looking cheat and coward (3.39–57). His success at bedding women is seen, by the oh-so-happily married Hektör, as an integral part of his cowardice: an all-too-familiar collocation that suggests (and was probably meant to suggest) a tinge of jealousy. There is always something a shade ridiculous about Homer’s Paris: Menelaös dragging him off the field by his chin strap (3.369–82) is bad enough; his rescue from this predicament by APHRODĪTĒ, who wafts him magically home for (irresistible) sex with Helen is plain embarrassing, the more so because Paris himself—as narcissistic as they come—unlike the guilt-ridden Helen, isn’t embarrassed at all, but takes the whole thing in his stride (3.421–48). Even when he finally joins Hektör, laughing, in his fine armor, Homer likens him (6.503–29), in a fine simile (the point of which sometimes eludes translators), to a thoroughbred stallion galloping over the plain in search of “the haunts and pastures of mares.” The very last mention of him in the Iliad, by the dying Hektör (22.359), foretells his killing of ACHILLES, with APOLLO’s support, at the SKAIAN GATES: the proudest HERO of them all is thus casually dispatched (Aethiopis arg. 3 = West 2003 [A], 112–13) by the coward’s weapon, an arrow (which—to outrage the heroic code even further—is probably poisoned, since he dies at once, though only hit in his vulnerable heel or ankle).

PATROKLOS Son of Menoitios, of Opoeis, his birthplace, in LOKRIS. After losing his temper during a game of dice as a boy, he accidentally kills a playmate and is banished in consequence (23.85–88). Taken in and raised by PÉLEUS together with Pelēus's own son ACHILLES, he becomes the latter's close companion, and shares his education (see s.v. CHEIRŌN). When they both leave for TROY, Menoitios instructs him, as the elder of the two, to look after Achilles (11.785–90), and he becomes the younger, but nobler, warrior's squire. In this capacity he alone of the other leading warriors stays with Achilles and his MYRMIDONS when Achilles withdraws from the fighting. We see him twice only, and then very briefly, in the first half of the Iliad (1.337–38, 9.190–91, 201–20) when he is simply acting as Achilles' aide and manservant, and says not a word.

But he is nevertheless “as battle-minded as Arēs: so began his undoing” (11.604). Sent on an errand to NESTŌR by Achilles, he refuses to come in and sit down: “quick to censure,” he says, “is he who sent me” (11.649). But Nestōr, like the Ancient Mariner—and clearly knowing a frustrated hero when he sees one—holds him at the door with an enormously long speech (11.656–803), reminding Patroklos of his sworn duty to give Achilles good advice, stressing the critical stage the war has reached, and urging him to make Achilles rejoin the fighting force—or, failing that, to lend Patroklos his armor to deceive the TROJANS, and let him go into battle with the Myrmidons. Homer's audience is then left hanging for four whole books (though these total little dramatic time) in anticipation of how Patroklos will handle his all-too-famous decision.

Then, however, things move fast (16.1–100). Patroklos, weeping (like a child running to its mother, Achilles says at first, 7–10), makes his impassioned plea, followed by one of Homer's rare narratorial interjections (46–47) “Such his entreaty, the great fool: but as fate decreed, / his own ghastly death and destruction it was for which he prayed.” Armed in Achilles' battle gear, he sallies forth. Achilles strictly warns him: drive the enemy back from the ships, but then come back (80–100). What HERO engaged in his ARISTEIA would do so? Patroklos kills SARPĒDŌN (16.462–507), and presses on to the walls of TROY. Thrice thrown back and warned by APOLLO (16.699–709), he persists. Had he obeyed Achilles, he would have survived: but ZEUS drove him on to his destined fate (16.684–91). His death, at the hands of Apollo, Euphorbos, and, finally, HEKTŌR, is now inevitable (16.786–867). Book 17 is entirely taken up with the struggle over his body: only at the beginning of book 18 does ANTILOCHOS bring the news to Achilles, thus precipitating the last section of the Iliad, with Achilles' return to the battle, the death of Hektōr, the ransoming by Priam of his body, and Achilles' final ending of his wrath.

As all this suggests, the truth of the matter is that Patroklos dead is of much greater use to the epic than Patroklos alive. As a living character all we really know of him is that he wants to fight; even as a ghost he offers nothing except a series of peevish complaints and demands about his treatment in the underworld (23.68–92). BRISEÏS in her lament (19.295–300) says he was always kind to her, just as HELEN, with better evidence, says of HEKTŌR (24.771–75); we have to take her word for it. Achilles regards him as his dearest comrade (18.80–82), and certainly mourns him desperately, but seems to regret the loss of his armor at least as much (18.82–85); his order to Patroklos not to pursue the attack to the walls, far from being out of concern for his comrade's safety, is because "you'd diminish my honor" (16.90). But once dead, Patroklos not only is the instrument of Achilles' return to the battlefield, but, through the fact of his loss, of Achilles' softening of heart, and so, indirectly, it is argued, of his concession to PRIAM. Yet even here there is doubt. What finally stops Achilles in his tracks is a no-nonsense order from ZEUS and all the gods, delivered by THETIS, to quit outraging the body of Hektōr and accept ransom for it (24.107–19). In response (24.139–40), Achilles says, "So be it." The expert in force majeure has recognized his superior. Whatever one may think about Homer's tragic sense, he is never, in the last resort, less than realistic over motive.

PĒLEUS Son of AIAKOS (q.v.) and thus a grandson of ZEUS, Pēleus is the wealthy king of the MYRMIDONS in PHTHIĒ (9.479–80, 11.766–70, 24.534–36), married to the immortal nymph THETIS, by whom he is the father of ACHILLES. Not surprisingly, it is to this marriage and its resultant child that Pēleus owes his off-stage presence in the Iliad. We hear nothing about his own very lively earlier mythic career (e.g., on the Kalydōnian boar hunt and as an Argonaut), though his cheerful quasi-adoption of the youthful PATROKLOS, exiled after an accidental killing, gains a certain savor from the fact that he himself had previously been twice exiled as the result of a couple of murders and ritually purified (Apollod. 3.12.6–13.2 = Frazer, J. G., 1: 56–63). Achilles, who clearly inherited his temper, will have known what to think when advised by him to control his pride, and to avoid "strife that breeds trouble" (9.255–58), before he sets out for TROY.

Pēleus's marriage is not calculated to produce harmony. Both Zeus and POSEIDŌN covet Thetis; but a prophecy (Apollod. 3.13.5 = Frazer, J. G., 2: 66–67; about this Homer is silent) that the child Thetis bears will grow to be greater than his father effectively chills their ardor, leading Zeus to lose no time in marrying her off—very much against her will (18.430–34) and despite a furious burst of shape-changing, also not mentioned by Homer—to a mortal, Pēleus, "a man who was dear to the hearts of the immortals" (24.61).

The gods themselves attend the wedding (24.62–63), at which APOLLO plays the lyre, and the MUSES sing. Gifts include the armor that Achilles later lends to Patroklos (18.82–85), his immortal horses (23.277–78, from Poseidōn) and the great spear of Pēlian ash that will be too weighty for Patroklos (16.140–44, from CHEIRŌN). But by the time of the Iliad, as Thetis complains to HĒPHAISTOS (18.435–61), Pēleus is a broken old man, while their glorious son—her one compensation for a hated marriage—is fated to die young. Homer does not tell us (though all his listeners would have known) the tradition that Thetis secretly at night worked at burning away the mortal element in her child, but that, interrupted and stopped by the alarmed Pēleus, she abandoned both of them, returning to a submarine life among her fellow NĒREĪDS (Apollod. 3.5.6 = Frazer, J. G., 2: 68–69, with further ref.).

PÉLION, MT. Coastal range some five thousand feet high running along the Magnesian peninsula in southeastern THESSALY (BA 55 A–B2), between the AEGEAN and the Gulf of Volos (ancient Pagasai), with numerous mountain streams, lush vegetation, and forests (2.757) of chestnut and ash. Pélion was the home of the CENTAURS, and the site of the wedding of Pélus and THETIS (Cypria fr. 4 = West 2003 [A], 84–85).

PELOPONNESE, THE The southern half of Greece, below the Isthmus of CORINTH: literally, the “island of Pelōps” (the father of ATREUS and the grandfather of AGAMEMNŌN and MENELAÖS): a patterned complex of mountain ranges and alluvial valleys that has always encouraged political separatism, the most famous case being that of SPARTA.

PHOINIX Son of Amyntōr (9.448), one of the five MYRMIDON captains at TROY (16.196), and the former tutor of the young ACHILLES. Cursed when young with sterility by the gods after (at his mother’s urging) seducing his father’s concubine, he fled to PÉLEUS, who took him in and established him (9.447–84). As Alden well stresses (HE 2: 662), this makes him “a dependent of Achilles’ family, with no other loyalties”, who treats the child Achilles as the son he himself never had. But Phoinix is thus also, in Achilles’ family-conscious eyes—however close their personal relationship—an “unhonored refugee” (9.648) rather than the surrogate father he considers himself to be, who presumptuously attempts, in his long speech (9.434–605) during the embassy to Achilles, to talk his former pupil into a similar subordinate position, as prospective son-in-law, to AGAMEMNŌN. The aristocrat’s rebuke to his vassal (9.611–14) is polite but sharp, and the embassy is not a success. It is notable that Phoinix from then on plays no real role in the Iliad’s narrative.

PHTHIĒ, PHTHIŌTIS The kingdom, together with HELLAS (q.v.), of ACHILLES and the MYRMIDONS (q.v.), north of the Malian Gulf in southeastern THESSALY, by the SPERCHEIOS river. Its exact extent is never made clear in the Iliad.

PLAN OF ZEUS, THE First referred to at the very opening (1.5) of the Iliad, this “plan” or “will” seems to have three separate but related senses: (i) in general, Zeus’s determination to reduce the overpopulation of the world, and end the HEROIC AGE (Cypria fr. 1 = West 2003 [A], 80–83; Hes. Cat. fr. 155.95–120; Most 2: 232–35), by causing first the THEBAN and then the TROJAN WAR; (ii) The various means by which he did so: the marriage of PÉLEUS and THETIS, which produced ACHILLES; the birth of HELEN; and, especially, the JUDGMENT OF PARIS (q.v.), leading to the cuckolding of MENELAÖS, the lasting hatred of TROJANS engendered in HÉRĒ and ATHĒNĒ, and the ten-year expedition against TROY; and (iii) his promise, in response to the prayer of THETIS, that he would compensate Achilles for AGAMEMNŌN’s insulting treatment of him by letting the TROJANS gain the upper hand in the war until the ACHAIIANS made him proper amends (1.503–30). The numerous manipulative actions on Zeus’s part scattered through the epic narrative all, in one way or another, form part of this overall scheme—including the peremptory order to Achilles to accept ransom and surrender HEKTÖR's body (24.107–19).

POSEIDŌN Second of KRONOS's three sons by Rhea (the other two being ZEUS and HĀDĒS (q.v.), with whom he shares earth and OLYMPOS, while having the sea as his personal realm (Zeus gets the sky and Hādēs the underworld). Poseidōn is an ancient deity, mentioned in the LINEAR B tablets: besides the sea, he is particularly associated with earthquakes (as the "Earth-Shaker") and horses (he is "dark-maned"). Both the tablets and Homer (Od. 3.4–66) associate him with PYLOS. In the Iliad he is consistently anti-TROJAN (even objecting to the rescue of HEKTÖR's body, 24.26) and pro-ACHAIAN, because of the way LAOMEDŌN (q.v.) cheated him over his recompense for building the walls of TROY (21.441–57). He is also resentful at the building of the Achaian Wall (7.445–53) and his postwar destruction of it is foretold (12.10–33). He has a past record of opposition to Zeus (1.396–406), but carefully avoids direct confrontation with him (8.198–211, 13.356–57, 15.205–19). Nevertheless, he persistently encourages the Achaians, and, when he sees the opportunity (e.g., when Zeus is somnolent after his love-making with HĒRĒ, 14.383–87), backs them more actively: 13.10–38, 43–75, 83–125, 206–38, 351–60, 676–78; 14.357–60). Sometimes he uses magic to this end (13.434–38, 562–63). He is careful, nervous, and cautious, especially when FATE is involved: at 20.290–308, for example, he is anxious to spare AINEIAS, whose destiny it is to secure Troy's future via "the line of Dardanos" (20.303), and—as APHRODĪTĒ does with PARIS—wafts him safely off the battlefield (20.318–40). Undecided about the gods fighting, he first keeps out of it (20.132–43) but has second thoughts until apparently dissuaded by APOLLO's scorn for fighting with mere mortals (21.436–60). How far this is, as often alleged, proof of his "prudence, circumspection and dignity" (Friedrich, HE 2: 688) is a matter for debate.

PRIAM Son of LAOMEDŌN, king of TROY, and married to HEKABĒ, by whom he has nineteen of his fifty offspring, including HEKTÖR, PARIS/ALĒXANDROS, DEĪPHOBOS, and KASSANDRĒ (Apollod. 3.12.5 = Frazer, J.G., 2: 44–47). He does not appear often in the Iliad, but leaves a strong impression whenever he does, not least because of his considerable age, which makes him the TROJAN equivalent of NESTÖR. He is a sensible, honorable man, as even his enemies MENELAÖS and ACHILLES concede (3.105–10, 20.179–83). He treats HELEN with kindness and sympathy (3.161–70), deploring the war, but blaming it on the gods rather than her (for which a convincing case could be made: see, e.g., JUDGMENT OF PARIS and PLAN OF ZEUS). When a peace treaty is concluded (soon to be broken by PANDAROS at ATHĒNĒ's urging, 4.93–140), it is Priam who swears to it for the TROJANS (3.250–302), but also, characteristically, is too tender-hearted to stay and watch his son Paris duel with Menelaös for Helen and her possessions (3.303–13).

It is in book 22 that Priam's quality as the embodiment of humanity and common sense fully emerges, when he desperately challenges Hektör's (equally desperate) upholding of the HEROIC, and essentially egotistical, rule of life: "always to be the best, pre-eminent over others" (6.208, 11.784). Hektōr remains outside the SKAIAN GATES, determined to face Achilles, when the rest of the Trojans have taken refuge inside the walls. Priam, very sensibly, and for good practical reasons, begs him to come in: he is Troy's best champion, a defensive campaign makes sense, his death would be an irreparable loss, and well might result in the horrors of defeat (22.33–76). But Hektōr stubbornly refuses to budge; his mother HEKABĒ's pleas on personal grounds likewise fail to move him. Even so, his inner reflections (22.90–130) are conditioned, not by practicalities, humanity, or common sense, but rather by his sense of heroic self-respect—what will his fellow warriors think if he acts otherwise than a HERO would? Yet, ironically, faced with the fearful Achilles, his nerve snaps, and he runs for it. His inevitable death at Achilles' hands follows.

Priam has now suffered the worst that this war can inflict on him. He, who could not bear to watch his errant son PARIS/ALÉXANDROS fight a duel, now sees his beloved Hektōr stripped and dragged in the dust behind his killer's chariot (22.395–409). He then gives voice to what will be the main theme of the Iliad's final book: his determination to confront the killer of his sons, to appeal to his humanity as a son himself (22.414–28). Yet even now it is ZEUS who (to the horror of Hekabē, 24.200–16) effectively sends Priam to the ACHAIAN ships and orders the hitherto unmovable Achilles to surrender Hektōr's body for ransom (24.64–186). So the stage is set—by the gods—for Priam's famous appeal to Achilles, when he kisses the murderous hands that have killed his sons (24.477–80) and the two finally share their mourning for what each has lost and recognize their common lot (24.485–512).

PYLOS In Homer, the extensive coastal kingdom of NESTŌR, son of Nēleus, in western Greece, stretching from the Gulf of Messēnia in the south northward through Triphylia as far as the natural boundary close to Olympia created by the ALPHEIOS river (9.153, 1.712). The size of this realm matches the large Pylian contingent (ninety vessels) listed in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.591–602). Whether the MYCENAEAN palace excavated by Navarino Bay in southern Messēnia (BA 58 B4) is the true site of Nestōr's capital city of Pylos (there were several cities of that name known in Greece) remains uncertain; it is certainly the best candidate for Pylos's Homeric epithet "sandy" (9.153, 295, etc.).

PYRRHOS See s.v. NEOPTOLEMOS.

RHADAMANTHYS In the Iliad (14.322) mentioned as the offspring of ZEUS and Eurōpa, and the brother of MĪNŌS. His name is pre-Greek, and his associations suggest a CRETAN origin. In the Odyssey (4.564) he is immortalized in the ELYSIAN FIELDS, and later tradition makes him a famous judge in the UNDERWORLD, together with MĪnōs and AIAKOS.

RHĒSOS See s.v. DOLŌNEIA.

SALAMIS Offshore island in the Saronic Gulf between Megara and ATHENS, the home OF AIAS (1) (2.557–58). This passage is of interest chiefly because of the number of ancient authors, including Aristotle, Plutarch, and Strabo, who allege that it was a forgery, inserted by the Athenians to support Solon's claim on the island as the property of Athens.

SARPĒDŌN The son of ZEUS and (in the Iliad) BELLEROPHŌN's daughter Laodameia (6.198–99), Sarpēdōn is, together with GLAUKOS, commander of the LYCIAN contingent allied with the TROJANS (2.876–77). He is one of the most outstanding warriors on the Trojan side: he kills Tlēpolemos, a son of HĒRAKLĒS (5.627–59); he upbraids HEKTŌR (5.471–92) for leaving the hard fighting to others; he leads one of the teams that assaults the ACHAIAANS' wall (12.101–4), and makes a breach in it (12.397–99). He and Glaukos (q.v.) have a famous discussion (12.310–28) about the rewards, and matching responsibilities, of an aristocratic HERO. Zeus, who cares greatly for Sarpēdōn, protects him in combat (5.662, 12.400–403), but is dissuaded by HĒRĒ (16.433–57) from overriding his predestined FATE, to be killed by PATROKLOS (16.462–505). However, he does have APOLLO step in (16.666–83) to rescue the corpse, clean and dress it, and hand it over to SLEEP and DEATH to be returned to Sarpēdōn's family home in Lycia for burial.

SEA PEOPLES, THE A still mysterious group of migratory and predominantly naval piratical raiders operating from the late thirteenth century until well past the collapse of Mycenaean civilization, with which they seem to have been closely connected. Names associated with them include Lycians, Philistines, and the possibly Cretan Danuna (? Danaāns): they were a force to be reckoned with, and only Ramesses III of Egypt seems to have managed to stand them off.

SIMOEIS One of the many streams flowing from IDA (12.20–22) into the TROJAN plain, where it joins the SKAMANDROS/XANTHOS (5.773–74). Personified during the latter's battle with ACHILLES (21.305–23).

SISYPHOS Son of Aiolos, and, like Autolykos, a famous trickster. In the Iliad he appears as part of GLAUKOS's ancestry, by way of BELLEROPHŌN (6.152–55); in the Odyssey we catch a glimpse of him in HĀDĒS, doing what he has become most famous for—laboriously pushing uphill a boulder that invariably rolls back down to the bottom, so that he has to start all over again (Od. 11.593–600), with one line (598) in Greek offering a notable example of onomatopoeia, echoing the boulder's bumping, clattering descent: autis epetla pedonde kyлиндeto láas anaidēs (“then again plainwards trundled the shameless boulder”). For a hilarious account of the misdeeds for which he was being punished, see Gantz 174.

SKAIAN GATES, THE Presumably the main entry into TROY; the Dardanian Gates (5.789, 22.194) are the only other gateway specifically mentioned in the Iliad. PRIAM leaves by the Skaian Gates to swear to the truce (3.261–63); HEKTŌR and ANDROMACHĒ meet there (6.390–97); a viewing point from the ramparts is close by (3.146–53), as is a landmark oak tree (9.354, 11.170). The struggle over PATROKLOS's corpse (18.453) takes place in front of the Skaian Gates, and it is here that Hektōr obstinately persists in fighting outside the walls (22.5–6) and, dying, predicts that ACHILLES will die in the same place (22.358–60, cf. Aethiopsis arg. 3 = West 2003 [A], 112–13).

SKAMANDROS /XANTHOS The chief river of the TROAD, flowing from the IDA range past TROY, where it joins the SIMOEIS, to the HELLESPONT, and “known to the gods as Xanthos, but as Skamandros by mortals” (20.74). The plain in its immediate vicinity forms the main battleground in the Iliad. It has sandy banks (5.36) and is fast-flowing (7.329) with deep eddies (21.124–25, 603, 22.148). The Skamandros is personified (as the nursing son of ZEUS, rather than, as with most rivers, of OCEAN) in book 21 (136–38), and given a voice to address both ACHILLES (214–21) and its fellow river the Simoeis (308–23). On the point of overwhelming Achilles (324–27), it is stopped by HĒPHAISTOS, who at HĒRĒ’s request so scorches its seething waters with napalm-like blazing fire (342–82) that it abandons the attack.

SLEEP (HYPNOS) The twin brother of DEATH (Thanatos: 14.231, 16.672, 682), and “lord over all gods and all mankind” (14.233). Hesiod (Tb. 212, 756–49) describes both gods as sons of Night and as “fearful deities”. In the Iliad, however, Sleep, unlike his brother (iron-hearted and pitiless, Hes. Tb. 764–66), is “soothing” (14.242, 354, 16.454). He features in two episodes: HĒRĒ bribes him to keep ZEUS unconscious while POSEIDŌN aids the ACHAIAANS (14.231–91), and APOLLO enlists the services of both Sleep and Death to convey the body of SARPĒDŌN (q.v.) back home to LYCIA. The first of these contains two intriguing items: Sleep reveals (14.242–62) that HĒrĒ had had him do something very similar before, which got him into deep trouble with Zeus; and, concealed in the top of a tree as a bird, he is apparently a voyeur during the al fresco divine coupling that HĒrĒ has carefully set up (14.284–91).

SPARTA Situated in Lakēdaimōn (2.581), the fertile region of the southern PELOPONNESE in the Eurōtas Valley between the north/south mountain ranges of Taygetos and Parnon, Sparta is the home of MENELAŌS (Od. 1.285–86, 4.1–19) and (in the Odyssey, with the TROJAN WAR over) of HELEN (4.120–305). Though archaeology has not revealed much from the MYCENAEAN era, there is a large Late Bronze Age building nearby, the so-called “Menelaion”, which could be the remains of a “palace”; nearby is a small shrine dedicated to Menelaos and Helen. More than at most sites, the mythic tradition at Sparta was reshaped, after the collapse of the Mycenaean kingdoms, by energetic DORIAN newcomers who described their advent as “the return of the sons of HĒRAKLĒS”.

SPERCHEIOS A river running eastward in the plain between PHTHIĒ (q.v.) and Mt. Oetē (Oeta), discharging into the Malian Gulf south of Lamia (BA 55 C3), the Spercheios was especially dear to ACHILLES as part of his own domain.

STRIFE (ERIS) In the Iliad, this personified abstract force is associated with the business of urging on (or, alternatively, scaring) troops in battle (4.439–45, 5.518, 11.3–14, 73; 18.535, 20.48). But Strife is best known (though not in Homer) for appearing, uninvited, at the wedding of PĒLEUS and THETIS, Cypria arg. 1 =

West 2003 (A), where she stirs up the dispute on beauty between HĒRĒ, ATHĒNĒ, and APHRODĪTĒ that is resolved by the calamitous JUDGMENT OF PARIS (q.v., and cf. Gantz 9–10).

STYX The most famous of the rivers connected with the UNDERWORLD (8.367–69, 14.271, Od. 10. 513–14) and invoked as the most powerful oath sworn to by the gods (2.755, 15.37–38, Od. 5.185). Unlike later writers who place the Styx in ARCADIA, Homer apparently (2.751–55) located it in THESSALY. Critics such as Kirk, 1: 236–37, offer no convincing explanation for the discrepancy.

TALTHYBIOS See s.v. HERALDS

TARTAROS An underworld realm even lower than HĀDĒS (8.13–16, 477–81) where the TITANS endure imprisonment (14.277–79): used by ZEUS as a threat to the recalcitrant. Cf. Hes. Th. 711–33.

TELAMŌN As Gantz (221) rightly points out, “Homer speaks of Telamon only as the father of Aias and Teukros, never as the son of anyone”: understandably, because his lineage is confused and much debated. What seems probable is that he was a son of AIAKOS and brother to PĒLEUS; whether originally he was a native of AIGINA (see s.v. AIAKOS) or of SALAMIS (2.557, 7.199, cf. 2.562: see Gantz 222) is far less certain. He fathers TEUKROS by Hēsionē (daughter of LAOMEDŌN), won as a prize at HĒRAKLĒS’ sack of Troy.

TEUKROS Son of TELAMŌN and his captive prize Hēsionē, and thus, though a half-brother of AIAS (1), illegitimate (8.284). Though he can use a spear or sword if needs be (6.31, 13.170–84, 14.515, 15.463–83), he is primarily a highly skilled archer (8.266–70, 273–334; 12.350, 387–400; 13.313–14), who only loses at the funeral games for Patroklos (23.859–83) through forgetting to sacrifice in advance to APOLLO: at the post-Iliadic games for ACHILLES (Aethiopis arg. 4 = West 2003 [A], 112–23), he is the victor. He operates in close cooperation with Aias (1), using the latter’s great, tower-like shield as an observation post, from which he makes brief sorties to pick off his targets, quickly scurrying back (like a child fleeing to its mother, Homer remarks): 8. 266–72. ZEUS’s refusal to let him bring down a leader, either SARPĒDŌN (12.400–403) or HEKTŌR (15.458–70: he snaps Teukros’s bowstring) may have been dictated to the epic tradition by the requirements of FATE; but I suspect that the archer’s bastardy, together with the idea of the bow as not quite a gentlemanly weapon, may also have been meant as factors contributing to the god’s decision.

THEBAN WAR, THE The conflict (earlier than the TROJAN WAR) begun by OIDIPOUS (OEDIPUS) cursing his two sons Eteoklēs and Polyneikēs. This led to the latter’s removal to ARGOS, and returning to attack THĒBĒ (1) (Thebes) with six other leaders (the “Seven Against Thebes”), including Adrēstos, king of Argos, the seer Amphiaraōs, and Tydeus the father of DIOMĒDĒS, who earned notoriety by eating the brains of an enemy from his split skull while dying: Thebaid fr. 9 = West 2003 (A). Adrēstos is the only survivor of this bitter, long-drawn-out war. The city finally falls to the sons of the Seven, the Epigoni (“Successors”), which is sometimes used to explain the absence of Thēbē (1) from the BOIŌTIAN contingent in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS. Described by Homer (authorship often queried) in two lost epics, the Thēbaïd and the Epigonoï, each said to have been seven thousand lines long, brief fragments of which are reproduced in West 2003 (A), 42–59.

THĒBĒ/AI (1) This is the famous Thēbē (Thebes) on the BOIŌTIAN plain, associated with a whole group of early quasi-historical myths and characters: Kadmos, Semelē, Laïos, Oidipous (Oedipus: Od. 11.271–80, Il. 23.679–80), Polyneikēs, Eteoklēs, the expedition of the Seven Against Thebes, Antigōnē, Amphiarāos (Od. 15.244–47), and Teirēsias (see Ganz, ch. 14, 467–530). Homer knows about this mythical background, but refers to the city only indirectly. It has a “fair crown of walls,” which are “sacred” (4.378, 19.99), and is “seven-gated” (Il. 4.406; Od. 11.262–65). Its inhabitants are Kadmeians (5.804, 10.286–88), and it was founded by Amphiōn and Zēthos (Od. 11.262–65). Excavation has revealed a comparable site, which by the MYCENAEAN (Late Bronze Age) era was the palatial equal of MYKĒNAI (MYCENAE). The absence of Thēbē (1) from the BOIŌTIAN contingent in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.494–510) remains a puzzle.

THĒBĒ/AI (2) Known as CILICIAN Thēbē (Thebes), not because of its location (in the wooded foothills of Mt. Plakos, part of the IDA range in the TROAD) but through being inhabited by Cilicians (6.396–97). It features in the Iliad as the home of ANDROMACHĒ (q.v.), before she was married to HEKTŌR: she reminds him (6.414–28, cf. Cypria fr. 24 = West 2003 [A], 100–103) of how ACHILLES sacked it, killing her father, King Ētīōn, and all her brothers.

THĒBĒ/AI (3) This is Egyptian Thēbē/Thebes, modern Luxor, to which Homer refers twice only (Il. 9.381–84; Od. 4.126–27), on both occasions simply to give an example of vast wealth, a hint of how vague Greek knowledge of Egypt still was prior to c. 750 B.C.E.

THEMIS Daughter of Gaia (Earth) and Ouranos (Sky: Hes. Th. 135), and thus a TITAN. Appears only twice in the Iliad, both times as a minor goddess on OLYMPOS: once greeting and comforting HĒRĒ (15.87–91), once (like IRIS) acting as a messenger for ZEUS, calling the gods to assembly (20.4–6). There is no hint of her primary role as a goddess of law, justice, and right thinking and behavior—much less of the fact that she had been Zeus’s second wife (Hērē was only his seventh), on whom he sired a whole string of personified abstractions: Good Order, Justice, Peace, the Seasons, and the three Fates, Klōthō, Lachesis, and Atropos (Hes. Th. 901–6).

THERSĪTĒS One of the most intriguing characters in the Iliad, though his appearance is limited to one scene in book 2 (211–77), immediately after ODYSSEUS has, with difficulty, checked the rush to the ships triggered by AGAMEMNŌN’s foolhardy “test” of the troops’ spirit. A quintessential barrack-room lawyer (seventy years ago a teacher of mine described him as “insubordination personified”), he is here attacking, not his favorite targets, Odysseus and ACHILLES, but Agamemnōn—and, indeed, borrowing Achilles’ own main point against him, his greed for booty, from book 1 (149–71). It is easy to see why his rant has so often been attributed to class warfare: he sums up the Greek aristocrat's stereotypical view of the lower classes as, by definition, not only poor, but mean, cowardly, ignorant, vulgar, and ugly. Thersitēs' deformities, lovingly catalogued (2.216–19), are the first thing we learn about him. Nor is it any accident that his appearance is immediately preceded by Odysseus's demonstration of the niceties of social and military status: aristocrats and officers are reasoned with politely (2.188–97), but other ranks (2.198–206) are treated like dirt, beaten, and told to shut up and listen to their betters. In due course Odysseus hands out precisely this last treatment—beating included—to Thersitēs (2.243–75), and “[s]orry for him or not, the troops still found him comic” (270). The social order has not only been maintained but is endorsed from the bottom.

THESSALY The great central plain of northern Greece, south of Macedonia, surrounded by mountain ranges—OLYMPUS, Ossa, PĒLION, Othrys, and Pindos—and with its main access to the sea from the Gulf of Pagasai, modern Volos, an area famous as the departure point of the Argonauts, with many MYCENAEAN remains. Homer never mentions it by name, and is mainly concerned with its small south-eastern regions of PHTHIĒ and HELLAS, in connection with ACHILLES, PĒLEUS, and the MYRMIDONS. A number of Thessalian towns, mostly now identified, are listed in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.681–759).

THETIS A more than usually privileged sea NYMPH, daughter of Nēreus, the Old Man of the Sea; married to (but mostly separate from) PĒLEUS (q.v. for details of, and the reason for, her engagement and forced wedding to a mortal); living in the depths of the sea with her fellow NĒREĪDS; and—most important by far for the Iliad—the mother of ACHILLES. As such, she is the only nymph who can come calling on OLYMPUS, let alone as, to HĒRĒ's great annoyance and suspicion (1.517–21, 536–43), ZEUS's one-time object of desire and current favorite and confidante. Not only that: as her son reminds her (1.396–406), she played a key role in saving Zeus during his generational war with his father KRONOS. Zeus owes her a big favor; and Achilles' getting Thetis to extract a promise from him to favor the TROJANS for so long as FATE permits, thus punishing AGAMEMNŌN for the insult Achilles has suffered at his hands, shapes the whole subsequent course of the Iliad.

One consequence of Thetis's marrying a mortal is that their child is mortal too (despite several attempts by Thetis—e.g., by fire and dipping in the Styx—to make Achilles immortal, of which Homer says nothing). Since he is fated to choose either a short and glorious life or a long one at home without the glory (as Thetis reminds him at 9.410–16), there is no real doubt as to which it will be. Indeed, Thetis is a striking early version of the mater dolorosa: her mourning for her son begins even before his actual death (18.52–64). Once PATROKLOS is dead, ACHILLES will kill HEKTŌR in revenge; and as Thetis well knows (18.88–96) her son's death is fated to follow close after Hektōr's. Immortal though she is, she cannot save him, even with HĒPHAISTOS's marvelous armor; she can only commemorate him (Slatkin, HE 3: 873, is very perceptive on this). It is not until the end of the Odyssey, in HĀDĒS (24.35–94), that we finally get closure, when the shade of AGAMEMNŌN recounts Achilles' funeral, with Thetis, silver-footed and immortal, leading MUSES and Nēreids in the dirges, providing elegant gifts (including Achilles' armor) at the funeral games, and finally committing her son's ashes, mingled with those of Patroklos, to a golden urn—or, in an alternative version (Aethiopis arg. 4 = West 2003 [A], 112–13) snatching his body from the pyre and conveying it to the White Island (Leukē), in fact located at the mouth of the Danube, but in mythic tradition a kind of foreshadowing of Avalon.

TIRYNS A MYCENAEAN citadel situated on a rocky eminence in the ARGIVE plain: mentioned by Homer only once, as part of DIOMĒDĒS' domain in the CATALOGUE OF SHIPS (2.559) where it is described as “high-walled”: its great “Cyclopean” battlements still survive.

TITANS The pre-OLYMPIAN generation of gods, twelve in number, offspring of Gaia (Earth) and Ouranos (Sky, Heaven), of whom the best-known is KRONOS (q.v.), overcome by his son ZEUS in the great mythical battle described in detail by Hesiod (Tb. 664–735), known as the “Titanomachy”. As so often, Homer knows this myth well, but refers to it only obliquely. We learn how THETIS helped Zeus during the conflict (1.396–406), and there are several references (8.477–81, 14.274) to the imprisonment of the defeated Titans in TARTAROS (q.v.). Some surviving Titans, e.g., OCEAN and THEMIS, are mentioned without identification as such.

TROAD, THE The northwestern massif of Asia Minor (BAE-F 1–2), largely mountainous (culminating in the IDA range in the south) but with an extensive coastal strip fronting successively on the Gulf of Adramyttion, the AEGEAN, the HELLESPONT, and the Propontis. On this coastal strip all the region's important cities are situated, TROY—near the Aegean entrance to the Hellespont—included.

TROJAN CATALOGUE, THE The record (2.816–77) of the TROJANS and those allied with them: it does not include the allies' ships and is far shorter and more perfunctory than the lengthy CATALOGUE OF SHIPS provided for the ACHA- IANS. Its historical accuracy is dubious: it is probably most reliable, outside TROY and the TROAD, for LYCIA. As Rutherford suggests in an excellent up-to-date survey (HE 3: 890–92), its version of Bronze Age geography is very hit-and-miss. Interestingly, it carefully omits those places ACHILLES is reported as having already sacked, e.g., Lyrnessos and THĒBĒ (2) (2.691).

TROJAN WAR, THE “It is generally assumed that some residue of historical truth persists in the legends concerning the Trojan War, although how much and where is uncertain,” the *OCD*³ pronounced in 2003 (1557). Since then the problem has become even more knotty. The understandable popularity of Troy VIIh as the scene of such a war (c. 1250; a city of undiminished greatness until its end) has been undercut by the recent excavations of Manfred Korfmann, which demonstrated, not only an unbroken continuity between Troy VI and Troy VII, but the hitherto unknown existence of a large outer suburb extending outside the walls.

What would this do to the Greek tradition of total destruction? But alternatively, if we choose the later (revised) date of Troy VIIa's end as c. 1180, then the war postdates the collapse of MYCENAEAN palace culture, which, again, would come into direct conflict with the epic tradition. Nor does what has been termed the "Anatolization" of the problem espoused by Latacz 2004 (see 283–87 for a succinct summary) help. While the identifications of Wilusa with Ilion/Troy, and of the kingdom of AHHIYAWA with an ACHAIAN federation, are both plausible to the point of near-certainty, unfortunately, as Finkelberg reports (HE 3: 894), the relevant Hittite texts have been convincingly backdated a century and a half, so that no reference to Wilusa can predate c. 1230. While this fits admirably with the MYCENAEAN dating of the war to Troy VI and the mid-thirteenth century, it is incompatible with the now fashionable late date of c. 1180. (Also, by treating the war as largely an internal Anatolian affair, it severely undercuts the notion of a vast Achaian naval expedition.)

What conclusions can we draw from all this? It remains true that a date in the mid-to-late thirteenth century, say between 1250 and 1230, while the Mycenaean palace culture was still in existence, is a sine qua non for the epic tradition, and fits admirably with the new dating of the Hittite documents. The prevalence of the late dating owes a lot to the mistaken assumption that the LINEAR B (q.v.) documentation ruled out the society predicated in the Iliad, whereas in fact it confirmed it by adding a dimension familiar to medievalists: the lettered scribes who got on with the routine business of existence while their illiterate aristocratic superiors pursued glory according to a strict HEROIC code, exchanged gifts and genealogies, and enjoyed guest-friendships. For this, the Mycenaean palace society would form a natural background: anything after the collapse of that culture would not. As for the archaeological evidence, total destruction is both harder and much rarer than is often supposed. The survival of a site does not preclude the total destruction of the culture that had previously occupied it: TIRYNS offers a good case in point. There is still a case to be made for the epic tradition going back to, and in many ways reflecting, Bronze Age Mycenaean society, and the disasters that brought its HEROIC AGE to a close.

TROY, TROJANS From the viewpoint of the Homeric epics, the Iliad in particular, there is nothing problematic about the city of Troy, often given its alternative name of ILION, or the Trojans who inhabited it. Troy is a wealthy city in the TROAD, its famous walls built by POSEIDŌN and APOLLO (7.451–53, 21.441–60), and still ruled in the Iliad by the dynasty descended from DARDANOS (a son of Zeus) and the eponymous Trōs's sons Īlos and Assarakos, PRIAM being the current king in Īlos's line of descent, and AINEIAS the frustrated claimant (13.460–61) in that of Assarakos. This distinction is reflected in the TROJAN CATALOGUE (2.816–23), where the Trojans are led by Priam's son HEKTŌR, while Aineias is in command of the Dardanians, domiciled in the foothills of IDA (20.216–18).

How does this scene stand up in the light of the latest research? Fairly well, in fact. Nowadays (see Kelly, HE 3: 895–96) there is no real problem in identifying Homer's citizens of Troy or Ilion with the inhabitants of Taruisa or Wilus(iy)a, and the Dardany appear in thirteenth-century Egyptian inscriptions; there is even a thirteenth-century ruler of Wilus(iy)a called Alaksandu, whom it is very tempting to identify either with PARIS/ALÉXANDROS himself or else with a homonymous relative. As for Homeric Troy itself, its identity with the much-excavated site of Hisarlik, though never formally proven (and in light of the ongoing debate between the respective proponents of an early and a late date for the TROJAN WAR, very probably unprovable) remains highly likely: it is by far the most important Bronze Age site of the whole region. If this was not Homer's Troy, what else, of comparable importance, could it have been?

UNDERWORLD, THE See s.v. HĀDĒS.

WOODEN HORSE, THE: The famous episode of the Wooden Horse—created by an ACHAEAN, Epeios (Od. 11.523), in the tenth year of the war, filled with an attack group of chosen warriors, and left behind for the TROJANS to consider—trap or offering to the gods?—while the main Greek expeditionary force hides out at the nearby island of Tenedos—goes back to earliest times, both iconically and in literature. Yet there is not a word about it in the Iliad, though it is the ruse that finally brings about the defeat and sack of TROY. On the other hand it is referred to several times in the Odyssey. MENELAÖS mischievously reminds his wife, HELEN, of how she tried, by imitating the voices of their wives, to make the warriors she was sure were hidden inside betray their presence by crying out (Od. 4.271–89). ODYSSEUS—himself the leader of the commando group (Od. 8.494–95, 11.524–25)—persuades the bard Dēmodokos to sing of the episode (Od. 8.492–515), and when visiting the dead, he recalls how cool the young NEOPTOLEMOS was inside the Horse (11.523–32). It is an integral element in the Trojan epic.

Yet the full narrative—including how, after heated argument, pro and con, the Trojans finally decide that it's a sacred object, to be dedicated to ATHĒNĒ, and haul it into the city, even breaking down part of the wall to do so—is only found, among the earliest sources, in the arguments and fragments of the Little Iliad (arg. 4–5, fr. 12 = West 2003 [A], 122–25, 132–33) and the Sack of Ilion (arg. 1–2, fr. 1 = West 2003 [A], 144–47). The number of warriors varies, from thirteen to fifty. The Horse itself is huge: 100 (or 130) feet long, 30 (or 50) feet wide, with movable tail, knees, and eyes. The advance party opens the gates to the main force, which meanwhile has returned from Tenedos under cover of darkness. The Trojans, who have been celebrating their apparent deliverance, are sleeping off their potations. The sack begins.

What nobody has decided, from antiquity to the present, is what, in origin, if it ever existed, the Wooden Horse really was. One of the earliest suppositions was a horse-headed battering-ram. More recently (1950) Fritz Schachermeyr thought it symbolized the destruction of Troy by earthquake, since the earthquake god POSEIDŌN was also the god of horses. Nobody, except the builders of modern Wooden Horses to attract tourists, seems happy with the idea that it might have been conceived exactly as what our ancient sources claim it was: a large siege engine decked out in the semblance of a horse, with a barrel body capable of holding a score or more commandos. In this connection Anderson (HE 3: 941) notes, interestingly, that the two earliest known representations (c. 700–650 B.C.E.) are both shown equipped with wheels.

XANTHOS See s.v. SKAMANDROS.

ZEUS For a modern reader coming to Homer for the first time, the nature of the OLYMPIAN gods, and their relationship to mortals, constitutes perhaps the largest stumbling block. Where, ask the uninitiated, is any recognizable morality? The problem is not new. As early as the sixth century B.C.E. the philosopher Xenophanes of Kolophōn in Ionia was complaining that the gods of Homer and Hesiod were guilty of all the worst human faults, including theft, adultery, and mutual deceit. New readers are often astonished by the solipsistic pettiness, as they see it, of so much divine motivation: not least the reason of POSEIDŌN (resentment at being bilked, see s.v. LAOMEDŌN) or HĒRĒ and ATHĒNĒ (sexual jealousy, see s.v. JUDGMENT OF PARIS) for their persistent and intense opposition to the TROJANS during this ten-year war. These gods are the immortal easy livers; they quarrel peevishly among themselves like the members of any privileged extended family who don't have to work for a living; and the only limitations on their actions (over and above what they can get away with for their own selfish ends) are provided by the quasi-deterministic rulings of FATE and the superior power and authority of Zeus, the original Indo-European divine patriarch. The ultimate winner in this divine world is not virtue but strength.

The degree to which mortal actions in the Iliad are dictated by what seem arbitrary, and always personal, decisions by Zeus, in counterpoint to the equally arbitrary, and inscrutable, requirements of Fate (mostly in the matter of human destinies) can be judged by a careful study of the PLAN OF ZEUS (q.v.), from which it becomes clear (i) that both the THEBAN and the TROJAN WARS were deliberately started by Zeus in order to reduce overpopulation and end the HEROIC AGE; (ii) that both the Judgment of Paris and the forced marriage of THETIS to PĒLEUS that produced ACHILLES were part of the mechanism involved; and (iii) that despite Zeus's various ploys during the Trojan War (e.g., his promise to Thetis that he will honor Achilles by giving AGAMEMNŌN and the ACHAIANS a hard time of it) the ultimate outcome—the destruction of Troy, the deaths of Achilles and HEKTŌR—is predestined. How far this is to be accomplished by the fiat of Zeus, and how far by the inexorabilities of Fate, is never made quite clear.

Nor, indeed, are the relative powers of Zeus and Fate ever put to a decisive test. A nice case is the (long fated) death in battle, at the hands of PATROKLOS, of Zeus's son SARPĒDŌN (16.431–61). Zeus considers saving him: this brings an instant response from HĒRĒ, who says, in effect: Override fate, and we other gods will take it very badly! Besides, do it once and the habit'll catch on: we'll have every god saving his own son in this war! Zeus, without arguing the point, agrees, and merely honors the dead Sarpēdōn with a shower of bloody rain, after which SLEEP and DEATH (qq.v.) are commissioned to return the corpse to LYCIA. Zeus's own implication here is that while he has the power to override Fate, he chooses not to exercise it. Centuries of counterarguments between the respective advocates of determinism and divine power suggest that Homer made him choose wisely.

Otherwise the Zeus of the Iliad behaves very much as a MYCENAEAN wanax (lord, prince) might be expected to if granted immortality and supreme authority. He also exercises his nature as a traditional weather god: he is the cloud gatherer, he sends rain, he hurls a nifty, and accurate, thunderbolt. It is his patronage that gives power to chosen princes and warriors on earth, who are “Zeus’s nurslings” (1.176, 2.660, and often). He never tires of reminding his large and obstreperous divine family of the horrendous punishments that result from opposing him (e.g., 15.18–24); this does not stop them from regularly doing so whenever they have the chance, most notably Hērē (14.153–353) and POSEIDŌN (13.10–38, 59–79, 206–39). Despite Zeus’s constant interference in human affairs, it is a striking fact (Strauss Clay HE 3: 953) that in the Iliad, alone among the Olympians, he has no direct dealing with mortals—despite his Leporello’s catalogue of earlier sexual conquests (14.313–28)—but always sends a messenger. The most notable instance, of course, is his brief, and angry, command to Achilles, via Thetis, to release HEKTŌR’s abused body for ransom (24.134–40). Achilles, hitherto obstinate to a degree, instantly bows to higher authority. One sometimes wishes that Zeus had issued a few other similar orders rather earlier in the epic; but that would have once more raised the always delicate problem of overriding Fate. The hard lessons in humanity that Achilles learns are still framed in a relentless pattern that was fixed before his birth.

Select Bibliography

NOTE: Basic texts apart, these titles, mostly in English, are chosen for beginners, the especially useful ones marked with an asterisk (*). Their bibliographies lead to further reading. A few advanced studies of particular value are also included, identified by a dagger (†).

My translation was made, basically, from Monro and Allen, together with regular consultation of van Thiel, West (1998-2000), and A.T. Murray in Wyatt's revised edition.

- Alexander, C. The War That Killed Achilles. London, 2010.
- Austin, N. Helen of Troy and Her Shameless Phantom. Ithaca, NY, 2008.
- *Barker, E., and J. Christensen. Homer: A Beginner's Guide. London, 2013.
- Blondell, R. Helen of Troy: Beauty, Myth, Devastation. Oxford, 2013.
- Burgess, J. S. The Tradition of the Trojan War in Homer and the Epic Cycle. Baltimore, 2001.
- . The Death and Afterlife of Achilles. Baltimore, 2009.
- Casson, L. Ships and Seamananship in the Ancient World. Princeton, NJ, 1971.
- *Cline, E. H. The Trojan War: A Very Short Introduction. Oxford, 2013.
- . 1177 BC: The Year Civilization Collapsed. Princeton, NJ, 2014.
- Dalby, A. Rediscovering Homer: Inside the Origins of the Epic. New York, 2006.
- Day Lewis, C., trans. The Aeneid of Virgil. 1952. Garden City, NY, 1953.
- Edwards, M. W. Homer: Poet of the Iliad. Baltimore, 1987.
- †———. The Iliad: A Commentary. Volume 5: Books 17–20. Cambridge, 1991.
- Finkelberg, M. Greeks and Pre-Greeks: Aegean Prehistory and Greek Heroic Tradition. Cambridge, 2005.
- *———, ed. The Homer Encyclopedia. 3 vols. Oxford, 2011. Cited as HE.
- Foley, J. M., ed. A Companion to Ancient Epic. Oxford, 2005.
- *Fowler, R., ed. The Cambridge Companion to Homer. Cambridge, 2004.
- French, E. Mycenae: Agamemnon's Capital. Oxford, 2002.
- Frazer, J. G. Apollodorus: The Library. 2 vols. Cambridge, MA, 1921.
- Frazer, R. M., Jr. trans. and ed. The Trojan War: The Chronicles of Dictys of Crete and Dares the Phrygian. 1966. Bloomington, IN, 1990.

- *Gantz, T. Early Greek Myth: A Guide to Literary and Artistic Sources. Baltimore, 1993.
- Graziosi, B. Inventing Homer: The Early Reception of Epic. Cambridge, 2002.
- . Introduction and Notes (ix–xxviii, 410–50) to The Iliad, trans. A. Verity, ed. B. Graziosi. Oxford, 2011.
- *Griffin, J. Homer on Life and Death. Oxford, 1980.
- †Hainsworth, B., ed. The Iliad: A Commentary. Volume 3: Books 9–12. Cambridge, 1993.
- Hammer, D. The Iliad as Politics. Norman, OK, 2002.
- Heath, M. ed. and trans. Aristotle: Poetics. Harmondsworth, UK, 1996.
- *HE: see Finkelberg above.
- Hughes, B. Helen of Troy. New York, 2005.
- †Janko, R. The Iliad: A Commentary. Volume 4: Books 13–16. Cambridge, 1992.
- Kahane, A. Homer: A Guide for the Perplexed. London, 2012.
- †Kirk, G., ed. The Iliad: A Commentary. Volume 1: Books 1–4. Cambridge, 1985.
- . The Iliad: A Commentary. Volume 2: Books 5–8. Cambridge, 1990.
- *Latacz, J. Homer: His Art and His World. Translated by J. P. Holoka. Ann Arbor, MI, 1998.
- . Troy and Homer: Towards a Solution of an Old Mystery. Translated by K. Windle and R. Ireland. Oxford, 2004.
- Lattimore, R., trans. The Iliad of Homer. Rev. ed. Edited and introduced by Richard Martin. Chicago, 2011.
- †Leaf, W., ed. The Iliad. 2 vols. London, 1886.
- Leigh Fermor, P. Mani: Travels in the Southern Peloponnese. London, 1958. New York, 2006.
- Lynn-George, M. Epos: Word, Narrative and the Iliad. Atlantic Highlands, NJ, 1988.
- Mackie, H. Talking Trojan: Speech and Community in the Iliad. Lanham, MD, 1996.
- Martin, R. The Language of Heroes: Speech and Performance in the Iliad. Ithaca, NY, 1989.
- *———. Introduction to The Iliad of Homer, trans. R. Lattimore, 1–65. Chicago, 2011.
- Mitchell, S., ed. and trans. Homer: The Iliad. New York, 2011.
- Monro D. B., and Allen, T. W., eds. Homeri Opera. 3rd ed. 2 vols. Oxford, 1920.
- Most, G. W., ed. Hesiod. Vol. 1: Theogony, Works and Days, Testimonia. Vol. 2: The Shield, Catalogue of Women, Other Fragments. Cambridge, MA, 2006–7.
- *Murray, A. T., trans. Homer: Iliad. 1924. 2 vols. 2nd ed., rev. William F. Wyatt. Cambridge, MA, 1999.
- Murray, G. The Rise of the Greek Epic. 4th ed. Oxford, 1934.
- Myrsiades, K., ed. Reading Homer: Film and Text. Madison, NJ, 2009.
- Nagy, G. The Best of the Achaeans. 1979. 2nd ed. Baltimore, 1999.
- . Homer's Text and Language. Urbana, IL, 2004.
- Osborne, R. Greece in the Making, 1200–479 BC. London, 1996.

- *† Onians, R. B. The Origins of European Thought About the Body, the Mind, the Soul, the World, Time and Fate. 1951. 2nd ed. Cambridge, 1954.
The Oxford Classical Dictionary. 3rd ed. rev. Edited by S. Hornblower and A. Spawforth. Oxford, 2003. Cited as *OCD*³.
The Oxford Classical Dictionary. 4th ed. Edited by S. Hornblower, A. Spawforth, and E. Eidinow. Oxford, 2012. Cited as *OCD*⁴.
- * Powell, B. B. Homer and the Origin of the Greek Alphabet. Cambridge, 1996.
 ———. Homer. 2nd ed. Oxford, 2007.
- Pulleyn, S., ed. and trans. Homer Iliad I. Oxford, 2000.
- Radice, W. The Translator's Art: Essays in Honour of Betty Radice. Edited by B. Reynolds. New York, 1987.
- Redfield, J. Nature and Culture in the Iliad: The Tragedy of Hector. Chicago, 1975.
 Expanded ed. Durham, NC, 1994.
- † Richardson, N. The Iliad: A Commentary. Volume 6: Books 21–24. Cambridge, 1993.
- Schachermeyer, F. Poseidon und die Entstehung des griechischen Götterglaubens. Munich, 1950.
- Schein, S. The Mortal Hero: An Introduction to Homer's Iliad. Berkeley, 1984.
- Scodel, R. Listening to Homer. 2002. 2nd ed. Ann Arbor, MI, 2009.
- Scott, W. C. The Artistry of the Homeric Simile. Hanover, NH, 2009.
- Seferis, G. Collected Poems, 1924–1955. Translated, edited, and introduced by Edmund Keeley and Philip Sherrard. Supplemented ed. Princeton, NJ, 1969.
- Shay, J. Achilles in Vietnam: Combat Trauma and the Undoing of Character. New York, 1995.
- Slatkin, L. M. The Power of Thetis: Allusion and Interpretation in the Iliad. Berkeley, 1991.
- Stanford, W. B. The Ulysses Theme: A Study in the Adaptability of a Traditional Hero. Oxford, 1954.
- Steiner, G., ed. Homer in English. Harmondsworth, UK, 1996.
- * Strauss, B. The Trojan War: A New History. New York, 2006.
- Talbert, R. J. A. Barrington Atlas of the Greek and Roman World. Princeton, NJ, 2000. Cited as BA.
- Taplin, O. Homeric Soundings: The Shaping of the Iliad. Oxford, 1992.
- Thiel, Helmut van. Homeric Ilias. Hildensheim, 1996.
- Thomas, C. G., and C. Conant. The Trojan War. Westport, CT, 2005.
- * Vermeule, E. Aspects of Death in Early Greek Art and Poetry. Berkeley, 1979, 1981.
- Vivante, P. The Epithets in Homer: A Study in Poetic Values. New Haven, CT, 1982.
- * Wees, H. van. Status Warriors: War, Violence and Society in Homer and History. Amsterdam, 1992.
- Weil, S. The Iliad, or, The Poem of Force. Translated by M. McCarthy. Wallingford, PA, 1956.
- West, M. L. Homeric Ilias. Stuttgart/Leipzig, 1998–2000.
- †* ———. Greek Epic Fragments from the Seventh to the Fifth Centuries BC. Loeb Classical Library, Cambridge, MA 2003 (A).

- . Homeric Hymns, Homeric Apocrypha, Lives of Homer. Loeb Classical Library, Cambridge, MA, 2003 (B).
- *†———. The Making of the Iliad: Disquisition and Analytical Commentary. Oxford, 2011.
- . The Epic Cycle: A Commentary on the Lost Troy Epics. Oxford, 2013.
- *Whitman, C. H. Homer and the Heroic Tradition. Cambridge, 1958.
- Willcock, M. A Companion to the Iliad. Based on the translation by Richmond Lattimore. Chicago, 1976.
- Wolf, F. A. Prolegomena to Homer. 1795. Translated with introduction and notes by Anthony Grafton, Glenn W. Most, and James E. G. Zetzel. Princeton, NJ, 1985.
- Wood, M. In Search of the Trojan War. 1985. 2nd ed. Berkeley, 1996.

Index

NOTE

Some major entries consist of two sections: the first of events in order of occurrence, the second an alphabetically ordered selection of topics.

LOCATOR FORMATS AND SEQUENCE

Map: lowercase roman numerals, e.g., xiimap

Introduction: italic typeface

Translation: plain typeface in book/line format, e.g., 1.111

Synopsis: italic typeface

Glossary: bold typeface

Abantēs, 2.536–45; 4.464; 505

Abarbarea, 6.21–22, 25–26

Abydos, 2.836; 4.500; 17.584

Achaia, Achaians, 3; 2.684; 505; Ahhiyawa as Hittite term, 14; 505, 535, 552

Achelōios river, Akarnania, 21.194; 505

Achelōios river, Asia Minor, 24.616&n9; 505

Achilles, 505–6; wrath as theme of poem, 2; 1.1–7; 463; 505; seeks cause of plague, 1.53–67, 74–91; quarrel with Agamemnōn, 1–2; 1.101–305, 365–95; 16.52–59; 463; wish for Zeus to favor Trojans, 1.348–427; 463–64; withdraws from action, 2; 1.488–92; 2.686–94, 769–79; 4.512–13; 7.228–30; 464; and duel between Paris and Menelaös, 3.314–17; Zeus grants wish to favor Trojans, 8.370–72; 550; receives embassy, 2; 9.162–657; rejects Agamemnōn's offer of restitution, 9.307–429, 606–55, 670–713; 473–74; sends Patroklos to Nestōr, 11.599–617; 477; allows Patroklos to go into battle in his armor, 11.798–803; 15.401–4; 16.1–100, 124–29, 220–56; 485; 541; Patroklos pursues Trojans against his wishes, 16.83–96, 686–87; 17.401–11; 486, 488; 541; hears of Patroklos's death, 18.1–147; 490; decides on action, 18.88–126; 490; appears, panics Trojans, 18.166–238; 490; mourns for Patroklos, 18.234–35, 316–47; 19.4–6; 490, 491, 492; 541; new armor from Hēphaistos, 18.469–617; 19.1–23, 364–86; 490, 491–92, 493; 525; reconciled with Agamemnōn, 19.33–35, 40–281; 492; prepares to fight, 19.206–14, 303–8, 315–20, 364–91; 491–92, 493; goes into battle, 20.44–46, 75–503; 21.1–8; 493, 494; fights Aineias, 20.79–350; 494; fights Hektōr until gods intervene, 20.419–54; 494; battle in Xanthos river, 2.860–61, 874–75; 21.17–226; 494–95; 547; fights river, 21.227–382; 495–96; pursues Trojans, 21.520–605; 22.7–20; 497; pursues and kills Hektōr, 22.21–32, 131–366; 497, 498; 524, (gods' involvement), 22.166–87, 208–47,

Achilles (continued)

276–77, 293–305; 498; abuses Hektör's corpse, 2; 22.337–60, 367–69, 376, 395–405; 23.24–26, 182–83; 499; 506; mourns for Patroklos, 22.385–90; 23.4–23, 38–47, 108–10, 136–37, 140–53, 218–25; 24.3–13, 39–54; 499, 501; Patroklos's ghost visits, 23.59–107; 499; and Patroklos's funeral, 21.26–32; 23.35–53, 218–25, 235–48; 495; and funeral games, 23.257–73, 534–62, 651–63, 700–707, 733–37, 740–53, 791–97, 826–35, 850–58, 884–97; 499–500, 501; drags Hektör's body round burial mound, 2; 24.14–22, 50–52, 416–17, 755–56; 501, 504; 506; Zeus orders to ransom Hektör's body, 2; 24.64–92, 103–19, 133–40; 501–2; 506, 542, 543–44, 555; meets Priam, ransoms body, 2, 8*n*; 24.469–676; 502–3; 506, 545; later battles, 4; death, 4; 24.259–60; 498; 506, 540; funeral rites, 5, 6; 23.235–48; 499

———. Aiakos's grandson, 2.860–5; Alexander the Great lays wreath on tomb, 11–12; and Antilochos, 23.555–62, 791–97; 501; 509; aristeia, 20.156–503; 21.17–382, 520–611; 512; armor, formerly Pēleus's, 2; 11.794–803; 16.129–38, 796–800; 17.122, 125, 130–31, 183–214, 450; 18.21, 82–85, 130–33; 22.368–69, 399; 487, 488, 490; 542; armor, new, 4, 5, 14; 18.469–617; 19.1–23, 364–86; 490, 491–92, 493; 507, 525, 551; burial mound, 5, 11–12; 23.245–48, 255–57; 499; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.681–94; and Cheirōn, 11.829–32; 516; and code of honor, 16; 9.308–429; 16.84–90; 21.279–83–2; 23.274–84; 505, 527, 542; enclosure in Achaian camp, 8.223–26; 11.7–9; 24.448–56; 502; fate, 1.410–18; 8.473–77; 9.401–16; 16.707–9; 18.94–96; 19.403–23; 22.358–60; 23.140–53; 506, 521, 550, (risks overturning), 20.26–30; 493; frightens Trojans, 6.99–100; 18.166–238, 257–83; 20.44–46; in Hādēs, 1.5*n*1; 536–37; healing skills, 11.829–32; 516; home, xiimap. See also Phthiē; horses, 9.188*n*3; 16.149–54, 380–81, 466–76, 866–67; 17.75–78, 456–542; 19.397–424; 486, 489, 493, 499, (Hektör promises to Dolōn), 10.305–6, 321–23, 329–31, 391–93, 401–4; 475, (Hektör tries to capture), 17.75–78, 483–96, 512–13, 525–36; 489, (grieve for Patroklos), 17.426–56; 23.274–84; 488–89, 499; on importance of life, 1.5*n*1; 9.401–16; 474; invulnerability, 505, 542; and Lykaōn, 21.39–41; lyre-playing, 9.186–94–3; 520; parentage, 20.105–8; 493; Patroklos's death brings back into action, 2; 8.473–77; 505–6, 541–42; Pēleus's advice to, 11.783–84; 542; and Phoenix, 9.485–95, 611–14; 474; 516, 543; on Priam's character, 20.179–83; 544; prophecy before birth, 2, 4; quality of account in Iliad, 8*n*; ransoms Isos and Antiphos, 11.104–6, 111–12; sacks cities, 4, (Cilician Thēbē), 4; 1.366–69; 2.691–93–4; 6.413–28; 9.188–3; 520, 549, 551, (Lesbos), 9.128–30, 270–73, 664–65; 531, (Lyrnessos and Pēdasos), 20.89–96, 187–94, (Tenedos), 11.625–27; smiles, once, 23.555–6; 509; son. See Neoptolemos; spear, 16.140–44; 19.387–91; 20.273–83; 516, 542; Thetis's attempts to make immortal, 542, 550; wrath, 2; 1.1–7; 463; 505; Zeus favors Trojans for, 1.348–427; 8.370–72; 13.347–50; 15.72–77; 543, 550; and Zeus of Dōdōna, 16.220–56; 485; and Zeus's plan, 15.64–69; 17.408–11; 543–44. See also under Athēnē; Briseis; Hektör; Thetis

Adamas, 12.139–40; 13.560–75, 759, 771; 480

Adrēstos, king of Sikyōn, 2.572; 23.347; 548; daughters, 5.412; 14.121

Adrēstos, son of Merōps, a Trojan, 2.830–34; 6.37–65; 469

aegis, 2.375–2, 447–49; 5.738–42; 21.400–403; 506, 513; Achilles dressed in, 18.203–6; 490; Hektör's body preserved in, 24.18–21; 501; 506; nature and appearance 2.375*n*2, 447–49; 5.738–42; 506, 522, 525; use in battle, 4.167–68; 15.229–30, 307–11, 318–27, 361; 17.593–96; 483, 489

Aeschylus, 11, 23; 24.62*n*3; 530

Aethiopsis, 6; 505, 506

Agamemnōn, 506–7; raises expedition against Troy, 3; and sacrifice of Iphigeneia, 3–4; 506–7; and ransoming of Chryseis, 1–2; 1.8–42; 463; 516–17; quarrel with Achilles, 1–2, 18; 1.101–305, 365–95; 463, 485, 491; 515; deluded by Zeus into action, 2.1–84; 464; test of troops' resolve backfires, 2.88–154, 185–87; 464; and Thersitēs, 2.211–77; 465;

- prepares to attack Troy, 2.369–93, 402–31, 441–43, 477–83; 465; Helen points out to Priam, 3.166–70, 176–83; 466; and duel between Paris and Menelaös, 3.266–94, 455–61; 466; in battle, 5.38–42, 533–40; 6.33–35, 53–65, 435–39; 468; and Hektör's offer of duel, 7.107–19, 162, 313–15, 321–22; 470, 471; agrees to truce, 7.405–12; 471; and Trojan attack on camp, 8.217–44, 261, 278–91; 472; proposes returning home, 9.9–28; 473; offers restitution to Achilles, 2; 9.114–61, 260–306; 473; 506; Achilles rejects, 2; 9.307–429, 606–55, 670–713; 473–74; and council of war, 10.1–24, 34–127, 233–40; 474, 475; aristeia, 11.15–46, 84–180, 218–83; 476; 512; wounded, 11.248–83, 661; Poseidön blames for Achaian failure, 13.107–14; and attempt to counter reverse, 14.128–34, 379–87; 481–82; out of action, 16.26–29, 76–77; 19.51–53, 77& 485; reconciled with Achilles, 19.40–281; 492; tries to comfort Achilles, 19.309–10; 492; and funeral of Patroklos, 23.49–53, 110–12, 155–62; 499; at funeral games, 23.884–97; 501; and return of Hektör's body, 24.654, 686–88; 503; death, 506, 514, 530, 539
- . armor, 11.15–46; 476; 522; and booty, 9.330–35; 473; character, 506; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.569–80, 612–14; 511; excuses own actions, 19.85–138; 518; exhorts troops, 4.223–418; 5.528–32; 8.217–44, 278–91; 14.128–34; 467; genealogy, 2.100–108; 513–14; horses, 23.295–300, 408–9, 524–25; and Kalchas, 17; 1.105–8; 530; kingdom, xiimap; 2.576–80; 9.149–53, 291–95; 11.45–46; 511, 536; kingly gear, 2.41–47. See also under scepters; and Menelaös, 4.148–97; 6.53–65; 7.107–19; 467, 469, 470; 533; prowess, 23.884–97; 501; 506. See also under Briseis
- Agastrophos, 11.338–42, 368–75; 476, 477
- Agathön, son of Priam, 24.248–64; 502
- Agēnōr, 507; in battle, 4.467–69; 11.59; 12.93; 13.489–95, 598; 14.425; 15.340; 16.535; 478, 480, 482, 483; fights Achilles, 21.544–611; 497; 507; death, 5
- agriculture, 18.541–72. See also relevant items under similes
- Ahhiya(wa) (Hittite term, probably Achaia), 14; 505, 535, 552
- Aiakos, 9.184& 21.189; 507; grandson. See Achilles; son. See Pēleus
- Aias (1), son of Telamön, “the Greater”, 507; Trojans identify from ramparts, 3.225–29; 466; prepares for battle, 4.273–91; 467; in battle, 4.473–84; 5.519–27, 610–26; 6.5–11, 435–39; 8.79, 262, 266–72, 330–31; 467, 468, 469; duel with Hektör, 7.164, 170–312; 470–71; embassy to Achilles, 9.162–657; 473–74; 507; in council of war, 10.53, 111–13, 228; continued successes, 11.465–97, 521–27, 541–43; 477; Zeus causes to retreat, 11.544–77, 587–95; 477; and defense of Achaian camp, 12.265–77, 333–86, 400–405; 13.46–82, 126, 197–201, 313–25, 701–11, 802–32; 14.402–13, 459–74, 511–12; 15.249–50, 415–41, 516–17, 674–88, 727–46; 16.101–22, 358–62, 555–61; 478, 479, 480, 482, 483, 484–85, 486; fights Hektör, 14.402–13; 15.249–50, 429–35; 480, 482, 483; urges on others, 15.471–77, 501–14, 560–64, 727–46; 483, 484; in battle over body of Patroklos, 17.102–5, 114–24, 128–39, 166–74, 230, 235–45, 278–315, 356–60, 507–11, 531–32, 626–55, 668–72, 707–21, 732–34, 746–52; 18.157–64; 487, 488, 489, 490; 507, 533; at funeral games, 23.708–39, 811–23, 838, 842–43; 500–501; later life, madness and suicide, 4, 5; 507
- . Alexander the Great lays wreath on tomb, 11–12; association with Aias (2), 2.406; 4.285–91; 7.164; 13.46–82, 701–11 and often; 507; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.557–58; and code of honor, 16; 7.287–314; prowess, 2.768–69; 3.225–29; 4.473–84; 8.223–26; 11.7–9; 13.313–25; 465; 507; shield, 14; 7.219–23; 8.266–72; 11.485–86; 23.820–21; 472; 507, 548; and Teukros, 8.266–72, 330–31; 15.471–77; 472, 484; 548
- Aias (2), son of Oileus, “the Lesser”, 507; prepares for battle, 4.273–91; 467; in battle, 5.519–27; 6.435–39; 7.164; 8.79, 262; 468; on council of war, 10.110, 228; 507; and defense of Achaian camp, 12.265–77, 335–36, 353–69; 13.46–82, 126, 197–205, 701–11; 14.420–22, 442–48; 16.330–34, 555–61; 478, 479, 480, 482, 485, 486; in battle over Patroklos's body, 17.256–57, 507–11, 531–32, 668–72, 707–21, 732–34, 746–52; 18.157–64; 488, 489, 490; at funeral games, 23.473–98, 754–67, 773–84; 500–501; later life, 6; 507, 530

- . association with Aias (1), 2.406; 4.285–91; 7.164; 13.46–82, 701–11 and often; 507; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.527–30; 465; half-brother of Medōn, 13.694; 15.334; prowess, 13.313–20; 14.520–22; 507
- aidōs*. See shame
- Aigai, 8.203; 13.20–21; 479
- Aigaiōn (Briareus), 1.401–4&n7
- Aígina (island), 2.562; 507, 548
- Aígina (nymph), 507
- Aigisthos, 514
- Aineias, xiiimap; 2.819–21; 507–8; fights Diomēdēs, 5.166–327, 343–46, 431–42; 467, 468; wafted away and healed, 5.443–53, 467–69; 468; returns to battle, 5.512–16, 541–60, 571–72; 6.77–85; 469; in attack on Achaian camp, 11.58; 12.98–99; 13.455–69, 489–95, 499–505, 541–44; 14.425; 15.332–38; 16.536, 607–25; 478, 479, 480, 482, 483, 486; in battle over Patroklos, 17.322–45, 483–96, 525–36, 753–54; 488, 489; fights Achilles, 20.79–350; 494; later life, 20.301–8; 508
- . fate, 20.301–8; 508; gods protect, 5.297–317, 343–46, 431–53; 20.79–118, 290–308, 318–40; 23.291–92&n3; 467, 468, 494; 508, 509, 510; horses, 23.291–92&n3; lineage, and grievance against Priam, 13.459–61&n4; 20.178–83, 215–41, 305–8; 507–8, 517, 552; son of Aphroditē, 2.819–21; 5.247–48, 311; 20.105–8, 208–9; 493; 507, 509
- Aipeia, 9.152, 294
- Aisēpos river, 2.825; 4.91; 6.21; 12.21
- Aithē (Agamemnōn's mare), 23.295–300, 408–9, 524–25
- Aithiōpians, 4; 1.423–24&n8; 23.205–7; 464
- Aithiops*, 6; 505, 506
- Aithōn (Hektōr's horse), 8.185
- Aitōlia, Aitōlians, 2.638–44; 9.529–99; 474; 508, 532–33
- Akamas, son of Antēnōr, 2.822–23; 11.60; 12.99–100; 14.476–89; 16.342–44; 478, 482, 485
- Akamas, son of Eussōros, a Thracian, 2.844; 5.462; 6.5–11
- Aktōr, an Epeian, 2.621; 11.709n8; 13.186n3; sons. See Eurytos; Kteatos
- Aktōr, father of Menoitios, 11.785; 16.14
- Alaksandu, prince of Wilusa (possibly Paris/Aléxandros), 14; 540, 553
- Alastōr, 4.295; 5.677; 8.332–34; 13.421–23; 20.463
- Alēsion, 2.617; 11.757–58
- Alexander the Great, 11–12
- Aléxandros. See Paris/Aléxandros
- Alkathoōs, 12.93; 13.427–44, 465–67, 496–97; 478, 479, 480
- Alkimedōn, 16.197; 17.466–82, 486–87, 500–502; 485, 489
- Alkimos, 19.392–95; 24.474, 573–81; 503
- Alkmēnē, 14.323–24; 19.99, 119; 508
- Alpheios river, 2.592; 5.544–45; 11.712, 726, 727, 728; 508
- Altēs, 21.85–87; 22.51
- Althaiē, 9.555, 565–72, 584–85; 508, 533
- Amarynkeus, 23.629–43
- Amazons, 3.189; 6.186; 508
- ambrosia, 14.170–77&n4; as food, 19.347, 353–54; as horse fodder, 5.369, 777; 8.434; 13.35–36; night as ambrosial, 2.57; 10.41, 142; 18.268; as unguent, 1.529; 14.170–77&n4; 16.670, 680; 19.38; 21.507; 23.186–87
- ambushes, 13.276–87; 18.512–40
- Amphiklos, 16.313–16; 485
- Amphimachos, son of Kteatos, 2.620–21; 13.183–96, 202, 206–7; 479
- Amphitryōn, 19.124n2; 508; son. See Hēraklēs

- Amphoterōs, 16.415; 486
- Amydōn, 2.849; 16.288
- Amyntōr, 9.448–77; 10.266–67; 543
- anachronisms, 12–13, 13–14, 14–15; primitive myths, 13, 17; 509, 513–14, 516, 524, 531. See also arrows, poisoned; boar-tusk helmet; digamma; iron objects, anachronistic; shields (Aias's tower-like)
- anatomy; vein along spine, 13.546–47&n7
- Anchisēs, of Troy, 2.819–21; 5.247–48, 267–72; 13.428–33; 20.208–9, 239–40; 508
- Andromachē, 509; from Cilician Thēbē, 6.396–97, 413–28; 22.471–72, 479–81; 509, 512, 549; marriage to Hektōr, 22.470–72; 509, 523, 524; last meeting with Hektōr, 6.365–493; 490; 509; and Hektōr's horses, 8.186–90; and Hektōr's death, 22.437–515; 24.710–13, 723–45; 503; 509; fears for Astyanax, 22.484–507; 24.726–39; 499, 503; 509; becomes Neoptolemos's prize, 6; 537
- Antēnōr, 3.148, 203–24, 261–63, 312–13; 7.347–53; 471; 509, 538
- Antheia, 9.151, 293
- Antilochos, 509; in battle, 4.457–62; 5.560–89; 6.32–33; 467; defense of Achaian camp, 13.93, 396–401, 418–20, 479, 545–66; 14.513; 15.568–91; 16.317–20; 17.377–83; 479–80, 482, 484, 485; tells Achilles of Patroklos's death, 17.651–55, 679–701; 18.2–3, 15–21, 32–34; 489, 490; 509; at funeral games, 23.301–4, 353–54, 402–41, 514–15, 522–27, 539–62, 566–613, 755–58, 785–97; 500, 501; 509; and Menelaōs's challenge, 23.441&n5, 581–95; 509; makes Achilles smile, 23.555–56&n6; 501; 509; death and burial, 4–5; 509
- Antimachos, 11.123–25, 133–42
- Antiphōn, son of Priam, 24.248–64; 502
- Antiphos, son of Priam, 4.489–92; 11.101–21; 476
- antiquity, views of Iliad in, 7–8, 11–12, 13, 16, 17; 9.461&n6; 524, 554
- Aphareus, 9.83; 13.478, 541–44; 480
- Aphroditē, 509–10, 511; Aineias's mother, 2.819–21; 5.247–48, 311; 20.105–8, 208–9; 493; 507, 509; Andromachē's wedding veil from, 22.470–72; wounded by Diomēdēs, 5.330–51; 467; 509, (complains to parents), 5.352–430; 510; in fighting amongst gods, 21.415–33; 496; 510; and Hektōr's corpse, 23.184–91; 499; and Hērē, 5.418–19; 14.186–224; 468; 510; as Kypris, 5.331–33&n4, 422, 458, 759, 883; 531; and Paris and Helen, 2–3; 3.373–425; 4.10–11; 24.25–30&n1; 466, 501; 509, 529, 524, 533
- Apisaōn, 11.578–82; 17.346–51; 477
- Apollo (Phoibos), 510; sends plague on Achaians 2; 1.8–12, 43–100, 380–85; 463; 510; calls off plague, 1.440–57; 464; urges on Trojans, 4.507–14; 467; rescues Aineias, 5.343–46, 431–53; 23.291–92&n3; 468; 510; aids Trojans, 5.453–60, 510; 468; confers with Athēnē on ending battle, 7.17–42; watches duel, 7.57–61; raises alarm at attack on Thracians, 10.515–19; 476; strengthens Hektōr, 15.53–61, 143–56, 220–62; 482, 483; aids Trojans, 15.307–11, 318–27, 355–66, 521–22; 16.513–31; 483, 484, 486; and return of Sarpēdōn's body to Lycia, 16.666–83; 486; 546; and Patroklos's attack, 16.698–711, 715–25, 728–30; 486–87; fatally weakens Patroklos, 18; 16.700–711, 786–806, 844–49; 19.411–14; 487; 510; and battle over Patroklos, 17.70–81, 319–41, 582–96; 487, 488, 489; supports Trojans, 20.38–39, 67–68, 79–118, 138–43, 151–52, 294–95; 493–94; and Hektōr's first fight with Achilles, 20.375–80, 443–52; 494; Xanthos reproaches, 21.228–32; 495; in fighting amongst gods, 21.435–77; 496; 510; helps Trojans, 21.515–17, 538–39, 596–605; 22.7–20; 497; and Hektōr's fatal fight with Achilles, 22.202–4, 213, 302–3, 358–60; 498; preserves Hektōr's corpse, 23.184–91; 24.31–54; 499, 501; 510; and funeral games, 23.383–84, 388–89, 863–65, 872–73; helps Paris kill Achilles, 4; 24.359–60; 506, 540; destroys Achaian wall, 7.459–63; 12.10–34; 477–78; 528, 544
- . and Achilles's expiation of murder, 4; and aegis, 15.307–11, 318–27, 361; 17.593–96; as archer, 1.8–12; 24.757; 463; 510; archers' vows to, 4.119–21; 23.863–65; 501; description, 1.43–47; epithet Smintheus, 1.39&n; and healing, 510, 512; horses of Eumēlos

Apollo (Phoibos) (continued)

bred by, 2.766; and Kassandrē, 530; Laomedōn cheats, 17; 7.451–53&n2; 12.3–33; 20.145–48; 21.441–60; 471; 496; 510, 552; lyre-playing, 1.603; 2.4.62–63&n3; 510, 542; and Marpessa, 9.559–64; and Niobē, 2.4.605–6, 609; pacan, 1.472–74; 22.391; 499; 539; at Peleus's wedding to Thetis, 2.4.62–63&n3; 542; prophecy a gift from, 1.68–75; 530; pro-Trojan stance, 17n; 510. See also events above; walls of Troy built by Poseidōn and, 7.451–53; 21.441–60; 496; 552

Arcadia, 2.603–14; 7.134; 510–11

Archelochos, 2.822–23; 12.99–100; 14.463–74; 478, 482

Archeptolemos, 8.127–29, 309–17

archery, 4.104–11; contest at Patroklos's funeral games, 23.850–83; 501; inconsistent with heroic ethos, 538, 548; Paris's skill, 11.370–83, 504, 581; 540; poisoned arrows, 17; 4.150&n2; 467; 540; vows to Apollo, 4.119–21; 23.863–65; 501. See also under Apollo; Artemis; Teukros

Areilykos, 16.307–11; 485

Areithoös of Arnē, 7.8–10, 137–46

Areithoös of Thrace, 20.487–89; 494

Arēnē, 2.591; 11.723

Arēs, 511; aids Trojans, 4.439; 467; Athēnē persuades to withdraw, 5.29–36; 467; lends chariot to Aphroditē, 5.355–69, 468; aids Trojans, 5.453–70, 506–11, 563–64, 590–606, 679–710; 468; wounded by Diomēdēs, 5.711–863, 907–9; 21.396–98; 468, 469; 511; healing, 5.864–907; 469; 511; Athēnē dissuades from avenging Askalaphos, 15.110–42; 482–83; supports Trojans, 20.38, 51–53, 69, 138–43; 493–94; watches battle, 20.151–52; 494; in fighting amongst gods, 21.391–417; 496

———, Amazons descended from, 508; Areithoös given armor by, 7.146; Askalaphos and Ialmenos are sons, 2.512–15; 9.82; 13.519–22&n6; 15.110–42; 482–83; and Enyalios, 5.333n4; 13.518–22&n6; 17.210–11; 20.69; 520; epitome of martial spirit, 5.388, 892–98; 13.127, 298–305; 17.210–11; 511; glutted with blood of fallen, 20.77–78; 22.266–67; and Hērē, 5.892–98; 21.412–14; 511; imprisonment by Giants, 5.385–91&n6; 527; mill, mōlos Arēos, “grind of battle”, 2.401; 511; on shield of Achilles, 18.516–19; 491; and Terror and Rout, 4.440; 11.37; 15.119; 511

Arētos, 17.494, 516–24, 535–39; 489

Argolid, 511

Argos (mythical dog), Hermēs as slayer of, 2.103–4&n1; 2.4.153–54; 502

Argos and Argives, generic use, 3; 505, 511

Argos, Pelasgian, 2.681; 511

Argos, Peloponnese, xiimap; 2.559; 4.51–56; 14.119–20; 19.115–24; 511, 535

Ariadnē, 18.592; 530, 534

Ariōn (Adrēstos's horse), 23.346–47

Arisbē, 2.836, 838; 6.13; 12.96; 21.43

aristeia (display of excellence), 5.3n1; 511–12. See also under Achilles; Agamemnōn;

Diomēdēs; Idomeneus; Patroklos aristocracy, 23; Agamemnōn's concern for status, 506; bureaucratic support, 13; 532, 552;

Linear B evidence, 13; 532, 552; and lower classes, 2.188–206; 464; 549–50. (Thersitēs incident) 4, 15, 23; 2.211–77; 465; 549–50; rewards and responsibilities, 12.310–28; 546; unrest after collapse, 12, 15–16; Zeus acts like Mycenaean lord, 555. See also guest-friendship; honor, code of; palace culture

Aristotle, 7, 9, 10, 11

Arkadians, 2.603–14; 7.134; 510–11

Arkesilaos, 2.495; 15.329–31

Arktinos of Milētos, 6, 7 armor, 3.328–38; 4.132–38, 185–87; 5.733–47; 11.15–46; 16.39–43; 466, 468, 485; exchange in guest-friendship, 6.230–36; 15.532; 469; prizes in funeral games, 4; 23.560–62, 798–810. See also boar-tusk helmet; shields; and under Achilles

Arnē, 2.507; 7.9

Arnold, Matthew: On Translating Homer, 18

arrows, poisoned, 17; 4.150&n2; 467; 540

Artemis, 3–4; 512; Aineias nursed by, 5.344–45, 431–48; 510; archer, 5.51–53; 6.205, 248; 512; in fighting amongst gods, 21.468–77, 479–96, 504–14; 496, 497; 512; and Hērē, 5.418–19; 14.186–224; 20.70–71; 21.504–14; 468, 493; 510; and Kalydōnian boar hunt, 9.533–49; 474; 532–33; “Lady of Beasts” epithet suggests antiquity, 21.470; 512; maidens’ song to, 16.182–83; and Niobē, 24.606–9; 512; supports Trojans, 20.39, 70–71; 493; 512

Asinē, 2.560; 512

Asios, son of Dymas, 16.715–20; 487

Asios, son of Hyrtakos, 2.834–39; 12.95–97, 110–74; 13.384–93, 759; 478, 479

Askalaphos, 2.512; 9.82; 13.478, 516–39; 15.110–42; 480, 482–83

Askania, 2.863; 13.793–94

Askanios, 2.862–63; 13.792

Asklēpios, 4.194, 219; 11.518; 512, 516

Asōpos river, 4.383; 10.287; 512

Assarakos, 20.232, 239; 552 assemblies: Achaian, 1.53–305, 489–90; 2.50–52, 86–154, 207–398; 7.382–411; 9.9–79; 16.386–88; 19.34–276; 23.257; 464; heralds’ role, 2.50–52, 96–98; 18.503–5; 526; Trojan, 2.788–808; 3.209–24; 7.345–79; 8.489–542; 11.138–42; 18.243–313

Assyria/Sumeria, 8

Asteropaios, 12.101–4; 17.217, 351–54; 21.139–204; 478, 495; gear as prizes at funeral games, 23.560–62, 807–8, 824–25

Astyanax (Skamandrios), 6.399–404, 466–84; 470; 524; Andromachē laments fate, 22.484–507; 24.726–39; 499, 503; death, 6, 7; 537

Atē (Delusion), 9.496–514; 19.85–138, 268–75; 474; 518

Athēnē, 512–13; restrains Achilles from killing Agamemnōn, 18; 1.188–222; 463; 513; prevents Achaians fleeing, 2.155–83; 464; argues with other gods, 4.1–73; 466; support for Menelaos, 3.439; 4.7–10; 466, 467; incites Trojan to break truce, 4.64–103; 466–67; support to Achaians, 4.439, 514–16, 541–42; 5.1–8; 467; withdraws from battle, 5.29–36; 467; support for Diomēdēs, 5.1–8, 114–33, 405–6, 794–861; 467; intervenes against Arēs, 5.711–863, 907–9; 468, 469; Trojans petition to restrain Diomēdēs, 6.86–98, 251–312; 469; confers with Apollo on ending battle, 7.17–42; watches duel, 7.57–61; and Zeus’s ban on gods intervening, 8.30–40, 350–483; 15.121–42; 471, 472, 483; supports spying expedition, 10.274–94, 460–63, 482, 507–12, 569–71, 578–79; 475, 476; aids Achaians, 15.668–70; 17.544–73; 20.33–34, 48–50, 69, 438–40; 484, 489, 493; aids Achilles, 18.203–6, 225, 217–18; 19.340–54; 20.95–96, 438–40; 21.284–97; 490, 493, 495; 513; in fighting amongst gods, 21.391–433; 496; helps Achilles defeat Hektōr, 16; 15.70–71, 613–14; 22.177–87, 214–17, 226–47, 276–77, 293–99; 482, 484, 498; 518; intervenes in funeral games, 5; 23.388–93, 399–400, 405–6, 768–74, 782–83; 500–501; and fall of Troy, 5, 6; revenge on returning Achaians, 6, 7

———, and Achaians, 513. See also events above; and Achilles, 18; 1.188–222; 15.70–71, 613–14; 18.203–6, 225, 217–18; 19.340–54; 20.95–96, 438–40; 21.284–97; 22.214–25; 463, 490, 495, 498; 513. See also events above; aegis, 5.738–42; 18.203–6; 21.400–403; 490, 496; 513; and Agamemnōn, 11.45; altar desecrated, 6; antiquity, 512–13; and Aphrodītē, 5.418–25; 468; and Athens, 2.547–49; 513; battle gear, 5.733–47; 468; birth, 512; and Epeian-Pylian war, 11.714–17, 721, 729, 736, 758; epithets, (ageleīē, “spoil

Athēnē (continued)

- bringer”), 4.128 5.765; 6.269, 279; 15.213, (glaukōpis, “grey-eyed”), 512–13. (Trítogē-neia), 4.515 8.39; 22.183; and Erechtheus, 2.547–49; handicrafts, 8.384–86; 9.390; 14.188–89; 15.412; 551; and Hēraklēs, 20.146; and Judgment of Paris, 2–3, 17; 2.4.26–30 501; 513, 529, 554; Palladion (image in Troy), 5; on shield of Achilles, 18.516–19; 491; and Tydeus, 4.390; 10.285–90; and warfare; contrast with Arēs, 511; and Zeus, 1.400; 8.38–40, 405–6, 419–24; 22.183–85; 512, 513. See also under Diomēdēs; Odysseus
- Athens, Athenians, xiimap; 2.546–56; 4.329; 13.196, 689–91; 15.337; 513, 514, 546
- Atreus, 2.105–6; 513–14, 536; sons. See Agamemnōn; Menelaōs
- atrugetos* (“unharvested”), 14.204 5
- Atymnios, 16.317–20, 324–29; 485
- Augeias, 2.625; 11.701–2, 739
- Aulis, 2.496; 514; omen on length of war, 3; 2.299–330; 405; 529; sacrifice of Iphigenia, 3–4, 6; 514, 529–30
- Autolykos, 10.265–68; 538
- Automedōn, 514; attends Achilles, 9.209; 23.563–65; 24.474, 573–81; 503; goes into battle, 16.145–48, 218–19, 472–76, 864–67; 485, 486, 487; fights over Patroklos’s body, 17.429–31, 451–53, 459–542; 488, 489; takes Achilles into battle, 19.392–96, 401–3; 493
- Axios river, 2.849–50; 16.288; 21.141; Asteropaïos as son of, 21.141–43, 156–60, 184–99; 495
- Balios (horse of Achilles), 16.149–51; 19.400 5; 485
- Bathyklēs, 16.593–601; 486
- Bellerophōn, 6.155–202, 216–21; 508, 514, 516, 522
- Biēnōr, 11.92; 476
- blood-guilt, purification from, 4; 522, 542
- blood-price, 9.632–36; 13.659; 14.483–86; 18.496–508; 21.26–32; 495
- boar-tusk helmet, 14; 10.261–71 533
- Boiōtia, Boiōtians, xiimap; 2.495–510, 526; 13.685–88; 15.330; 480; 514, 516, 548–49
- booty, sharing out of, 1.121–29, 163–68; 9.330–35; 473
- Boreas (North Wind), 15.18–31; 23.192–218, 229–30; 482, 499
- Bouprasion, 2.615; 11.756–60; 23.631
- boxing contest, 23.651–99; 500
- Briareus (Aigaiōn), 1.401–4 7
- Briseis, 515; Achilles’s acquisition, 2.689–91; 405; Agamemnōn takes, 2; 1.181–305, 391–92, 686–94; 18.444–45; 463; 517; Achilles rejects Agamemnōn’s first offer to return, 9.104–13, 131–34, 335–46, 367–69; 16.52–59; 473, 485; Agamemnōn swears she is untouched, 19.175–76, 187–88, 258–65; 492; 515; returned to Achilles, 19.246; 492; mourns for Patroklos, 19.282–301; 492; 541; Achilles sleeps with, 24.675–76 503
- bureaucracy, Mycenaean, 13; 532, 552. See also Linear B
- burial mounds: Achaian communal, 7.336–37, 433–36; of Aisyētēs, 2.793; give fame to victor in battle, 7.84–91; of Hektōr, 4; 24.792–800; 504; of Ilos, 10.414–16; 11.166, 370–71; 24.349; of Myrīnē, 2.811–15; of Patroklos and Achilles, 5, 11–12; 23.245–57
- Calverley, C. S., 20
- Caria, Carians, 2.867–75; 4.141; 10.428; 515
- Catalogue of Ships, 2.484–759; 405; 515–16; on Boiōtians, 2.495–510; 514, 516, 548–49
- Centaur, 1.267–8 6; 2.743–44; 543. See also Cheirōn
- Chalkis (bird), 14.290–91 8
- Chalkis, Euboia, 2.537, 640
- Chapman, George, 211
- chariots, 15; 5.722–31; race, 23.271–650; 499–500
- Charis, 18.382–92

Cheirōn, 4.219; 11.830–32; 16.140–44; 19.390; 512, 516, 542 childbirth, goddess of. See Eileithyia(i) Chimaira, 6.179–83, 328–29; 516
 Chromios, son of Priam, 5.159–65
 Chromios, a Trojan, 17.218, 494, 534; 489
 Chrysē, 1.37–38, 99, 389–90, 430–76
 Chryseis, 1–2, 4, 8n; 1.8–42, 101–305, 308–10, 430–47; 463, 464; 516–17, 539
 Chrysēs, 1–2, 8n; 1.8–42, 370–82, 440–63; 463, 464; 516–17, 529
 Chrysothemis, 9.144–47, 286&n4
 Cilicia, Cilicians. See Thēbē/ai, Cilician cities: besieged, 18.207–13, 219–20, 509–40; 21.522–25; on shield of Achilles, 14; 18.490–540; 491. See also sacking of cities comments, Homer's rare, 6.234–36; 13.343–44; 16.46–47, 684–90; 18.310–13; 469, 479, 485, 486, 491; 541
 composition of Iliad, 1, 9–11; date, 1, 8, 10–11; 9.405n5; master poet theory, 1, 9–11; oral tradition, 1, 8–9, 10, 12–17; transition to written tradition, 8, 10, 12, 23 cords of strife, 13.358–60; 16.662; 479 Corinth, 2.570; 13.664; 517. See also Ephyrē corruption of text, 11.265–89&n3. See also interpolation cosmology, 1.423n8; 18.483–89. See also Ocean; Tartaros cowardice; physical manifestations, 13.276–87 craftsmanship: Daidalos's, 18.592; 530, 534; Hēphaistos's, 1.605–8; 14.166–68, 238–41, 338–40&n11; 18.372–80, 400–401, 410–20, 468–613; 20.11–12; 539. See also Athēnē (handicrafts); linen; metalworking; potter; wool-worker Crete. See Krētē cups: of Nestōr, 11.632–37; Thracian, 24.234–35; 502
Cypria, 6, 7, 10, 14n9; 529–30
 Cyprus, 11.21

Daidalos, 18.592; 530, 534 daily life, scenes from: on shield of Achilles, 18.478–608. See also similes daimōn (demon, maleficent spirit), 9.600; 15.468–69; 20.493&n10; 21.18, 93, 227 Danaāns; Homer's use of term, 3; 505, 517, 546
 Danuna (Egyptian term, possibly Danaāns), 546
 Dardania, Dardanians, 20.216–18; 517, 552
 Dardanos, son of Bias, 20.460–62; 494
 Dardanos, son of Zeus, 20.215–19, 304–6; 517, 552
 Dardany (Egyptian term, possibly Trojans), 553
 Darēs, Trojan priest, 5.9–29
 Dares the Phrygian, 539–40 dates: of composition of Iliad, 1, 8, 10–11; 9.405n5; of Trojan War, 1; 552
 Dawn (Eōs), 4; 517–18; and Tithōnos, 11.1; 517
 Death (Thanatos), 14.231; 518; hands of, 21.548&n3; and Sarpēdōn's body, 16.453–57, 666–83; 486; 546
 Death-Spirit, (kér), 13.665–69; 18.535–40; 23.78–79; 491; 518
 Deimos (Terror), 4.440; 11.37; 15.119; 482–83; 511
 Deiphobos, 5, 6; 2.4.251; 518; in attack on Achaian camp, 12.94–95; 13.156–64, 402–16, 445–67, 489–95; 478, 479; Athēnē tricks Hektōr in form of, 22.226–47, 293–99; 498; 518
 Dēipyros, 9.83; 13.92, 478, 576–80; 480
 Delphi (Pythō), 2.519; 9.405&n5; 510
 Delusion (Atē), 9.496–514; 19.85–138, 268–75; 474; 518

Dēmētēr, 2.695–96; 5.500–501; 13.322; 14.326; 21.76; 518, 531
 Dēmoleōn, 20.395–400; 494
 demon. See daimōn
 Dēmouchos, 20.456–59; 494
 Destiny. See Fate
 Deukaliōn, son of Mīnōs, 12.117; 13.451–52; 17.609; 534
 Deukaliōn, a Trojan, 20.477–83; 494
 Dictys of Crete, 539–40
 digamma, 9
 Diomēdēs, 9.664–65; 531
 Diomēdēs, 518–19; restraint when Agamemnōn criticizes, 4.365–421; 465; 518–19; aristeia, 5.1–8, 84–352, 431–44, 519–27, 792–909; 6.12–19; 21.396–98; 467–68, 468–69; 511–12; Trojans petition Athēnē to restrain, 6.86–98, 251–312; 469; encounter with Glaukos, 16; 6.119–236; 469; 522; attempts to scale ramparts, 6.435–39; in council, 7.163, 398–402; 471; rescues Nestōr, retreats reluctantly, 8.79–166; leads attack, 8.253–60, 532–38; 472; urges fighting on, 9.30–49, 696–709; 473, 474; in council, 10.109, 149–79, 218–26, 241–53; 475; spying expedition, 15–16; 10.218–26, 241–53, 255–59, 283–98, 339–571; 475–76; steals Rhēsos's horses, 10.474–571; 476; in battle, 11.310–67; 476–77; wounded, 11.368–400, 660, 845n9; 477; and attempt to counter reverse, 14.27–134, 379–38; 480–81, 481–82; out of action, 16.25–29, 74–75; 485; at assembly summoned by Achilles, 19.48–50; 492; in funeral games, 23.290–92, 357, 375–400, 405–6, 470–72, 499–510, 681–84, 811–25; 500, 501; later role in war, 5; return home, 519 ———. Aphroditē wounded by, 5.330–51; 467; and Arēs's intervention in battle, 5.596–606, 793–863; 21.396–98; 468; armor, 8.194–95; Athēnē protects, 5.1–8, 114–33, 405–6, 794–861; 10.482, 503–14; 513, 519; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.563, 567; and code of honor, 15–16; 6.215–36; 9.696–700; 522; kingdom, xiimap; 511, 519; lineage, 14.112–27
 Diōnē, 5.370–74&n5, 381–417; 468; 509, 510, Dionysos, 6.132–37; 14.325; 519
 Diōrēs, son of Amarynkeus, 2.622; 4.517–26
 Dios, 2.4.248–64; 502
 Dōdōna, 2.749–50; 16.233–35; 519
 Dolōn, 15–16; 10.313–464, 526–29, 561–63, 569–71; 475, 476; 519–20, 527, 538
 Dolops, 11.302; 15.525–44; 484
 Dorians, 511, 516, 520, 534, 547
 Doulichion, 2.625, 629
 dreams, 1.63; 2.1–47; 464
 Dryden, John, 19
 Dryōps, 20.455–56; 494 duel at funeral games, 23.798–825; 501 Dymas, 16.718–19; 523

 eagles: as omens, 8.247–52; 12.200–229; 13.821–23; 24.315–21; in similes, 17.674–78; 21.252–53; 22.308–10
 Echeklēs, 16.189–90; 494
 Echios, a Lycian, 16.416; 486 economy, Mycenaean, 13. See also craftsmanship; everyday life, scenes from; farming; trade Eëriboia, 5.389–90&n7
 Ètīōn, king of Cilician Thēbē, 1.366; 6.395–98, 413–20; 9.188&n3; 520; Andromachē daughter of, 6.395; 8.187; 22.471–72, 479–81; possessions, 9.186–88&n3; 16.152–54; 23.826–35; 520
 Egypt: and other peoples, 517, 533, 546, 553; wealth, 9.381–82; 549; writing 8n6

Eileithyia(i), 11.270–71; 16.187; 19.103; 520
 Eleōn, 2.500&n3; 10.266
 Elephēnōr, 2.540–41; 4.463–72 Ēlis, 2.615, 626; 11.670–761; 477
 Elysium, Elysian Fields, 520
 Ennomos, a Mysian, 2.858–61; 17.218
 Enopē, 9.150, 292
 Ēnōps, 14.444–45; 16.402
 Enyalios (god of war), 13.518–22&n6; 18.309; 20.69; 22.132; 520; antiquity, 520, 533; epithet of Arēs, 5.333&n4; 13.519, 522&n6; 17.210–11; 520; in epithet of Mēriōnēs, 2.651; 7.166; 8.264; 17.259; 520, 533
 Enyo, 5.333&n4, 592
 Eōs. See Dawn
 Epeians, 2.615–24; 4.537; 13.685–88, 691–93; 15.519; 23.629–43; war with Pylos, 11.670–761; 477; 537
 Epeios, 5; 23.664–75, 685–95, 838–40&n11; 500, 501
 Ephyrē (Corinth), 6.152, 210; 514, 517
 Ephyrē in Thesprotia, 2.659; 15.531
 Epic Cycle, 6–7, 10. See also Aithiopsis; Cypria
 Epídauros, 2.561; 511
 Epigoni, 548–49
Ēpigonoi, 549
 Epiklēs, 12.378–86; 478 epithets, 8, 22. See also under individuals' names Erebus, 8.368; 9.572; 16.326–27
 Erechtheus, 2.547–51; 513, 520
 Ereuthaliōn, 4.319; 7.136–37, 147–57
 Erichthonios, 20.219–30
 Erinyes. See Furies
 Eriōpis, 13.697; 15.335–36
 Eris. See Strife
 Eteoklēs, 4.386; 548, 549
 Ethiopians, 4; 1.423–24&n8; 23.205–7; 464
 Euboa, Euboians, xiimap; 2.536–45; 505, 521
 Eumēdēs, 10.314–15, 412, 426
 Eumēlos, 2.712–15, 763–67; 465; 521; in chariot race, 23.288–89, 354, 375–97, 459–68, 480–81, 532–65; 500; 521
 Eunēos, son of Jason, 7.467–75; 21.41; 23.746–47
 Euphorbos, 18; 16.806–15, 849–50; 17.1–81; 487
 Euryalos, 2.565–66; 6.20–28; 23.676–99&n8; 500
 Eurybatēs, 1.318–48; 2.183–84; 9.170
 Eurymedōn, Agamemnōn's charioteer, 4.227–30
 Eurymedōn, Nestōr's squire, 8.114; 11.620
 Eurynomē, 18.397–405; 491
 Eurypylos, son of Euaimōn, 5; 2.736; 5.76–83; 6.36; 7.167; 8.265; wounded, 11.575–92, 662; 11.809–48; 15.390–94; 16.27–29; 477, 484, 485
 Eurystheus, 8.363&n1; 15.640; 19.114–24, 132–33; 508, 521
 Eurytos, son of Aktōr, 2.620–21; 11.709–10&n8, 750–52; 23.638–42&n7
 Eurytos the Oichalian, 2.596–97, 730 Evans, Sir Arthur, 532, 533 everyday life, scenes from: on shield of Achilles, 18.478–608. See also similes exemption from military service, buying of, 13.669&n8; 23.296–99

Fame (kléos), 8, 12, 14, 23; 527–28; Achilles' disillusion with, 9.318–20; 505; Hektör and, 6.443–46; 7.83–91; 523. See also honor, code of farming, 22–23; 18.541–72. See also relevant items under similes

Fate (moira, moros, aisa, kêr), 16; 521, 554–55; Agamemnôn blames his actions on, 19.87–89; 492; Asklepîos and, 512; fixity of individual's, 16; 6.486–89; 470; and outcome of Trojan War, 8.473–77; 15.61–72; 16.707–9; 487; 554; physicality of kêr, 15; 8.67–77; 471; potential for overriding, 16, 17; 2.155; 16.431–61; 17.231; 20.30; 21.517; 22.166–85; 521, 554–55. See also under Achilles; Hektör; Poseidôn; Zeus fencing contest, 23.806&n10

fig tree, wild (landmark), 6.433; 11.167; 22.145; 470

Finley, Moses, 532

flies, 14.130–31; 16.641–44; 17.570–72 footrace, 23.740–97; 500–501 formulaic phrases, 8–9, 22

funeral games: Achilles's, 5; 507; Amarynkeus's, 23.629–43; 537; Oidipous's, 23.679–80&n8; Patroklos's, 13; 23.257–897; 499–500

funeral rites: body laid out with feet towards door, 19.211&n4; Hektör begs Achilles to return body for, 22.254–67, 337–60; 498; Hektör's, 2, 4; 24.785–804; human sacrifice, 6, 17; 18.336–37; 21.26–32; 23.22–23, 175–76; 491, 495; importance, 7.77–86; 13.465–67&n5; 23.71–76; 470, 499; Lefkandi burial, 521; Patroklos's, 17; 23.38–47, 110–57; 499; Sarpêdôn's body returned to Lycia for, 16.453–57, 666–83; 486; 518, 546, 547; truces for, 7.375–78, 394–96, 408–10, 424–36; 24.655–70, 777–81. See also burial mounds; funeral games

Furies (Erinyes), 15.124; 19.87–99, 418; 483, 492; 522; and elders' rights, 15.204; 483; 522; and oaths, 3.279; 19.259–60; 522; and parental curses, 9.454–57, 571–72; 21.412; 508, 522

Gaia, 531, 549, 551

Ganymêdês, 5.222n3, 266; 20.232–35; 522; Hêphaistos imitates, 1.595–600; 525

Gargaros, 8.48; 14.292–353; 15.152–53; 481; 528

Gerênia (Nestôr's birthplace), xiimap gift-giving and exchange: after inconclusive duel, 16; 7.299–305; 471; between guest-friends, 16; 6.230–36; 10.271n2; 15.532; 469

Gilgamesh, epic of, 8

Glaukos, son of Hippolochos, xiimap; 522; in Trojan Catalogue, 2.876–77; encounter with Diomêdês, 16; 6.119–236; 469; 522; in battle, 7.13–16; 12.101–4, 309–30, 387–93; 14.426; 17.216; 478, 482; and Sarpêdôn's death, 16.487–501, 508–47, 593–601; 17.140–68; 486, 487–88; 522

——, on Bellerophôn, 6.144–211; 514; and code of honor, 16; 6.215–36; 12.310–28; 522, 546

Glory. See Fame

gods, 16–18; amorality, 16, 17; 524, 554; and Fate, 16, 17; 2.155; 16.431–61; 17.231; 20.30; 21.517; 22.166–85; 521, 554–55; participate in fighting, 16, 18; 21.382–518; recognizable by nether extremities, 13.70–75&n1; transitional status, physical/metaphorical, 17–18. See also individual gods

golden objects: containers for bones, 23.91–92, 242–24; 24.795&n12; shields, (Achilles's), 18.478–608, (Nestor's), 8.192–93; spirals for binding hair, 17.52&n1

Gorgon, 5.741–42; 8.349; 11.36–37; 522

Gortyn, 2.646; 530

Graces, 5.338; 14.267–81; 17.51; 481; 522

guest-friendship, 16; Diomêdês and Glaukos, 6.119–236; 469; 522; gifts, 6.230–36; 10.271n2; 15.532; 469; Paris and Harpaliôn, 13.660–61; 480; ransoming of captives, 21.42–43; 23.746–47

Gygaian lake, 2.865; 20.390–91

Hādēs, 15.185–93; 520, 522–23, 531; Althaiē prays to, 9.569; cap of, 5.844–45&n9; fears earthquake, 20.61–65; 493; funeral rites needed to enter, 23.71–76; 499; Hēraklēs’s visit, 5.395–404&n7; 8.365–69; “horse-proud”, 5.654; 11.445; 16.625; implacability, 9.158–59; 523; insubstantiality of spirits in, 23.99–107; 499; Odysseus’s visit, 1.511; 536–37, 546, 550–51; Tartaros lies beneath, 8.16; 15.225n1; 523, 548

Halizōnēs, 2.856–57; 5.39

harvest, 11.64–71; 18.550–72. See also under similes head as summation of individual, 22n; 8.281; 11.55 healing, healers, 4.188–219; 5.445–48; 11.828–48; 15.393–94; 16.28–29. See also Asklēpios; Cheirōn; Machaōn; Paieōn; Podaleirios

Hēbē, 4.2–3; 5.722–23, 904–5

Hecuba. See Hekabē

Hegesias of Salamis, 6

Hekabē, 523, 544; exposes Paris at birth, 523, 529, 540; sacrifice to Athēnē, 6.251–312; 469; pleads in vain with Hektōr, 22.79–92; 497; and Hektōr’s death, 22.405–7, 430–35; 24.193–216, 283–98, 710–13, 747–60; 499, 502, 503, 504; 523

Hekamēdē, 11.624–28, 638–41; 14.6–7; 477, 480

Hektōr, 523–24; orders Trojans to arms, 2.803–4; rebukes Paris, 3.38–57; 465; and Paris’s duel with Menelaōs, 3.76–94, 314–25; 466; Sarpēdōn rebukes, 5.471–93; 468; 546; rallies Trojans, 5.494–96; 468; fights with Arēs’s support, 5.590–606, 608–10, 679–710; 468; rallies troops, 6.75–85, 102–18; 469; orders sacrifice to Athēnē, 6.86–101, 237–85; 469; goads Paris into fighting, 6.312–68; 470; last meeting with Andromachē and son, 6.365–493; 490; goes with Paris into battle, 6.514–29; 7.1–16; 470; duel with Aias, 7.37–199, 206–312; 470–71; fights Nestōr and Diomēdēs, 8.87–90, 109–29, 145–66, 172–97; 471–72; attacks Achaian camp, 8.212–16, 299–349; 472; tells assembly of plan to attack next day, 8.489–541; 472; and Dolōn, 10.299–337, 391–93, 401–4; 475; Zeus holds back, 11.163–64, 181–209; 476; attack on Achaian camp, 11.284–309, 343–67, 497–503, 521–43; 12.37–59, 80–92, 196–251, 437–68; 13.136–55, 183–93, 674–88, 748–73, 802–32; 14.388–91, 402–8; 476, 478, 479, 480, 482; knocked unconscious by Aias, 14.409–39; 15.9–15; 482; in battle at ships, 15.306, 329–31, 346–53, 415–18, 422–35, 458–74, 484–500, 515–16, 545–59, 583–84, 603–52, 688–95, 699–725; 16.77–79, 114–16, 358–63, 367–71; 483, 484, 485, 486; in battle over body of Sarpēdōn, 16.536–63, 577–80, 588, 656–58; 486; kills Patroklos, 2, 18; 16.726–867; 487; advances on Menelaōs, 17.82–88; 487; Glaukos upbraids, 17.140–82; 487–88; 522; in battle over body of Patroklos, 17.183–232, 262, 304–11, 483–96, 512–13, 525–36, 582–92, 601–17, 753–54; 18.149, 154–65; 488, 489, 490; rejects Poulydamas’s advice to retreat, 18.284–313; 491; Achilles determined to fight, 18.91–93, 333–37; 20.75–78; 493; in battle, 20.364–72, 375–80, 419–54; 494; fights Achilles until gods intervene, 20.419–54; 494; awaits Achilles outside city, 22.5–6, 25–130; 497–98; flees from him, 22.131–66, 188–207; 498; 524; Zeus abandons thoughts of saving, 22.177–85, 208–13; 498; killed by Achilles, 2; 22.248–366; 498; foretells Achilles’s death, 4; 22.358–60; 506, 521, 540; abuse of corpse, 2; 22.337–60, 367–75, 395–405; 23.21, 24–26, 182–83; 24.14–22, 755–56; 499, 501, 502, 504; 506; lamentation for, 22.405–515; 24.160–68; 499, 502; gods preserve corpse, 23.184–91; 24.14–22, 405–23, 757; 499, 501, 502, 504; 510; gods consider stealing body, 24.23–76; 527, 544; Zeus orders Achilles to ransom body, 2; 24.64–92, 103–19, 133–40; 501–2; 506, 542, 543–44, 555; Priam fetches body, 2, 8n; 24.469–676, 696–70; 502–3; 506, 545; mourning, 24.710–12, 719–76; 503–4; 523, 524; truce for funeral, 24.655–70, 777–81; 504; funeral rites, 2, 4; 24.785–804

—, and Achilles, 9.303–6, 350–56, 649–55; 18.91–93, 333–37. See also events above; has Achilles’s armor, 17.183–214, 450; 18.21, 82–85, 130–33; 488, 490; and Andromachē, 6.399–493; 22.470–72; 523, 524; Athēnē helps Achilles against, 16; 15.70–71, 613–14; 22.177–87, 214–17, 226–47, 276–77, 293–99; 482, 484, 498; 518; and code of honor, 16;

Hektōr (continued)

- 6.429–46; 7.83–91; 2.87–312; 22.38–130; 523, 544–45; and fame, 6.443–46; 7.83–91; 523; fate, 8.473–77; 15.65–69; 613–14; 16.656–58; 851–54; 22.5–6; gods intervene to save, 15.458–74; 4.84–93; 718–25; 20.375–80; 419–54; 494; and Helen, 6.343–68; 22.111–21; 24.767–72; 504; 524; horses, 8.185–97; ignores warnings, 12.223–27; 18.267–72; 2.84–313; 22.99–107; 524; leader of Trojans, xiimap; 2.816–17; lineage, 20.203–41; and omen, 12.196–251; shame (aidōs), 6.429–46; 22.38–93; 523. See also under Hekabē; Helen; Zeus
- Helen, 524; suitors' oath to recover if abducted, 524, 529; elopement with Paris, 3; 24.765&nn1; 529, 533; comes to watch Paris fight Menelaōs, 3.121–45; 466; points out Achaian leaders to Priam, 3.154–80; 198–202; 228–42; 466; clash with Aphroditē, 3.380–420; 524; scene with Paris, 3.421–48; 466; 509, 540; urging Paris to battle, 6.337–39; reproaches herself to Hektōr, 6.343–68; 470; Hektōr considers offering to return, 22.111–21; 498; mourns Hektōr, 24.761–75; 504; 524; marriage to Deiphobos, 518; and fall of Troy, 5, 6; 553; later life with Menelaōs, 524, 533, 553
- , and Aphroditē, 3.380–420; 24.26n1; 524, 529; beauty, 3.154–60; domestic life, 6.323–24; 470; later tradition that phantom went to Troy, 524; Paris irresistible to, 24.26n1; 509, 524; and Priam, 3.161–70; 24.770; 544; property, 3, 2.111–21; 3.67–72; 88–93; 7.389–91; 400; 465, 471; 524. See also Judgment of Paris
- Helenos, a Boiōtian, 5.707–9; 514
- Helenos, son of Priam: in battle, 12.94–95; 13.576–600; 758; 781–83; 478, 480; Priam scolds, 24.248–64; 502; as seer, 5; 6.75–101; 7.44–53&nn1; 469, 470
- Helikē, 2.575; 8.203; 20.404–5&n9
- Hēlios, 8.480; 14.344–45
- Hellas, 2.683–85; 9.395; 447; 478; 16.595; 524, 536, 550
- Hellespont, xiiimap; 2.845; 7.86; 9.360; 15.233; 24.346; 545; 524, 547, 551; ships beached by, 12.30; 15.233; 17.432; 18.150; 23.2
- helmet, boar-tusk, 14; 10.261–71&nn2; 533
- Hēphaistos, 525; smooths over quarrel between Zeus and Hērē, 1.571–600; 464; protects Idaios, 5.22–24; makes armor for Achilles, 18.130–47; 368–617; 19.364–86; 490, 491–92, 493; supports Achaians in battle, 20.36–37; 493; fights Xanthos/Skamandros, 20.73–74; 21.328–82; 493, 496; 525, 547
- , buildings on Olympos, 1.605–8; 14.166–68; 338–40&nn1; 20.11–12; 539; Diomēdēs's corselet made by, 8.194–95; and Hērē, 14.166–68; 238–41; 338–40&nn1; 18.395–97; 525; humor, 1.595–600; 464; 525; robots, 18.417–21; 525; self-propelling tripods, 18.373–80; 525; thrown from Olympos, 1.590–94; 18.394–409; 491; 525, 531; Zeus's scepter and aegis made by, 2.100–102; 15.307–10; 525
- Hēraklēs, 525–26; birth, 14.323–24; 19.95–125; 508, 525; death, 18.115–19; 525; descendants, 2.658–60; 678–79; 525; and Hādēs, 5.395–404&n7; 8.365–69; and Hērē, 5.392–94; 11.690–93; 14.249–61&n7; 15.18–31; 18.119; 19.96–124; 481, 482; 521, 525; and Kopreus, 15.639–40; in Pylos, 5.397&n7; 11.690; 537; and Troy, 5.638–42&n8; 648–51; 14.250–51; 20.143–48&n5; 494; 525–26, 531, 548; Twelve Labors 5.395–404&n7; 8.365–69&n1; 15.30; 639; 19.114–24; 132–33&n3; 508, 521, 525
- heralds, 526; and assemblies, 2.50–52; 96–98; 18.503–5; 526; embassies and missions, 1.318–48; 9.170; 24.149–51; 281–82; 526; inviolability, 4.192; 526; and religious rites, 3.116–20; 9.174; 18.558–59; 19.196–97; 250–51; 492; 526; and warfare, 2.442–44; 7.273–82; 471; 526. See also Idaios; Odios; Periphas; Talthybios
- Hērē, 526; and plague in Achaian camp, 1.55–56; prevents Achilles killing Agamemnōn, 1.195–96; 208–9; prevents Achaian flight, 2.155–65; 464; argues with other gods, 4.1–73; 466; supports Menelaōs, 4.7–10; 466; intervenes in battle, 5.711–91; 907–9; 468, 469; criticizes Poseidōn, 8.198–207; 472; rouses Agamemnōn, 8.218–19; Zeus prevents from intervening, 8.350–483; 472; 526; seduces Zeus to distract him,

- 14.153–353; 481; 510, 526, 528, 547, 555; and Zeus's anger at deception, 15.4–77; 482; tells gods of futility of resisting Zeus's plan, 15.78–112, 143–50; 482; dissuades Zeus from saving Sarpēdōn, 16.431–61; 486; 521, 546, 554; arouses Achilles, 18.168–86, 356–67; 19.407; 490, 491; supports Achaians, 20.33, 70–71; 21.6–7; 493; and Aineias's fight with Achilles, 20.112–31, 150–51, 309–17; 493, 494; and Hēphaistos's battle with Xanthos, 21.328–41, 367–84; 496; in fighting amongst gods, 21.412–14, 418–22, 434, 479–96; 496; and Achilles's treatment of Hektōr, 24.55–63; 501
- . and Achaians, 526. See also under events above; Argos, Sparta and Mykēnai dear to, 4.50–52; 526; and Judgment of Paris, 2–3, 17; 24.25–30&n1; 501; 526, 529, 554; Kronos's daughter, 4.59; 5.721; 8.383; 531; and thunder, 11.45; and Zeus, (attempts to bind him in fetters), 1.400, (on futility of opposing him), 8.426–32, 437–83; 15.78–112, 143–50; 472, 482; 526, (incestuous relationship), 14.295–96&n9, (opposition), 15.17–611; 4.1–73; 5.892–94; 8.407–8, 421–22, 437–83; 14.153–353; 464, 466, 481; 510, 526, 528, 547, 555, (punished by him over Hēraklēs), 15.18–31; 482; 526. See also under Aphroditē; Arēs; Hēphaistos; Hēraklēs; Iris; Poseidōn; Thetis
- Hermēs, 5.385–91; 16.181–86; 21.497–501; 526–27, 529; and Hektōr's corpse, 24.23–25, 71–72, 109; 501; 527; slayer of Argos, 2.103–4&n1; 24.153–54; 502; supports Achaians, 20.34–35, 72; 493; 527; takes Priam to Achilles, 24.153–54, 181–83, 253–54, 330–468, 677–95; 502; 527
- Herodotos, 9, 10–11
- heroes, heroic age, 527–28, 554. See also honor, code of
- Hēsionē, 5.640n8; 548
- hexameter, Homeric, 18–21
- Hiketáōn, 3.147; 20.238
- Hippodamas, 20.401–6; 494
- Hippodameia (name of Briseis in one tradition), 515
- Hippodameia, daughter of Anchīsēs, 13.429–33; 508
- Hippodameia, wife of Peirithoös, 1.268n6; 2.741–42
- Hippokoōn, 10.518–22; 476
- Hippolochos, father of Glaukos, 6.197, 206–10
- Hippolochos, a Trojan, 11.122–48; 476
- Hippochoös, son of Lēthos, 2.840–43; 17.217, 288–303, 313, 317–18; 488
- Hippochoös, son of Priam, 24.248–64; 502
- Hirē, 9.150, 292
- Hisarlik, 11; 553
- historicity of Homeric epics, 1, 11–17, 23; 551–52
- history, transition from myth to, 7, 10, 12, 23
- Hittite documents, 13, 14; 552–53. See also Ahhiya(wa); Alaksandu; Wilus(iy)a
- Homer: date, 1, 8, 10–11; 9.405n5; master poet theory, 1, 9–11; quality and reputation of epics, 7–8, 9–10
- Homeric Hymn to Pythian Apollo*, 11
- honor, code of, 23; 519–20, 527–28, 538; and archery, 538, 548; changing attitudes to, 15–16; 9.308–429; 519–20, 527; rewards and responsibilities, 12.310–28; 546. See also Fame; guest-friendship; shame; and under Achilles; Aias (1); Diomēdēs; Hektōr
- horses: of Adrēstos, 24.346–47; Rhēsos's white, 16; 10.436–37, 474–571; 475, 476; Poseidōn and, 544. See also under Achilles; Agamemnōn; Hādēs; Hektōr; Laomedōn; Pēleus; similes; Trōs, son of Erichthonios
- Hylē, 2.500; 5.708; 7.221
- Hyperēia, 2.734; 6.457
- Hyperēnōr, 14.516–19; 17.23–28, 34–40
- Hyperion, 8.480; 19.398
- Hypsēnōr, an Achaian, 13.409–23; 479

Iasos, 15.332, 336–37
 ichōr, 5.339–42, 416; 468 iconography, ancient, 7, 14
 Ida, Mt., xiiimap; 528; couplings on, 2.280–81; 4.475; 14.292–353; 481; 528; and Judgment of Paris, 2–3; 20.53n3; Poseidōn seated on, 13.13; Zeus seated on, 3.276; 8.47–52, 75, 170–71, 397; 11.181–94, 336–37; 12.252–53; 14.157–58; 15.5–12, 151–53; 17.593–96; 20.56–57; 24.308; 528
 Idaios, son of Dares, 5.9–14, 20–29
 Idaios, Trojan herald, 3.247–58; 7.273–86, 372–78, 381–420; 471; accompanies Priam to Achilles, 24.149–51, 281–28n5, 352–57, 470–71, 674; 502, 503; 526
 Idomeneus, 528; Helen points out, 3.230–33; Agamemnōn praises, 4.252–71; 528; in battle, 5.43–47; 6.435–39; 8.78, 263; 467; in council, 7.165; 10.53, 111–13; in battle, 11.501, 510–15; 12.116–17; 13.246–33, 361–488, 506–16; 16.345–50; 479–80, 485; fights over Patroklos's body, 17.258, 605–9, 620–25; 488, 489; tries to comfort Achilles, 19.309–11; 492; at funeral games, 23.450–98; 500
 ———, age, 13.361, 510–13; 528; aristeia, 13.361–454; 528; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.645–52; 530; descent from Zeus, 13.458–53; kingdom, xiiimap; and Poseidōn, 13.210–45 Ilion. See Troy
 Ilioneus, 14.489–505; 482
 Ilos, 20.232, 236; 552; burial mound, 10.414–16; 11.166, 370–71; 24.349
 Imbrios, 13.170–83, 197–205; 479
 Imbros, 13.32–38; 14.281–82; 21.43; 24.78, 751–53; 479 interpolation, possible, 2.557–58; 8.528&n2, 548, 550–52&n3; 9.458–61&n6; 10.191&n1, 531&n4; 11.543&n7; 14.317–18&n10; 16.614–15&n5; 20.269–72&n6, 281&n7; 24.558&n8; 545–46 invisibility, cap of, 5.844–45&n9
 Ionia, Ionians, xiiimap; 13.685–88; 480
 Ionian Islands/Sea, xiiimap; 528
 Ipheus, 16.416; 486
 Iphianassa, 9.144–47, 287&n4
 Iphidamas, 11.221–47, 257–63
 Iphigeneia: sacrifice at Aulis, 3–4, 6; 506–7, 514, 529–30; possible reference in Iliad, 7, 17; 1.106–8&n5; 9.287&n4
 Iphiklos, 2.704–5; 13.698; 23.636
 Iphitiōn, 20.382–95; 494
 Iphitos, 2.518; 17.306
 Iris, 528; cares for wounded Aphrodītē, 5.353, 365, 368–69; fetches winds to fan Patroklos's pyre, 23.198–211; 499; Hērē's messenger to Achilles, 18.166–202; 490; 528; tart additions to messages, 8.423–24; 15.159, 179–81; 528; Zeus's messenger to other gods, 8.397–425; 15.53–58, 143–219; 24.77–92, 95–97; 472, 482, 483, 501, 502; 528; Zeus's messenger to Troy, 2.786–807; 3.121–40; 11.181–209; 24.117–19, 143–87; 465, 466, 476, 501, 502; 528 iron objects, anachronistic, 23.261, 850–58; 499, 501; mass of pig iron, 13; 9.188n3; 23.826–35; 501; 520 Isandros, 6.197, 203–4
 Isos, 11.101–21; 476
 Ithākē (Ithaca), xiiimap; 3, 6, 11; 2.184, 632; 3.201; 528, 529, 538 Ixiōn, 14.317–18&n10

jars: with pointed foot, 23.170–71&n1; Zeus's, of ills and blessings, 24.527&n7 Jason, son of, of Lēmnos (Eunēos), 7.469; 21.41; 23.746–47

Judgment of Paris, 2-3, 6, 7, 8, 17; 20.53&n3; 24.25-30&n1; 501; 509, 524, 529, 543, 547-48, 554. See also under Athēnē; Hērē justice, dispensing of, 16.384-93; 18.496-508

Kadmeians, 4.385-98; 5.802-8; 10.286-88; 549

Kaineus, 1.264; 2.746

Kalchas, 529-30; at Aulis, 2, 3-4, 17; 1.68-100, 108n5; 2.299-330; 463, 465; 529-30; Agamemnōn's anger with, 17; 1.106-8; 507, 530; Poseidōn takes form of, 13.43-58, 70-72; 479

Kalētōr, 15.419-28; 484

Kallikolōnē, 20.53&n3; 151-52

Kalydōn, 2.640; 13.217; 14.116; boar hunt, 9.529-99; 474; 508, 532-33

Kapaneus, son of. See Sthenelos

Kapys, 20.239; 508

Kardamylē, 9.150, 292

Karia, Karians, 2.867-75; 4.141; 10.428; 515

Kassandrē, 6; 7.45n; 13.365-69, 376; 24.697-707; 479, 503; 507, 530

Kaukōnes, 10.429; 20.329

Kebrīones, 8.318-19; 11.521-32; 12.90-91; 13.790; 16.727-28, 736-83; 487

Keftiu (Egyptian term for Minoans), 533-34

Kephallēnia, Kephallēnians, 2.631; 4.330; 528, 529

Kēphisos, 2.522, 523; Kephisian lake, 5.709

kér. See Death-Spirit

kēr ("fate"): physicality, 15; 8.67-77; 471

Kerberos, 8.363-69n1

Kikonians, 2.846; 17.72

Killa, 1.37-38, 451-52

Kissēs, 6.299; 11.223-26

Kleitōs, 15.445-57; 484

Kleoboulos, 16.330-34; 485

Kleopatra, wife of Melcagros, 9.555-64

kléos. See Fame

Klonios, 2.495; 15.340

Klytaimnestra, 4; 1.113-15; 506, 514, 530

Klytios, brother of Priam, 3.147; 15.420, 427; 20.238

Knossos, *xiii*map; 2.646; 18.591-92; 530, 531-32, 534

Koiranos, a Kretan, 17.610-19; 489

Koön, 11.247-63; 19.52-53

Korfmann, Manfred, 551-52

Korinthos, 2.570; 13.664; 517. See also Ephyrē

Kōs, 2.677; 14.255&n7; 15.18-31; 482

Kourētēs, 9.529-99; 474; 532-33

Krētē (Crete), *xiii*map; 13.450-53; 530; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.645-52; 3.230-33; 4.251; 467; Minoan and Mycenaean culture, 532, 533-34, 535

Kronos, 531; abode in Tartaros, 8.479-81; 14.274; 15.225&n1; castration of Ouranos, 509; deviousness, 2.319; 4.59, 75; 9.37; 12.450; 16.431; 18.293; Hērē as daughter of, 4.59; 5.721; 8.383; 531; three sons shared out power, 15.187-99; 483; 522-23; Zeus's war against, 1.396-406; 14.203-4; 531, 550, 551

Kronos, son of. See Zeus

Kreatos, son of Aktōr, 11.709-10&n8, 750-52; 23.638-42&n7; Amphimachos as son of, 2.620-21; 13.186&n3

Kyknos, 14n

Kypris (title of Aphrodītē), 5.331–33&n4; 5.422, 458, 759, 883; 531
 Kythera, 10.268; 15.431–32, 438

 Lachmann, Karl, 10n
 Laertēs, 538; son of. See Odysseus Lakedaimōn, 2.581–90; 3.239, 244, 387, 443; 531, 532
 Lakōnia, xiimap; 531
 Lampos (Hektōr's horse), 8.185 Lampos, a Trojan, 3.147; 15.526; 20.238 languages, 9, 16n4; of Linear A and B scripts, 532; of Trojan forces, 16n14; 2.867; 4.433–38; 467; 515
 Laodameia, 6.197–99; 546
 Laodikē, daughter of Agamemnōn, 9.144–47, 287&n4
 Laodikē, daughter of Priam, 3.121–24; 6.252
 Laogonos, 16.603–7; 20.460–62; 486, 494
 Laomedōn, 531; cheats Poseidōn and Apollo, 17; 7.451–53&n2; 12.3–33; 20.145–48&n5;
 21.441–60; 471, 496; 510, 531, 544, 552, 554; and Hēraklēs, 5.638–42&n8, 648–51; 20.145–48&n5; 526, 531; horses, 5.269–70, 640&n8; 20.148n5; 23.347–48; 522, 531; lineage, 6.23–26; 20.236–37; 507–8, 517, 548
 Laothoē, 21.85–89, 95; 22.48
 Lapiths, 12.127–61, 181–94; 478
 Lárissa, 2.841; 17.301
 Lattimore, Richmond, 18–19, 21
 Lefkandi, 521
 Lēitos, 2.494; 6.35–36; 13.91; 17.601–5; 489
 Leleges, 10.429; 20.96; 21.86
 Lēmnos, xiiimap; 8.230; 14.230, 281; 481; 531; Hēphaistos and, 1.592–93; 525, 531; Philoktetes left on, 5, 7; 2.721–25; 516, 531; trade in wine and slaves, 7.467–75; 21.39–41, 58, 79; 24.751–53; 495; 531
 Leonteus, 2.745–46; 12.127–61, 188–94; 23.837, 841; 478, 501
 Lesbos, xiiimap; 4; 9.128–30, 270–73, 664–65; 24.544; 531
 Leschēs of Mytilēnē, 6–7
 Lēthos, 2.843; 17.288
 Lētō, 4; 5.447–48; 14.327; 20.40, 72; 21.497–504; 24.607–8; 493, 496; 510; child of. See Apollo
 Leukē (White Island), 5; 505, 551
 Leukos, 4.489–93
 levirate marriage, 5n; 518
 Lewis, C. Day, 20–21
 libations, 1.469–71; 16.220–56; 485
 Linear A, 532
 Linear B, 9, 13; 531–32; and Catalogue of Ships, 516; evidence on society and economy, 13; 532, 552; gods mentioned, 512, 510, 520, 522, 526, 539, 544; place-names, 2.500n3; 531 linen, oiling of, 18.595–96&n6 Linos Song, 18.571&n5 lions, 18.579–86. See also under similes lists of contingents: Achaian Catalogue of Ships, 2.484–759; 465; Trojan Catalogue, 2.815–77; 465
 literary qualities of Homeric epics, 7–8, 10 Little Iliad, 6–7
 livestock, 18.541–72; 23.845–46&n12. See also relevant items under similes Lokris, Lokrians, 2.527–35; 13.685–88, 712–22; 480; 532

Longinus, 16
 lots, drawing of, 7.175–83; 23.352–4, 861–62 Lycia, Lycians (Hittite Lukka), *xiii*map; 532, 546; Bellerophōn in, 6.168–95; 514; contingent at Troy, 2.876–77; 5.673–80; 6.78–79; 10.430; 12.290–436; 17.140–68; 551; Pandaros falsely associated with, 5.105, 173; 539; Sarpēdōn's body returned to, 16.436–37, 454–57, 666–83; 486; 518, 546, 547. See also Glaukos, son of Hippolochos; Sarpēdōn
 Lykaōn, father of Pandaros, 5.193, 197–201, 246
 Lykaōn, son of Priam, 3.333; 20.81; 21.34–136; 22.46–53; 23.746–47; 493, 495, 497
 Lykomēdēs, 9.83; 12.366; 17.345–49; 19.240
 Lykōn, 16.335–41; 485
 Lykophrōn, 15.429–40; 484
 Lykourgos, son of Dryas, 6.130–40; 7.142–49 Lyktos, 2.647; 17.611
 lyre-playing, 1.603; 9.186–94; 24.62–63; 510, 520, 542
 Lyrnessos, 2.688–93; 20.92, 187–94; 465; 515, 551

 Macháōn, 5, 17; 2.731–32; 4.193–219; 467; wounded, 11.504–20, 597–643, 663–64, 833–35; 14.1–7; 477, 480
 Maiōn, 4.393–98
 Maiōnia, Maiōnians, 2.864–66; 3.401; 4.141; 10.431; 18.291
 Maris, 16.319–29; 485
 Marmor Parium, 12
 Marpeša, 9.557, 562–64
 marriage, levirate, sn; 518
 Martin, Richard, 23
 master poet theory of composition, I, g–II meat, roasting of, 9.206–17 medicine. See healing Medōn, son of Oīleus, 2.726–28; 13.693, 694–97; 15.332–36
 Medousa. See Gorgon
 Megēs, king of Doulichion, 2.627, 630; 5.69–75; 10.110; 13.692; 15.518–44; 16.313–16; 19.239; 484, 485; 528
 Mēkisteus, son of Echios, 8.332–34; 13.421–23; 15.338–39
 Mēkisteus, son of Talaos, 2.566; 6.27; 23.678
 Melanippos of Perkotē, 15.545–59, 575–83; 484
 Meleagros, 2.642; 9.529–99; 474; 508, 532–33
 Memnōn, son of Dawn, 4; 509, 517
 Menelaos, 533; marriage to Helen, 3; 533; earlier embassy to Troy, 3.204–15; 11.138–42; duel with Paris, 3.15–461; 465–66; 533, 540; arrow grazes, 4.92–219; 5.205–8; 466–67; in battle, 5.48–58, 560–89; 6.37–65, 435–39; 8.261; 467; 518; and Hektōr's challenge, 7.94–122; 470; and council, 10.25–71, 114–25, 229–30, 240; 474–75; in defense of camp, 11.463–88; 13.581–642; 14.516–19; 15.539–44, 568–72; 16.311–12; 477, 480, 482, 484; in battle over body of Patroklos, 17.1–81, 89–124, 138–39, 246–55, 507–11, 553–81, 626–27, 651–93, 702–46; 487, 488, 489; tries to comfort Achilles, 19.309–10; 492; at funeral games, 23.293–300, 355, 401, 407–47, 515–27, 566–613; 500; 533; later life with Helen, 6; 533, 547, 553
 ———. and Agamemnōn, 4.148–97; 6.53–65; 7.107–19; 467, 469, 470; 533; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.581–90; character, 533; and Idomeneus, 3.230–33; 528; kingdom, *xi*map; 533; on Priam's character, 3.105–10; 544
 Menestheus, 2.552–56; 4.327–63; 12.331–50; 13.195, 689–90; 467, 478 Menesthios, a Myrmidon, 16.173–78; 485

Menoitios, 9.202; 16.14–16; 18.324–27; 23.85–86; 491; 540; advice to Patroklos and Achilles, 11.765–68, 785–93; 477; 541 Mēriōnēs, 533; in battle, 4.254; 5.59–68; 8.263–64; 407; volunteers to fight Hektōr, 7.165–66; command of sentries, 9.83; 10.58–59; in council, 10.196–97, 228–29, 260–70; in defense of camp, 13.93, 156–68, 246–329, 479, 526–39, 567–75, 650–56; 14.514; 16.342–44; 479–80, 482, 485; in battle, 16.603–31; 17.258–59, 620–23, 668–72, 717–46; 486, 488, 489; 533; takes gifts to Achilles, 19.239; helps build Patroklos's pyre, 23.112, 123; in funeral games, 23.351, 356, 528–31, 614, 860, 870–82, 888, 893, 896; 500, 501 ———. antiquity, 533; boar-tusk helmet, 14; 10.261–71&n2; 533; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.650–51; likened to Enyalios, 2.651; 7.166; 8.264; 17.259; 520, 533 Merōps of Perkōtē, 2.830–34; 11.328–34&n; 476 Mesthlēs, 2.864–66; 17.216 metalworking, 18.372–80, 400–401, 410–20, 468–613. See also bowl, Sidonian silver; golden objects metre, 9, 18–21
 Milētos, Asia, xiiimap; 2.868
 Milētos, Krētē, 2.647
 Milton, John; Paradise Lost, 20
 Minoan civilization, 533–34
 Minōs, 13.450–51; 14.322; 530, 533, 534 Minotaur, 534
 mnemonics, 8
 Molos, 10.269–70; 13.249; 533; descendants of (Kteatos and Eurytos), 11.709–10&n8, 750–52; 23.638–42&n7 morality: Homeric gods, 16, 17; 524; Homeric treatment of earlier, 13, 17; 509, 513–14, 516, 524, 531; views of Homeric, in later antiquity, 13, 16, 17; 9.461n6; 524, 554 Morys, 13.792; 14.514 motivation, Homer's grasp of, 518, 542 Moulios, an Epeian, 11.739–43
 Muses, 5; 1.603–4; 2.594–600; 534–35, 542; appeals to, 2.484–92, 761–62; 11.218; 14.508; 16.112–13 music, 16.182–83; 18.493–96, 571&n6. See also lyre-playing Mycenaean civilization, 13; 535; bureaucracy supporting aristocratic society, 532, 552; collapse, 12, 13, 14, 15–16; 527, 535, 552; in Krētē, 530, 532, 534, 535. See also Linear B
 Mykēnai (Mycene), xiimap; 11, 13; 532, 535–36; Agamemnon's kingdom, xiimap; 2.576–80; 9.149–53, 291–95; 11.45–46; 511, 536; contingent at Troy, 3; 2.569; 15.638–52; 484; economy and society, 13; 11.46; 535; Hērē's patronage, 4.51–56; 466; 526; Linear B tablets, 13; 531–32; royal lineage, 2.100–108; 513–14; Tydeus visits, 4.376–77
 Mynēs, 2.692–93; 19.296
 Myrinē, burial mound of, 2.811–15
 Myrmidons, xiimap; 536; Achilles's contingent at Troy, 2.681–87, 773–79; 2.448–56; 502; origins, 9.184n2; 507; Patroklos to lead into battle, 16.38–39, 65, 155–220; 485; and Patroklos's death, 19.4–6; 23.4–34, 108–10; 492, 499; as Pēleus's subjects in general, 7.126; 16.15, 155; 21.118; 24.356; 536, 542 Mysians, 2.858–61; 10.430; 13.5; 14.512; 24.278 myths of Trojan War, 1–6; dates of origin, 7, 8, 12; 508; in Epic Cycle, 2–6, 6–7; expurgation of primitive, 13, 17; 509, 513–14, 516, 524, 531; in Iliad, 1–2; transition from historical myth to history, 7, 10, 12, 23 navigation, 14.225n6. See also ships Nēleus, 1.268n6; 11.597, 681–84, 696–705, 717–19; 537
 Neoptolemos (Pyrrhos), son of Achilles, 5, 6, 7; 19.326–33; 24.467&n6; 493; 536–37, 553

Nēreids, 18.38–53, 65–66, 139–45; 490; 537, 550. See also Thetis

Nēreus, 18.36, 141–42; 20.107–8; 550

Nestōr, 537; fails to reconcile Achilles and Agamemnōn, 1.247–84; 463; 537; and Agamemnōn's dream, 2.20–22, 76–84; 464; urges continuing war, 2.76–84, 336–68; 465; and battle, 4.292–325; 6.66–72; 467, 469; and duel with Hektōr, 7.123–60, 170–74, 181; proposes burial truce and building of wall, 7.324–43; 471; Diomēdēs rescues, 8.79–166, 191–92; 471–72; and embassy to Achilles, 9.52–78, 93–113, 162–73, 179–81; 473; 537; Agamemnōn seeks advice, 10.17–20, 72–127; 474, 475; and spying expedition, 10.203–17, 532–53; 475, 476; in battle, 11.501; returns, 11.510–20, 597–643; 477; urges on Patroklos, 11.655–803; 477; 541; acts to counter Achaian reverses, 14.1–134; 15.369–78, 659–67; 480, 483–84; tries to comfort Achilles, 19.311; 492; at funeral games, 23.304–50, 411–13, 615–50; 500 ———, advice to sons, 17.382–83; 23.304–50; 500; age, 537; capability as general, 2.555; 4.297–309; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.591–602; cup, 11.632–37; held in respect, 2.20–22; 23.615–50; 537; kingdom, xiimap; 545; loquacity, 537; shield, 8.191–92; 472; wisdom and persuasiveness, 1.246–49; 2.247–52; 537

Night [Nyx], 14.259–61

Niobē, 24.602–17&cn9; 503; 512

North Wind, 15.18–31; 23.192–218, 229–30; 482, 499

Nostoi (Returns), 6

novels, ancient Greek, 12

oak trees: by Skaian Gates, 5.693; 6.237; 7.22, 59–60; 9.354; 11.170; 21.549; 470, 497; 546; in proverb, 22.126&cn3 oaths: Agamemnōn's on Briseis, 19.175–76, 187–88, 258–68; 492; 515; Antilochos avoids, 23.441&ns, 581–85; before duel, 3.245–302; 466; gods', by Styx, 2.755; 14.272; 15.37–38; 548; Furies uphold sanctity, 3.78–79; 19.259–60; 522; Trojans' breaking of, 4.64–140, 155–68, 236–39, 269–71; 7.352–53

Ocean, 537–38, 551; absent from assembly on Olympos, 20.7; 493; and Bear constellation, 18.489; encircling stream around world, 1.423n8; 14.200–201; 16.151; 18.607–8; 537, 538; Hērē claims to be visiting, 14.200–210, 301–6; 481; peoples living near, 1.423&cn8; 3.5; 23.205–7; progenitor of gods, 14.245–46; on shield of Achilles, 18.607–8; source of rivers and sea, 21.195–99; sun rises and sets in, 7.421–22; 18.239–41; Thetis and Eurynomē live by, 18.402–3

Odios, Achaian herald, 9.170

Odios, leader of Halizōnēs, 2.856; 5.38–42

Odysseus, 538; takes Chryseis to father, 1.308–10, 430–87; 464; checks Achaian flight, 2.169–210; 464; and Thersitēs, 2.244–77; 465; 549–50; urges continuing war, 2.278–335; 465; Trojans identify from ramparts, 3.191–224; 466; at sacrifice, 3.268; Agamemnōn rebukes, 4.327–63; 467; in battle, 4.494–504; 5.668–80; 6.30–31; 8.90–98; 468, 469; volunteers to fight Hektōr, 7.168; embassy to Achilles, 9.162–657, 673–92; 473–74; 538; in council, 9.673–92; 10.109, 137–49, 231–32; 475; spying expedition, 15–16; 10.231–32, 241–53, 260–71, 277–82, 295–98, 339–571; 475–76; 538; takes Rhēsos's horses, 10.474–571; 476; in battle, 11.310–35, 346–47, 396–488; 476, 477; retires wounded, 11.661; 477; and attempt to counter Achaian reverse, 14.27–134, 379–87; 480–81, 481–82; out of action, 16.26–29; 485; and reconciliation of Achilles and Agamemnōn, 19.48–50, 154–95; 492; advises eating and drinking before battle, 19.155–72, 216–33; tries to comfort Achilles, 19.310; 492; at funeral games, 23.708–39, 755–83, 790–92; 500–501; and Achilles's death and funeral games, 4, 5

———, Athēnē's support, 5; 10.245, 274–82; 11.436–37; 23.768–74, 782–83; 475, 500–501; 513; and code of honor, 15–16; 538; and class distinctions, 2.188–206; 549–50; contingent at Troy, 2.631–37; 8.222–23; 11.5–6; eloquence, 3.204–24; 538; in Hādēs,

Odysseus (continued)

1.511; 536–37, 546, 550–51; kingdom, xiimap; 528, 529; and Neoptolemos, 5; 536–37; quick-wittedness, 3.200–202; 4.339; 9.313; 10.242–47; 527, 538; as warrior, 11.310–488; 538
Odyssey, 6, 7–8, 10; 1.511; 536–37, 553
 Oichalia, 2.596–97, 730
 Oidipous [Oedipus], 23.679–80&8; 500; 548, 549
 Oileus, sons of. See Aias (2); Medôn Oileus, a Trojan, 11.93–98; 476
 Oineus, 2.641–42; 6.216–21; 9.533–42, 581–83; 14.115–19; 474; 508
 Oinomaos, a Trojan, 12.140; 13.506–11
 Old Man of the Sea (Nēreus), 18.36, 141–42; 20.107–8; 550
 Ōlenian rock, 2.617; 11.757
 Olympus, 17; 8.393–95; 538–39, 550; Hēphaistos's buildings, 1.605–8; 14.166–68, 338–40&11; 20.11–12; 539
 omens. See under eagles; Hektōr; Trojan War; Zeus onomatopoeia and metre, 20 Opoeis, 2.531; 18.326; 23.85; 532, 540 oral tradition, 1, 8–9, 10, 12–17; transition to written culture, 8, 9, 10, 12, 14, 23 Orchomenos, Arkadia, 2.605
 Orchomenos, Boiōtia, 2.511–16; 9.381
 Orestēs, a Trojan, 12.139, 193
 Orestēs, son of Agamemnōn, 9.142–43, 284–85; 539 origins of Trojan War, 3, 6; 524, 529, 533
 Orīōn, 18.486, 488; 22.29; 517
 Ormenos, father of Amyntōr, 9.448; 10.266
 Othryoneus, 13.363–84; 479
 Ōtos, son of Alōeus, a Giant, 5.385–91&6 Ouranos, 5.370&5; 509; children, 531, 537, 549, 551 owl, 14.290–91&8

paean, 1.472–74; 22.391; 499; 539

Paīōn, Paean, god of healing, 5.401–2&8; 7, 899–904; 469; 539

Paīōnia, Paīōnians, 2.848–50; 10.428; 16.287–92; 17.350–51; 21.154–55, 205–11; 485 palace culture, 12, 15–16; 527, 532, 533–34, 535, 552; Priam's palace, 6.242–50

Pammōn, 24.248–64; 502

Pandaros, 17; 2.824–27; 4.85–147; 5.95–105, 166–237, 275–96, 795; 466–67; 539–40

Pandīōn, 12.372; 478

Panic, Rout (Phobos), 4.440; 5.739; 11.37; 13.299; 15.119; 482–83; 506, 511

Panopeus, Phōkis, 2.520; 17.306–7

Pánthoös, 3.146; 17.40; sons. See Euphorbos; Poulydamas

Paphlagōnians, 2.851–55; 5.777; 13.656–61

Paris/Aléxandros, 540; abducts Helen and goods, 3; 529, 540; duel with Menelaös, 3.15–383; 465–66; 509, 533, 540, 544, 545; Helen clashes with Aphrodītē over, 3.380–420; 524; scene with Helen, 3.421–48; 466; 509, 540; goaded into fighting, 6.312–68, 503–29; 7.1–16; 470; Achaians reject offer to return Helen's goods, 7.354–64, 388–93, 400–407; 471; in battle, 8.81; 11.368–95, 504–7, 581–84; 12.93; 13.489–95, 660–72, 764–89; 15.341–42; 471, 477, 478, 480, 483; helps load ransom, 24.248–64;
 502; kills Achilles, 4; 22.358–60; 498; 506, 540; death and burial, 5

—, as Alaksandu of (W)ilus(iy)a, 14; 540, 553; as Aléxandros, 3; 540; archer, 11.370–83, 504, 581; 540; arms for battle, 3.328–38; 466; character, 540; exposed at birth, 3; 523, 529, 540; guest-friendship with Harpalīōn, 13.660–61; 480; hated by Greeks and Trojans, 3.453–54; 466; Helen's inability to resist, 24.261n; 509, 524;

- Helen's regrets over, 24.763–64; prophecy of bringing disaster on city, 3; 523, 529; as spearman, 12.93; 13.660–72; 15.341–42; 540. See also Judgment of Paris
- Pasithēē, 14.267–81; 481; 522
- Patroklos, 540–42; attends Achilles, 1.337–38, 345–47; 9.190–91, 195, 201–20, 620–21, 658–62, 666–68; 11.599–617; 19.315–17; 477, 492–93; visit to Nestōr, 11.599–617, 644–803; 477; 541; dresses Eurypylos's wound, 11.809–48; 15.390–404; 477, 484; Zeus predicts death, 15.64–69; 482; Achilles agrees to let go into battle in his armor, 2; 16.1–100, 124–29; 485; 541; prepares for battle, 16.129–54, 218–19, 240–52; 485; in battle, 16.268–311, 372–507; 485, 486; kills Sarpēdōn, 16.419–507; 486; 521, 546; and battle over Sarpēdōn, 16.553–61, 581–87, 626–32, 664–65; 486; Zeus incites to chase enemy, 16.644–58, 684–97; 486; turned back by Apollo, 14n; 16.698–711; 486–87; 510, 541; killed by Hektōr, 2, 18; 16.726–867; 487; 521; fatally weakened by Apollo, 16, 18; 16.786–806, 844–49; 19.411–14; 487; 510; battle over body, 8.473–77; 17.1–761; 487–89; 541; Achilles hears of death, 18.1–147; 490; body retrieved, 18.148–238; 490; 533; mourning for, 18.234–35, 314–55; 19.4–6, 282–337; 23.4–23; 491, 492, 493, 499; 541–42; Thetis preserves body, 19.23–39; 492; Achilles as avenger, 22.330–36; preparations for funeral, 22.385–90; 23.4–23, 38–53; 499; ghost comes to Achilles, 23.59–107; 499; 541; funeral rites, 17; 23.38–47, 110–257; 499, (human sacrifice), 6, 17; 18.336–37; 21.26–32; 23.22–23, 175–76; 491, 495; funeral games, 23.257–897; 499–500; Achilles drags body of Hektōr round tomb, 2; 24.14–22, 50–52, 416–17, 755–56; 501, 504; 506; Achilles asks pardon for ransoming Hektōr's body, 24.592–95
- , Achilles's bones to be buried with those of, 23.82–92, 235–48; 499; as Achilles's squire, 1.337–38; 9.190–91, 195, 201–20, 620–21, 658–62, 666–68; 11.599–617; 19.315–17; 477, 492–93; 541; aristeia, 2; 16.130–54, 364–507, 553–87, 684–857; 512, 541; bellicosity, 11.604; 541; and Briseis, 1.337–38, 345–47; 19.287–300; 515, 541; character, 541–42; childhood, 23.85–88; 532, 540–41, 542; death brings Achilles back into conflict, 2; 8.473–77; 505–6, 541–42; fate, 8.473–77; 16.644–58; 486; foretells Hektōr's fate, 16.851–54; 521; gentleness, 17.204, 668–72; 19.295–300; 23.281–82; 541; and Lykaōn's ransom, 23.746–47; Menoitios's advice before war, 11.765–68, 785–93; 477; 541
- Pēdasos, a Trojan, 6.20–28
- Pēdasos, horse of Achilles, 9.188n3; 16.152–54, 466–76; 485, 486
- Pēdasos, Peloponnese, 9.152, 294
- Pēdasos, Troad, 6.34–35; 20.92; 21.87
- Peirithōs, 1.263, 268n6; 2.740–46; 14.317–18&n10; son. See Polypoitēs
- Peirōs, Peirōos, 2.844; 4.519–20, 524–25, 527–38
- Peisandros, a Myrmidon, 16.193–95; 485
- Peisandros, son of Antimachos, 11.122–48; 476
- Peisandros, another Trojan, 13.601–42; 480
- Pelagōn, a Lycian, 5.692–95; 468
- Pelasgians, 2.840–43; 10.429
- Pēlēgōn, 21.140–41, 159–60
- Peleus, 542; Achilles speaks of, 9.394; 16.14–16; 18.330–32; 19.321–25, 334–37; 24.534–42; 503; Achilles weeps for, 24.485–92; 503; advice to Achilles, 9.252–59; 11.783–84; 473; 542; and Cheirōn, 16.143; 542; and Epeigeus, 16.574; horses, 16.380–81, 867; 17.443–47; 23.277–78; 542; lineage, 20.206–7; 21.187–89; 507; marriage to Thetis, 2; 18.83–87, 432–35; 24.58–63; 490, 491, 501; 542, 543, 547–48, 550, 554; Nestōr on, 7.125–31; 11.765–90; 477; and Phoinix, 9.438–42, 478–84; 474; 543; and Patroklos, 23.89–90; 540–41; pride in Argives, 7.125–31; spear, 16.141–44; 19.387–91; 516; twice exiled for murder, 542; vow for Achilles's return, 23.144–49. See also Achilles (armor, formerly Pēleus's); and under Myrmidōns
- Pelion, Mt., 1.268n6; 2.744, 757–58; 16.143–44; 19.390–91; 485; 543, 550

Peloponnese, xiimap; 535, 543
 Pelops, 2.104–5; 513, 527
 Pēneios, river, 2.752–54, 757
 Peneleōs, 2.494; 13.92; 14.487–505; 16.335–41; 17.597–600; 482, 485, 489; 514
 Penthesilea, 4
 Pergamon, 5.445–48, 460; 468
 Pergamos, 6.513&cn2; 7.21
 Periphas, a Trojan herald, 17.322–34; 488
 Periphētēs, from Mykēnai, 15.638–52; 484
 Periphētēs, a Trojan, 14.515
 Perkōtē, 2.835; 6.30; 11.228–29; 15.548
 Persephonē, 9.457, 569
 Perseus, 14.320; 19.116, 124&cn2; 522
 Peteōs, son of. See Menestheus
 Phainōps, father of Phorcys, 17.312
 Phainōps, father of Xanthos and Thoas, 5.152–58
 Phainōps, son of Asios, 17.583–83; 489
 Phaistos, Krētē, 2.648; 530
 Phalkēs, 13.791; 14.513
 Pherai, Peloponnese, 9.151, 293
 Phereklos, 5.59–68
 Philistines, 546
 Philoktētēs, 5, 7; 2.716–25; 515–16, 531
 Phobos. See Panic
 Phoenicians, 8; 14.225n6; 23.743–45
 Phoinix, 543; embassy to Achilles, 9.168, 182n1, 223, 427–622, 658–62, 689–92; 473, 474; goes into battle, 16.196; 485; Athēnē takes form of, 17.555–66; 489; tries to comfort Achilles, 19.311; 492; at funeral games, 23.359–61 ———. Achilles's tutor, 9.438–43, 485–95; 516, 543; early life, 9.444–84; 543; on Kalydōnian boar hunt, 9.529–99; 532
 Phōkians, 2.517–26; 15.515–16; 17.307
 Phorbas, father of Ilioneus, 14.490
 Phorbas of Lesbos, 9.665 Phorkys, 2.862; 17.218, 312–18; 488 phrenes (lungs), 16.481&cn2
 Phrygia, Phrygians, 2.862–63; 3.184–87, 401; 10.431; 16.719; 18.291; Priam's connections, 3.184–87; 24.544–46; 523
 Phthiē, Phthiōtis, xiimap; 9.184n2; 507, 536, 543, 550; Achilles's home, 1.155; 9.253; 16.13–16; 19.298, 321–25, 328–37; 543; Achilles plans return to, 1.169; 9.363, 395; contingent at Troy, 2.683; 13.685–88, 693–700; Phoinix's life in, 9.479–84; 474 Phylakē, 2.695, 700–701; 13.696; 15.334–35
 Phylakos, grandfather of Podarkēs, 2.705; 13.698
 Phylas, 16.181, 191–92
 Phyleus, 2.628–29; 15.529–34; 23.637; son. See Megēs physicality of non-material concepts, 17–18; 1.4&cn1; 24.527&cn7; 510 pitthoi. See jars plague, 2; 1.8–12, 43–100, 380–85, 447–57; 7.453n2; 463, 464; 510, 529
 Plakos, Mt., 6.396–97, 425; 22.479; 549
 Plan of Zeus, 3, 16, 17; 15; 463; 543–44, 554
 Plato, 16; 14.318n10; 24.527n7
 Plato, pseudo-: Alcibiades II, 8.552n3
 Pleiadēs, 18.486

Pleurōn, 2.639; 13.217; 14.116 plot of Iliad, 1–2
 Plow (constellation), 18.487
 Plutarch, 9.461n6; 11.543n7; 545–46
 Podaleirios, son of Asklēpios, 2.731–32; 11.833–36
 Podargē (Achilles's horse), 16.150–51; 19.400n5
 Podargos (Hektōr's horse), 8.185
 Podargos (Menelaos's horse), 23.295
 Podarkēs, 2.704–7; 13.693, 697–98 Podēs, 17.575–81, 588–90; 489 poison: arrows, 17; 4.150&n2; 467; 540; snake venom, 22.93–93&n2 Politēs, 2.784–809; 13.533–39; 15.339–40; 24.248–64; 465, 480, 483, 502
 Polydōros, Nestōr's contemporary, 23.637
 Polydōros, son of Priam, 20.407–23; 21.89–91; 22.46–53; 494, 497
 Polyidos, a Korinthian seer, 13.663, 665–68
 Polymēlē, 16.180–86, 190
 Polymēlos, 16.417; 486
 Polyneikēs, 4.377; 548, 549
 Polypoitēs, 2.740–44; 6.29; 12.127–61, 181–87; 23.836, 844–49; 478, 501 polytropos (“of many wiles”), Hermēs and Odysseus as, 527 Polyxeinē, 6
 Pope, Alexander, 20
 Poseidōn, 544; supports Achaians, 13.10–125, 206–38, 554–63, 674–77; 14.135–52, 354–93, 508–10; 15.8; 479, 480, 481–82; Zeus has him desist, 15.8, 41–46, 157–219; 482, 483; at assembly of gods, 20.13–18; 493; supports Achaians, 20.34, 57–65, 67–68; 493; and Aineias's fight with Achilles, 20.131–50, 291–339; 493–94; reassures Achilles, 21.284–97; 495; in fighting amongst gods, 20.132–43; 21.435–69; 496; 544; and Hektōr's corpse, 24.25–26; 501; 544; destroys Achaian wall, 12.13–34; 477–78; 544
 ———. active support for Achaians, 13.10–38, 43–75, 83–125, 206–38, 351–60, 676–78; 14.357–60; 544; Aias (2) killed by, 507; and Aineias's destiny, 20.290–308, 318–40; 517, 544; and Amphimachos, 13.185–68&n3, 206–7; 479; and earthquakes, 20.57–65; 493; 544; and Epeian-Pylian war, 11.728, 751–52; and Fate, 20.290–308, 318–40; 544; and Helikē, 20.404–5&n9; and Hērē, 1.396–404; 8.198–207; 20.309–17; 472; 494; 526; and Idomeneus, 13.210–38, 240–45; and Laomedōn, 17; 7.451–53&n2; 12.3–33; 20.145–48; 21.441–57; 471, 496; 544; and magic, 13.434–38, 562–63; 544; Onchēstos as grove of, 2.506; in tripartite division of world, 15.185–93; 522–23; and Zeus, 1.400&n7; 8.198–11; 13.10–38, 59–79, 206–39, 345–60; 15.185–93, 205–19; 472; 522–23, 544, 555; and wall round Achaian camp, 7.445–64; 12.13–34; 471, 477–78; 544; walls of Troy built by Apollo and, 7.451–53&n2; 21.441–60; 471, 496; 552
 Poulydamas: advice to Hektōr, 12.196–229; 13.723–53; 18.249–313; 22.99–103; 478, 480, 490–91, 497; in battle, 11.57; 12.60–80, 88–90, 108–9, 196–229; 13.756–57, 790; 14.425, 449–74; 15.338–39, 446, 453–57, 518–22; 16.535; 17.597–600; 478, 482, 483, 484, 489
 Prayers of Repentance, 9.502–7; 474
 predestination. See Fate
 Priam, 544–45; Helen points out Achaian leaders to, 3.146–244; and duel between Paris and Menelaos, 3.105–10, 181–98, 225–27, 245–313; 466; 544, 545; and peace treaty, 3.250–302; 544; and burial truce, 7.365–78, 427; 471; admits fleeing Trojans to city, 21.526–36; 497; pleads with Hektōr not to face Achilles, 22.25–78; 497; 544–45; lamentation for Hektōr, 22.408; 24.162–65; 502; determination to ransom Hektōr's body, 22.408, 411–28; 24.117–19, 143–321; 499, 501, 502; 528, 545; journey to Achaian camp, 24.322–468; 502; 527; meeting with Achilles, 8n; 24.469–676; 502–3; 506, 545; and truce for Hektōr's funeral, 24.655–70, 777–81; 504; death, 6, 7; 24.467n6; 536–37

Priam (continued)

———. age, 544; and Amazons, 3.186–89; 508; character, 3.105–10, 161–65; 20.179–83; 22.33–76; 24.770; 544–45; and Helen, 3.161–70; 24.770; 544; and Imbrios, 13.176; kingdom, xiiimap; lineage, 20.237; 517, 552; marriages, 21.88; 523, 544; and Melanippos, 15.551; and Othryoneus, 13.363–84; 479; palace, 6.242–50; rivalry with family of Aineias, 13.459–61&n4; 20.179–83, 305–8; 494; 552

Proitos, 6.157–70, 176–77

Promachos, 14.476–85, 503–4; 482

Pronoös, 16.399–401; 486 prophets, prophecy: death of seers' sons, 11.331n4; 13.663, 665–68; gift of Apollo, 1.68–75; 530. See also Helenos, son of Priam; Kalchas; Polyidos

Protesilāos, 11–12; 2.695–702, 707–9; 465; 515–16; fighting near ship of, 13.679–85; 15.699–725; 16.286; 484

Prothoēnōr, 2.496; 14.449–57, 471; 482

Prothoös, 2.756, 758

psyche (“soul”): physical connotation of “breath”, 15 purification rites, 4; 1.313–17; 463; 522, 542

Pygmies, 3.1–7

Pylaimenēs, 2.851–52; 5.576–79; 13.643–45, 658

Pylos, xiiimap; 545; Agamemnōn's possessions bordering, 9.153, 295; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.591; 545; Hēraklēs in, 5.397&n7; 11.690; 537; king. See Nestōr; Mycenaean civilization, 11, 13; 532, 535; wars in Nestōr's youth, 7.133–56; 11.670–761; 477

Pyraichmēs, 2.848–50; 16.287–92; 485

Pyrrhos. See Neoptolemos

Pythō (Delphi), 2.519; 9.405&n5; 510

quality of Homeric epics, views in antiquity, 7–8, 9–10 quantity, metrical, 19, 20 ransom: Achilles's, of captives, 11.104–6, 111–12; of Chryseīs, 1–2; 1.8–42, 308–10, 430–47; 463, 464; 516–17, 539; of guest-friends, 21.42–43; 23.746–47; of Hektōr's body, 2, 8n; 24.469–676, 696–70; 502–3; 506, 545

reification of non-material concepts, 17–18; 1.4&n1; 24.527&n7; 510

religion, 16–18. See also gods; sacrifice repetitive phrases, and oral tradition, 8 return home of Greeks; accounts in Nostoi, 6

Rhadamanthys, 14.322; 534, 545

Rhea, 14.203; 15.187; 531, 544

Rhēsos, Thracian king, 16; 10.433–41, 474–571; 475; 476; 519, 520

Rhigmos, 20.484–87; 494

Rhodes, Rhodians, xiiimap; 2.653–70

robots, Hēphaistos's golden, 18.417–21; 525

Route, Panic (Phobos), 4.440; 5.739; 11.37; 13.299; 15.119; 482–83; 506, 511

Rumor, 2.93–94; 464

Sack of Ilium, 7

sacking of cities, 4; Priam describes, 22.61–65; 497; of Troy, (by Achaians), 6, 7, (by Hēraklēs), 5.638–42&n8, 648–51; 14.250–51; 525–26, 548. See also Achilles (sacks cities) sacrifice, 4; 1.428–92; 2.402–31; 3.245–302; 19.196–97, 250–68; 23.266–76; human, 6, 17; 18.336–37; 21.26–32; 23.22–23, 175–76; 491, 495

Salamis, xiiimap; 2.557–58; 7.199; 545–46, 548

Samē (Kephallenia), 2.634; 528, 529

Samos, *xiii*map; 2.4.751–53
 Samothrakē, 13.11–19
 Sangarios river, 3.187; 16.719
 Sappho, i8n
 Sarpēdōn, *xiii*map; 546; rebukes Hektōr, 5.471–92; 468; 546; in battle, 5.628–67, 682–98; 12.101–4, 290–330, 392–414; 14.426; 468, 478, 482; 546; death, 15.67; 16.419–507; 486; 546; battle over body, 16.508–665; 17.149–65; 486; body wafted away to Lycia, 16.436–37, 454–57, 666–83; 486; 518, 546, 547
 ———. armor, 12.294–97; 23.798–810; in Catalogue of Ships, 2.876–77; and code of honor, 16; 12.310–28; 546; parentage, 6.198–99, 205; 512; Zeus protects, 5.662; 12.402–3; 546; Zeus considers overriding fate, 17; 16.433–57; 521, 546, 554–55
 Satniōeis river, 6.34–35; 14.444–45; 21.87 Satnios, 14.442–48; 482 scales, 11.336&n5; 12.433–35; of Zeus, 8.67–77; 16.656–58; 19.223–24; 22.208–13; 471, 486, 498; 521 scepters: of Agamemnōn, 2.45–46, 100–109, 185–87, 204–6, 265–68, 279; 9.38, 88–89; 10.271n2; 14.93; 23.567; of Zeus, 10.321, 328; 525
 Schedios, son of Iphytos, 2.517; 17.306–11; 488
 Schedios, son of Perimedes, 5.515–16
 Schliemann, Heinrich, 533, 536
 Sea Peoples, 517, 546
 Seasons, 5.749–51; 8.393–95; 549 seers. See prophets, prophecy Seferis, George, 512
 Sellēis river, Elis, 2.659; 15.531
 Sellēis river, Troad, 2.839; 12.97
 Selloi, 16.234–35; 519
 Semelē, 14.323, 325
 Seven Against Thebes, 548, 549 shame (aidōs), 5.529–32; 13.120–22; 15.560–64, 661–62; 17.91–95, 556–58; Hektōr's motivation, 6.429–46; 22.38–93, 104–7; 523 shields, 13; of Achilles, 14; 18.478–608; Aias's tower-like, 14; 7.219–23; 8.266–72; 11.485–86; 23.820–21; 472; 507; 548; Hektōr's, 6.116–18; held horizontally over shoulders, 22.48&n1; 497; Nestōr's golden, 8.192–93; Sarpēdōn's, 12.294–97; 23.799 ships: avoid open water, 14.225n6; beaching, 1.484–86&n9; Catalogue of Achaian, 1.484–759; 465; chalked string used in construction, 15.410–13; dispositions on beach, 14.30–36&n1; procedure on coming into harbor, 1.432–37; in similes, 7.3–7; 15.624–29 shot-put contest, 23.826–49; 501 Sidon, 3; 6.289–92; 23.741–49
 Sikyōn, 2.572; 23.299
 similes, 22–23; Arēs, 13.298–305; ass in wheat field, 11.558–65; axe blade, 3.60–63; beacons, 18.207–13; bees, 2.87–93; boars, 11.324–26, 414–20; 12.41–50, 146–52; 13.471–77; 17.281–83, 725–29; boulder, falling, 13.137–46; boundary dispute, 12.421–24; bulls, 16.487–91; 20.403–6, 495–99; cauldron boiling over, 21.362–65; chaff, 5.499–505; chalked string marking straight line, 15.410–13; cicadas, 3.151–52; clouds, 4.274–82; 5.522–27, 864–67; 16.297–302, 364–67; cornfield, 2.147–51; 11.558–65; cow and calf, 17.4–6; cranes and Pygmies, 3.1–7; deer, 10.360–64; 22.189–93; dogs, 8.338–41; 10.183–89, 360–64; 11.324–26, 414–20; 17.25–29; dove, 21.493–95; eagles, 17.674–78; 21.252–53; 22.308–10; falcon, 15.237–38; fig juice curdling milk, 5.901–2; fire, 2.780–85; 11.155–62; 14.394–401; 17.736–39; 20.490–94; fish, 21.22–24; 23.692–94; fishing, 16.406–8; 2.480–82; flies, 4.130–31; 16.641–44; forest fire, 11.155–62; 20.490–94; hare, 10.360–64; 17.674–78; 22.308–10; harvest, 5.499–505; 11.67–71; 13.588–92; 16.384–93;

similes (continued)

- hawks, 13.62–65; 16.582–83; 21.493–95; 22.139–43; headland, 15.618–21; hide being stretched, 17.389–93; horse's ivory cheek-piece, 4.140–45; horses, 6.503–29; 15.262–68, 679–84; 22.22–24, 162–65; hounds, 8.338–41; 10.360–64; 11.414–20; 17.725–29; hunters, 11.292–95, 414–20; 15.271–77; 17.61–69; 18.161–64, 318–22; 20.164–73; irrigation channel, 21.257–64; leaves, 6.146–49; 21.464–66; leopard, 21.573–78; lightning, 11.65–66; lions, 3.21–26; 5.135–43, 161–62, 554–58; 11.113–21, 172–78, 546–57; 12.41–50, 299–306; 15.630–36; 16.751–54, 756–58, 823–28; 17.61–69, 109–13, 133–36, 657–64; 18.161–64, 318–22; 20.164–73; 24.41–43; locusts, 21.12–16; meteor, 4.75–78; milk, 5.901–2; 16.641–44; mist, 3.10–14; mother swatting flies from child, 4.130–31; mountain-top, 16.297–302; mules, 17.742–45; oxen, 13.571–73, 703–8; 17.520–23; ploughing, 13.703–8; poppy, 8.306–8; potter, 18.600–601; Pygmies, 3.1–7; rainbow, 17.547–50; rainfall at harvest-time, 16.384–93; reapers, 11.67–71; ridge holding back water, 17.747–51; rivers and streams, 4.452–56; 5.85–94, 597–600; 11.492–97; 17.263–66; sailing, 7.3–7; 15.624–29; sandcastle, 15.362–66; sea and waves, 2.147–51, 209–10, 394–97; 4.422–28; 7.62–66; 9.4–8; 13.795–801; 14.16–21, 394–401; 15.381–84, 618–21, 624–29; 16.7–11; 17.263–66; sheep, 4.433–38; 13.492–95; shepherds, 12.451–52; 18.161–64; siege, city under, 18.207–13, 219–20; 21.522–25; Sirius, 11.62–65; 22.26–32; smoke, 21.522–25; snakes, 3.33–37; 22.93–95; snow, 12.156–58, 278–87; 13.754; 19.357–58; stars, 8.555–61; 11.62–65; 22.26–32, 317–20; storms, 2.780–85; 4.274–82; 11.297–98; 16.364–67; thunder, 2.780–85; 13.795–801; 14.414–17; traveller, 15.80–83; trees, 4.482–87; 5.559–60; 13.178–82; 14.414–17; 16.482–84; 17.53–58; trumpet call, 18.219–20; vultures, 16.428–30; wall, 16.212–13; wasps, 12.167–72; 16.259–65; wild beasts, 15.323–36, 586–89. See also boars; leopard; lions above, wolves below; winds, 7.3–7; 11.305–9; 13.795–801; 14.394–401; 16.765–70; winnowing, 13.588–92; wolves, 16.155–67, 351–57; woodcutters, 16.633–34; wool-worker with scales, 12.433–35
- Simoeis river, 4.474–77; 5.774, 777; 6.4; 12.21; 20.53; 546, 547; Xanthos calls to fight Achilles, 21.308–23; 495–96; 546, 547
- Simoeisios, 4.473–89
- Sipylos, 24.615–17&n9
- Sisyphos, 6.153–54; 522, 546
- Skaian Gates, 3.145, 149, 263; 6.237, 307, 392–93; 9.354; 11.170; 16.712; 18.453; 22.5–6; 469, 470, 476, 487, 497; 546–47; Achilles's death before, 4; 22.358–60; 498; 506, 547
- Skamandrios, son of Hektör. See Astyanax
- Skamandrios, son of Strophios, 5.48–58
- Skamandros (Xanthos) river, 5.36, 774; 6.4; 11.499; 14.433–39; 21.1–384; 24.692–93; 547; supports Trojans in battle, 20.40, 73–74; 493; fighting in waters, 21.1–232; 494–95; fights Achilles, 21.233–327; 495–96; defeated by Hēphaistos, 21.328–84; 496; and destruction of Achaian wall, 12.21
- . anger, 21.136–38, 145–47, 211–32; 495; descriptions, 5.36; 7.329; 21.124–25, 603; 22.148; 547; Hēphaistos fights, 20.73–74; 21.342–82; 493; 525, 547; speaks, 21.214–21, 228–32, 307–23, 357–60, 369–76; 547; springs, 22.147–56; 498
- Skyros, Aegean island, 5, 7; 19.326, 332; 536
- Skyros, Phrygia, 9.667–68
- slavery, 9.592–93; 20.193; 21.39–41, 58, 79; 24.751–53; 504; 531
- Sleep (Hypnos), 14.231–91, 354–60; 16.453–57, 666–83; 481, 486; 518, 546, 547
- smelting, 18.467–75
- Smintheus (epithet of Apollo), 1.39&n4
- society, 15–16; bureaucracy, 13; 532, 552; class attitudes, 2.188–206; 464; 549–50. (Thersitēs incident) 4, 15, 23; 2.211–77; 465; 549–50; Linear B evidence, 13; 532, 552; transitional state in Iliad, 15–16, 23. See also aristocracy; economy; everyday life, scenes from; guest-friendship; Minoan civilization; Mycenaean civilization

Sôkos, 11.427–57; 477
 Solon of Athens, 546
 Solymoi, 6.184–85, 203–4
 Sparta, xiimap; 2.582; 4.51–56; 466; 526, 547 spears: of Achilles, 16.140–44; 19.387–91; 485, 493; 516; of Hektôr, 8.493–95; spear-throwing contest, 23.884–97; 501 Spercheios river, 16.174–76; 23.140–53; 536, 543, 547 stars, 18.485–89; in similes, 8.555–61; 11.62–65; 22.26–32, 317–20 Stasinos of Cyprus, 6
 Stentôr, 5.780–91; 468
 Sthenelos, father of Eurystheus, 19.116, 123; 521
 Sthenelos, son of Kapaneus, 2.564; 9.48–49; 23.510–13; 473; and Agamemnôn's reproach, 4.367, 403–18; 467; in battle, 5.108–13, 241–50, 835–36; 8.114; 467, 469
 Stichios, 13.195, 691; 15.329–31
 Strauss, Barry, 4, 5*n*, 14*n*, 15*n* stress, metrical, 19, 20 Strife (Eris), 547–48; on aegis, 5.740; in battle, 4.439–45; 5.518; 11.1–14&cn1, 73–74; 18.535, 538; 20.48; 547; cords of, 13.358–60; 16.662; 479; and Judgment of Paris, 2; 529, 547–48 structure of Iliad, 8 Styx, river, 2.751–55; 8.369&cn1; 548; oaths sworn by, 2.755; 14.272; 15.37–38; 548 sun, 7.421–22; 18.239–41 survival: of texts of Homeric epics, 7. See also anachronisms swords: of Asteropaios, 23.807–8, 824–25; Thracian, 13.76–77; 23.807–8 talents [of gold], 18.507&cn3 Talthybios (Achaian herald), 1.318–48; 4.192–209; 7.273–77; 23.897; 526; role in sacrifice, 3.118–20; 19.196–97, 250–51, 267–68; 492

 Tariusia (Hittite term for Troy), 552–53 Tartaros, 8.13–16, 478–81; 14.278–79; 15.225&cn1; 523, 531, 548, 551 teeth, barrier of, 15; 4.350; 9.409; 14.83 Telamôn, 8.281–85; 548; sons. See Aias (1); Teukros Tenedos, 6; 1.38, 452; 11.625–27; 13.32–38; 479
 Terror (Deimos), 4.440; 11.37; 15.119; 482–83; 511
 Tethys, 14.200–210, 301–6; 481
 Teukros, 22*n*23; 548; archery, 8.266–334; 12.350, 387–89, 400–403; 13.313–14; 23.859–69; 548; in battle, 6.31; 8.266–334; 12.333–36, 350, 363–72, 387–89, 400–403; 13.91, 170–86; 14.515; 15.435–83; 472, 478, 479, 482, 484; encounters with Hektôr, 8.309–34; 13.183–85, 313–20; 15.458–77; 472, 484; fights with sword or spear, 6.31; 13.170–84, 314; 14.515; 15.463–83; 484; at funeral games, 23.859–69; 501; 548; parentage, 8.284; 548; shelters behind Aias's shield, 8.266–72; 472; 548 Teuthrania, 3
 Theanô, 5.70; 6.298–310; 11.224; 469; 507, 509
Thêbaîd, 10; 549
 Theban War, 4.377–410; 6.221–23; 14.114; 548–49, 554
 Thêbē/ai, Boiôtia, 549; Catalogue of Ships and, 2.505; 548–49; descriptive epithets, 4.406, 378; 19.99; 549; Hēraklēs born at, 14.323–24; 19.98–99; Mycenaean culture, 532, 535; Oidipous's funeral games, 23.679–80&cn8; 500; Tydeus and, 5.802–8; 10.285–90; 14.114. See also Kadmeians; Theban War
 Thêbē/ai, Cilician, in Troad, 549; Achilles sacks, 4; 1.366–69; 2.691–93&cn4; 6.413–28; 9.188&cn3; 520, 549, 551; Andromachē's home, 6.396–97, 413–28; 22.471–72, 479–81; 509, 512, 549; Chryseïs taken at, 4; 1.369; 516, 517; other spoils, 4; 9.186–88&cn3; 16.152–54; 23.826–27; 520

Thēbē/ai, Egypt, 9.381–84; 549
 Themis, 15.87–91, 93–94; 20.4–6; 482, 493; 549, 551
 Thēra (Santorini), 14; 534
 Thersilochos, 17.216; 21.209
 Thersitēs, 4, 15, 23; 2.211–77; 465; 549–50
 Thēseus, 1.265; 514, 524
 Thessaly, xiimap; 535, 550
 Thestōr, son of Ēnops, 16.401–40; 486
 Thetis, 550–51; persuades Zeus to favor Trojans for Achilles's sake, 1.5n2, 348–427, 495–530; 8.370–72; 13.350; 15.72–77, 596–600; 18.74–77; 463–64, 482, 484, 490; 543, 550; and death of Patroklos, 18.35–148; 19.23–39; 23.14; 490, 492; brings Achilles armor from Hēphaistos, 18.130–47, 368–617; 19.1–23; 490, 491–92; Zeus sends to tell Achilles to ransom Hektōr's body, 2.472–142, 561–62; 501–2, 503; 555; and Achilles's death, 5; 505, 550–51
 ———. and Achilles's fate, 9.410–16; 17.408–11; 18.52–64, 88–96, 330–32; 474; 550; attempts to make Achilles immortal, 542, 550; daughter of Nereus, 20.105–8, 206–7; 493; 537; and Dionysos, 6.137; and Epeigeus, 16.574; Hēphaistos's gratitude to, 18.395–407; 525; Hērē's attitude to, 1.517–21, 536–43; 2.458–63, 101–2; 550; marriage to Pēleus, 2; 18.83–87, 432–35; 2.458–63; 490, 491, 501; 542, 543, 547–48, 550, 554; sends Achilles warm clothing, 16.222–24; and Zeus, 2; 1.5n2, 393–427, 493–611; 8.370–72; 13.347–50; 15.72–77; 463–64; 550, 551
 Thoas, father of Hypsipylē, 14.230; 23.745
 Thoas, son of Andraemōn, 2.638–44; 4.527–38; 7.168; 13.92, 215–19; 15.281–99; 19.239; 483
 Thoas, a Trojan, 16.311–12; 485
 Thomas, Carol, 12
 Thoōn, son of Phainōps, 5.152–58
 Thoōn, another Trojan, 11.422
 Thoōn, a third Trojan, 12.140; 13.545–50; 480
 Thrace, xiiimap; 9.5, 72; 13.4, 301; 14.226–27; cup from, 2.4.234–35; 502; swords, 13.76–77; 23.807–8; warriors at Troy, 2.844–45; 4.518–19, 532–35; 11.222; 20.485. See also Akamas; Rhēsos Thrasymēdēs, son of Nestōr, 9.81; 10.57–59, 196–97, 229, 255; 14.9–11; 16.321–25; 17.377–83, 705; 485, 488, 489
 Thrasymēlos, 16.463–65; 486
 Thucydides, 11
 Thyestēs, 2.106–7; 513–14
thymos (“spirit”), 15; 16.505&n3 Tiryas, xiiimap; 2.559; 519, 532, 535, 551, 552
 Titans, 5.898; 8.477–81; 14.274, 278–79; 15.225&n1; 10; 531, 548, 551
 Tithōnos, 11.1; 20.237; 517
 Tlēpolemos, son of Damastor, 16.415–16; 486
 Tlēpolemos, son of Hēraklēs, 2.653–70; 5.628–62, 668–69; 468; 525–26, 546 Tmōlos, 2.866; 20.385 trade, 7.467–75; 21.39–41, 58, 79; 2.4.751–53; 495; 531 translation, and metre, 18–21
 Trikka, 2.729; 4.202
 Troad, xiiimap; 551
 Trōilos, 2.4.257; 539–40
 Troizēn, 2.561; 511
 Trojan Catalogue, 2.816–77; 465; 551, 552
 Trojan-Dardanian distinction, 552

- Trojan War, 551–52; date, 1; 552; historicity, 1, 11–17, 23; 551–52; omen on duration, 3; 2.299–330; 465; 529; origins, 3, 6; 524, 529, 533; in Zeus's plan, 554. See also myths of Trojan War
- Trös, son of Alastör, 20.463–72; 494
- Trös, son of Erichthonios, 20.229–31; 508, 552; horses, 5.222–23&n3, 263–74, 319–27; 23.291–92&n3; 522, 531
- Troy (Ilion), Trojans, *xiii*map; 552–53; Achaian sack, 6, 7; archaeology, 11, 14n; 533, 536, 551–52; Dardanian Gates, 5.789; 22.194; 546; Hēraklēs and, 5.638–42&n8, 648–51; 14.250–51; 20.143–48&n5; 494; 525–26, 531, 548; in Hittite documents, 13, 14; 540, 552–53; honored by Zeus, 4.44–49; 466; palace of Priam, 6.242–50; ramparts vulnerable to scaling, 14n; 6.433–39; 16.702–3; 470; walls, 7.451–53; 21.441–60; 471, 496; 552; Zeus predicts fall, 15.69–71; 482. See also Skaian Gates
- truces for burial of dead, 4; 7.375–78, 394–96, 408–10, 424–36; 24.655–70, 777–81; 471, 503, 504
- Tumult, 18.535; 491
- Tydeus, 5.125–26&n2; 6.221–23; 14.113–14, 119–25&n2; Diomēdēs compared to, 4.370–400; 5.800–813; 467, 468; 518–19; embassy to Thēbē, 5.802–8; 10.285–90; in Theban War, 4.385–98; 6.221–23; 14.114; 548; son of. See Diomēdēs
- Underworld. See Hādēs; Tartaros
- unified action of Homeric epics, 7, 10
- universality of Iliad, 8, 22
- Ventris, Michael, 532
- Vergil; C. Day Lewis's translations, 20–21
- Vergina, larnax from, 24.795n12
- Wain (constellation), 18.487
- wall and ditch, Achaian, 7.436–41, 445–53; 12.52–57; Trojans break through, 12.1–471; 477–78; Apollo breaches, 15.355–66; 483; Trojan retreat stopped by, 16.364–71; 486; destruction, 7.459–63; 12.10–34; 477–78; 528, 544
- walls, other: Hēraklēs's refuge from sea beast, 20.143–48&n5; 494; of Troy, 7.451–53; 21.441–60; 471, 496; 552
- warfare: anachronistic techniques, 14–15; Arēs and Athēnē represent different aspects, 511; changing ethos, 519–20; heralds' role, 2.442–44; 7.273–82; 471; 526; joy or grief at battle, 13.343–44; 479. See also armor; honor, code of; tactics; weapons
- weapons, 13, 15. See also arrows; spears; swords
- wedding scene, 18.491–96
- West, M. L.; theories on authorship, 1, 10
- West Wind (Zephyros), 23.192–218, 229–30; 499
- White Island (Leukē), 5; 505, 551
- Wilus(iy)a (Hittite term for Ilion, Troy), 13, 14; 540, 552–53
- winds. See North Wind; West Wind; and under similes
- winged words; speech as physical matter, 15
- Wolf, Friedrich Augustus, 10n
- Wooden Horse, 5–6, 7; 529, 536–37, 553–54
- wrestling contest, 23.700–739; 500
- writing: transition from oral tradition, 8, 9, 10, 12, 14, 23; Homeric reference, 6.168–69&n1; 514. See also Linear A; Linear B
- Xanthos, son of Phainōps, 5.152–58
- Xanthos (Achilles's horse), 16.149–51; 19.400–424&n5; 485, 493

Xanthos (Hector's horse), 8.185
 Xanthos river, Lycia, 2.877; 5.479; 6.172; 12.313
 Xanthos river, Troad. See Skamandros (Xanthos) river Xenophanes of Kolophôn, 16; 524, 554

Zealeia, 2.824–27; 4.103, 121

Zephyros (west wind), 23.192–218, 229–30; 499

Zeus, 554–55; grants Thetis Achilles's wish to favor Trojans, quarrels with Hērē, 1.512, 393–27, 493–611; 463–64; deludes Agamemnôn, 2.1–47; 9.17–25; 464; warns Trojans of attack, 2.784–809; 465; argues with Hērē and Athēnē, 4.1–73; 466; incites Trojans to break truce, 4.64–78; 466; and Arēs's intervention in battle, 5.752–66, 868–99; 468, 469; bans gods from intervening, 8.1–52, 397–483; 13.1–9, 521–25; 471, 479; weighs armies' fates, 8.67–77; favoring Trojans, 8.75–77, 170–76, 335, 370–72, 397–483; 9.17–25; 11.78–83, 181–209; 12.173–74, 252–55, 402–3, 447–51; 471, 472, 476, 478; spares Achaians, 8.245–52; 472; rouses Achaians, 11.3–4, 52–55; 476; omen to Trojans, 12.196–251; 478; opposed by Poseidôn, 13.345–60; 479; Hērē seduces to distract, 14.153–353; 481; 510, 526, 528, 547, 555; anger at deception, 15.4–46; 482; tells Hērē of plan for Troy, 15.48–77; 482; changes course of battle, 15.53–77, 143–262; 482, 483; saves Hektôr, 15.458–74, 484–93, 592–614, 718–25; 484; dissuaded from saving Sarpēdôn, 16.431–61, 666–75; 486; 546; and death of Patroklos, 16.644–58, 684–91, 844–46; 17.198–212; 486, 487, 488; and battle over Patroklos's body, 17.268–73, 426–56, 545–46, 644–50; 488–89; on Hērē's support for Achaians, 18.356–67; 491; has Athēnē feed Achilles, 19.340–48; 493; allows gods to intervene, 20.4–31; 493; amusement at fighting amongst gods, 21.388–91, 504–14; 496, 497; decides not to save Hektôr, 22.166–85, 208–13, 301–3; 498; orders Achilles to return Hektôr's body, 2; 24.64–92, 103–19, 133–40; 501; 506, 542, 543–44, 555; sends good omen to Priam, 24.290–321; 502

———. Achilles's descent from, 21.185–99; Agamemnôn blames his actions on, 19.87–89, 268–75; 492; and Aphroditē, 5.426–30; 468; Dardanos as son, 20.215; of Dōdōna, 16.220–56; 485; 519; dreams sent by, 1.63; 2.1–47; 464; and Epeian-Pylian war, 11.727, 736, 753, 761; and Fate, 16, 17; 8.437–83; 15.61–71; 472; 521, (considers overriding), 16.431–61; 22.166–85; 521, 554–55, (weighs in scales), 8.67–77; 16.656–58; 19.223–24; 22.208–13; 471, 486, 498; 521; futility of resisting, 8.426–32, 437–83; 15.78–112, 143–50; 472, 482; 526; Glaukos robbed of wits by, 6.234–36; and Hēphaistos, 1.590–94; 525; and Hektôr, 12.173–74; 15.65–69, 458–74, 484–93, 592–614, 718–25; 16.656–58, 844–46; 17.198–212; 478, 484; 523; humor, 20.22–23&cn1; 21.388–91; 496; Idomeneus's descent from, 13.458–53; jars of ills and blessings, 24.527&cn7; and Judgment of Paris, 2–3; and Kronos, 1.396–406; 14.203–4; 531, 550, 551; nod as binding promise, 1.524–30, 558–59; 9.19; nurslings, 555; omens, 8.245–52; 12.196–251; 24.290–321; 472, 478; plan for Troy, 15.48–77; 482; plan to reduce overpopulation and end heroic age, 3, 16, 17; 1.5; 463; 543–44, 554; power shared with other sons of Kronos, 15.185–93; 483; 522–23; and Sarpēdôn, 5.662; 6.198–99; 12.400–403; 16.431–61, 666–75; 478, 486; 546, 554–55; sexual conquests, 14.313–28; 555; thunder, 7.478–82; 8.170–76; 15.377–80; 20.56–57; 471, 472, 493; Troy as dear to, 4.44–49; 466; weather subject to, 555. See also under Athēnē; Hērē; Poseidôn; scales; scepters; Thetis